the box or chest of treasure, which, when forced from its hinges, had been carelessly flung aside during the tussle of curiosity to ascertain the contents which it concealed, and had been afterwards, as it seemed, secreted by the mandarins. There was a word and a number upon the planks, and the beg-ning of the inscription was distinct, though it was ragged blue handkerchief, and rubbing off the cloth by which the inscription was obscured. It was in the ordinary black letter.

"What does that mean right o’?" said Edie to the adept.

"S," said the philosopher, like a child getting his lesson in the primer; "S, T, A, E, C, H.— Starch—dat is what the women-washers put into de neckcrichers, and de shirt collar."

"Starch," said Ochlitree; "na, na, Mr. Dusterdevel, ye are muir of a conjurer than a clerk—it’s a search, man, search—Sec, there’s the Ye clear and distinct."

"Aha!—I see it now—it is search—number one.
Mein himmel, then there must be a number two, mein goot friend; for search is what you call to seek and find."

"Yes, indeed. Well, then, we have found one;
there is one great big prize in de wheel for us, got Meister Ochlitree."

"Awel, it may be so—but we canna howk for fortunes, for they are taken from the awe—and it’s like some o’ them will be sent back to fling the earth into the hole, and mak’ things tric again. But ye’ll sit down wi’ me a while in the woods, and if ye was to see me with only one lighted on the only man in the country that could have talked about Malcolm Misticot and his hidden treasures—But first we’ll rub out the letters on this board for fear her thoughts may escape."

And, by the assistance of his knife, the beggar erased and defaced the characters so as to make them quite unintelligible, and then daubed the board with clay so as to obliterate all traces of the erasure.

Doustie explained to the old man’s movements which indicated a person that could not be easily overreached, and yet (for even the tongues of speech and the spirit of proceedence) our adept felt the disgrace of playing a sectordary part, and dividing winnings with so mean an associate. His appetite for gain, however, was sufficiently stimulated to overpower his

And though far more an impostor than a dupe, he was not without a certain degree of personal faith even in the gross superstitions by means of which he imposed upon the gullible. In his charivari, as a leader on such occasions, he felt humiliated at feeling himself in the situation of a vulture marshall-ed to his prey by a carrión-crow. Let me, however, hear his story to an end, thought Dousterswivel, and it will be hard if I do not make mine account in it better, as Meister Edie Ochlitrees makes proposes.

The adept thus transformed into a pupil from a teacher of the mystic art, followed Ochlitree in passvise acquiescence to the Prior’s Oak—a spot, as the reader may remember, at a short distance from the ruins, where the secret knowledge and silence waited the old man’s communication.

"Meister Dustanswivel," said the narrator, "it’s an unco while since I heard this business treated earnestly—for the story of Knockwinnock没有 Arthur, nor his father, nor his grandfather, and I mind a wee bit about them a’, liked to hear it spoken about—nor they dinna like it yet—but nane matter, ye may be sure it would clear up the matters in the kitchen, like any other thing else in a great house, though it were forbidden in the ha’—and see I heard the circumstances rehearsed by sad servants in the family; and in this present days, when things o’ that sort-wary sort arena kept in mind round winter fire-sides as they used to be, I question if there’s any body in the country can tell the tale but myself. I’ve eye-out taken the laird though, for there’s a parchmen book about it, as I have heard, in the charter-room at Knock-winnock Castle."

"Well, all dat is vary well—but get you on with your stories, mine goot friend," said Douster-swivel.

"Awel, ye see," continued the mandarin, "this was a job worth eight thousand cranes through the hole country, when it was lika ane for himself, and God for us a’; when nane man wanted property if he had strength to take it, or had it jerked out o’ the rope upon her, and she ower him, whichever could win upmost, a’ through the east country here, and nay doubt through the rest o’ Scotland in the self and same style."

"Sae, in these days, Sir Richard Wardour came into the land, and that was the first o’ the name ever was in this country.—There’s been many of them same, and the maest, like him they ca’d Heil-In-Harms, and the rest o’ them, are sleeping down in yon ruins. They were a proud dour set o’ men, but unco brave, and sae stood up for the weel o’ the country, ye’d say them a’—there’s no muckle pay in that wish. They ca’d them the Norman War-dours, though they cam frae the south to this country. So this Sir Richard, they ca’d Rod-hand, drew up his army and gude—Nine weeks and six for them they were Knockwinnocks of that ilk, and and five months,—for marry him she maun it’s like, —ye’ll no hinder her givin them a present o’ a bonny knave—but then when there was the like was never seen; and she’s be burned, and she’s be alane, was the best words o’ their mouth. Moot be a’ snerded wi’ again some wit, and the best was set awa, and bred up near the High-lands, and grew up to be a fine wanne fallow, like mony ane that chance in the best of Coill, the resident, and the people. Richard wi' the Red head, he had a fair offering o' his ain, and a' was found and quiet till his head was laid in the ground. But then down came Malcolm Mistletoe, the fine man, and laid the best of Coill, and so the people they aye ca'd him Misticot (that spoke o' lang syne)—(down came this Malcolm, the love-begot, fair Glen-nie, wi' a string o' lang-legged Highlanders at his side, and watched for any body's mischief, and lie threeps the castle and lands are his ain as his mother's oldest son, and turns a' the Wardours out to the hill. There was a sort o' fighting and blude and some o' the more violent motions but Malcolm had the uppermost for a lang time, and kept the Castle of Knockwinnock, and strengthened it, and builded that muckle tower, that they ca' Mistico't's tower to this day."

"Ming goot friend, old Mr. Eech Ochiltrie," interrupted the German, "this is all as one like de long histories of a baron of sixteen quarters in mine own country; but I would as rather hear de silver and gold."

"Why, ye see," continued the mendicant, "this Malcolm was weel helped by an uncle, a brother of his father, that was Prior o' St. Bower, and a muckle treasure they gathered together, to secure the succession of their house in the lands o' Knockwinnock—Folk said, that the monks in thos days had the power of multiplying money at any rate they wad very rich. At last it came to this, that the young Wardour, that was Red-head's son, challenged Misticot to fight with him in the fields as they ca'd 'there—perhaps o' the rodd or tank, and selveste a' clath, but a paling—thing they set up for them to fight in like game-cocks. Aweel, Misticot was beaten, and at his brother's mercy—but he wadna touch his life for the blood o' Knockwinnock that reas he held their veins: so Malcolm was compelled to turn a monk, and he died soon after in the priory, of pure despeit and vexation. Nobody ever kend where his uncle the prior earned him, or what he did wi' his gowd and silver, for he stood on the right o' halic kirk, and wad gie name account to any body. But the prophegy gat abroad in the country, that whienever Misticot's grave was found out, the estate o' Knockwinnock should be lost and won."

"Ach, mine goot old friend, Mr.熹, and dat is not true, for if Mr.熹 will quarrel with his goot friends to take Mr. Ochiltrie, Mr.熹, and ye'll find number two—besides, yon kist is only silver, and I aye heard that Misticot's pose had muckle yellow gowd in't."

"Den, mine goot friends," said the adept, jumping up hastily, "why do we not set about our little job directly?"

"For two good reasons," answered the beggar, who quietly kept his seating posture; "first, because, as I said before, we have nothing to dig wi', for they ha'en awa the picks and shovels; and secondly, because there will be a whane idle gowks coming to gie us a hand. The longer we stay, the fester wi' time it is a daylight, and maybe the lard may send somebody to fill it up—and any way we wad be caught. But if you will meet me on this place at twal o'clock wi' a dark lantern, I'll have the things ready, and we'll gang quietly about our job, but twa sells, and nobody the wiser for't."

"Be—be—but, mine goot friend," said Dousterwivel, from whose recollection his former nocturnal adventure was altogether the splendid hopes which Edie's narrative held forth, "it is not so goot or so safe to be about Mr.熹's grave at that time of night—you have Edie an' me to do ye, and the same time and none dace. I do assure you, dace is disturbance dace."

"If ye're afraid o' ghaists," answered the mendicant coolly, "I'll do the job myself, and bring ye share o' the silver to any place ye like to appoint."

"No—no—no—too much trouble for you—I will not have dat—I will come myself—and it will be bettermost; for, mine old friend, it was I, Herman Dousterwivel, discovered Mr.熹's grave and Mr.熹's Morris; and I will see to that there is a place to put away some little trumpery coins, just to play one little trick on my dear friend Sir Arthur, for a little sport and pleasure—yes, I did take some trouble to see what was at the bottom of Mr.熹's mischief, and the Misligdon's own monuments—It is like dat he meant I should be his heirs—so it would not be civil in me not to come myself for mine inheritance."

"At twal o'clock wi' a dark lantern, with you and me and Edie—we will meet under this tree—I'll watch for a while, and see that nobody muddles wi' the grave—it's only sayin' the lords forbad it—then get me bit supper fra Ringan the ander up by, and leave to sleep i' the barn, and I'll slip out at night and ne'er be mist."

"Do so, mine goot Mr.熹, and I will meet you here on this very place, though all de spars should moan and enceve dery very brains out.

So saying, he shook hands with the old man, and the whole pledge of fidelity to their presents, they separated for the present.

CHAPTER XXV.

[See thou shake the bags of hoarding abbots; angels imprisoned by the earth—Bell, book, and candle, shall not drive me back, if gold and silver beckon to come on.]

The night set in stormy, with wind and occasion showers of rain.

"Eh, ers," said the old mendicant, as he took his place on the sheltered side of the large oak-tree to watch the coming of the night. "If it be a human nature's a wilful and wayward thing!—Is it not an unco lucre o' guin wead bring this Dousterwivel out in a bost o' wind like this, with twal o'clock at night, to thir wild gouty woe?—and anna a bigger fule than hims will bide here waiting for him?"

Having made these sage reflections, he wrapp'd himself close in his cloak, and fixed his eye on the moon as she waded amid the stormy and dark clouds, which the wind from time to time drove across her surface. The melancholy and uncertainty gleams that she shot from between the passing shafts of the moon, fell over the old stones and shaded windows of the old building, which were thus for an instant made distinctly visible in their runny state, and now became again a dark, undistinguished, as shadowy mass. The little lake and its share of the transient beams of light, and showed its water broken, whitened, and agitated under the passing storm, with that black cloud which covered the sky like a veil over the moon, were only distinguished by their sinister and mysterious plashing against the beach. The wooden gins repeated, to every successful gust that hurried through its narrow trough, the deep and various groan which the trees replied to the whirlwind, and the sound sunk again, as the blast passed away, into a faint and passing murmur, resembling the sighs of an exhausted criminal after the first pangs of agony were over. In these sounds, superstition might have found ample gratification for that state of excite terror which she fears and yet loves. But such reflections were beyond the range of the mind wandered back to the scenes of his youth.

"I have kept guard on the outposts bai in Germany and America," he said to himself, "in mony a stot war night with the curl, and Edie, and Richard, and there was maybe a dozen o' their riflemen in the thicket before me. But I was aye glad at my duty—nabody ca'd Edie sleeping.

As he sat there, musing to himself, he instinctively shouldered his trusty pipe-staff, assumed the port of a sentinel on duty, and, as a step advanced toward the tree, called, with a tone resounding better with his military name on him in his present state—"Stands—who goes there?"

"De devil, goot Edie," answered Dousterwivel.
THE ANTIQUARY.

why does you speak so loud as a barenhaunter, or what you call a factionary—I mean a sentiment?"

"Keep at it, you swine," said the gentleman at that moment, answered the mendicant. "Here's an awesome night—hae you brought the lantern and a pock for the assailer?"

"I'm but a mine good friend," said the German, "here it is;—my part of what you call saddlebag—one side will be for you, one side for me—I will put dem on my horse to save you de trouble, as you are old men..."

"Have you a horse here, then?" asked Edie Ochiltree.

"O yes, mine friend, tied yonder by de stile," respected the gentleman.

"Well, I ha' just as word to the bargain—there sell name o' my geer gang on your beast's back."

"What was it as you would be afraid of?" said the foreman.

"Only of losing sight of horse, man, and money," again replied the galberlanze.

"Do you know dat you make one gentlemen out to be one great rogue?"

"Many gentlemen," replied Ochiltree, "can make that out for themselves—but what's the sense of quarrelling?—If ye want to gang on, gang on—if No, I'll gang on, thanks be to God. Aiken the barn that I left wi' right ill-will c'n ow,' and I'll pit back the pick and shule what I got them."

Dousterswivel deliberated a moment, whether, by stealing the money, they might not secure the whole of the expected wealth for his own exclusive use. But the want of digging implements, the uncertainty whether, if he had them, he could clear out the grave to a sufficient depth without assistance, and, above all, the reluctance which he felt, owing to the experience of the former night, to venture alone on the terrors of Mistock's grave, satisfied him that the attempt would be hazardous. Endeavouring, therefore, to assume his usual cajoling tone, though internally incensed, he begged "his good friend Master Dousterswivel would clear the way, and assured him of his acquiescence in all such an excellent friend could propose."

"Awed, awed, then," said Edie, "tak guards care o' your feet among the long grass and the loose stones—I wish we may get the light kepset in neist, wi' this fearsome wind—but there's a blink o' moonlight at times."

Thus saying, old Edie, closely accompanied by the amulet which pointed steadily towards the ruins, but presently made a full halt in front of them. "You're a learned man, Mr. Dousterswivel, and kenuckle o' the marvellous works o' nature—now, will ye just look at this lappet o' the grasses and the phantasms that walk the earth?—'i believe in them, aye, or no?"

"Now, goot Mr. Edie," whispered Dousterswivel, in a confidential tone of voice, "is this a times or a places for such a questions?"

"Indeed it is, baith the tane and the tother, Mr. Dustmanshovel; for, I mean fairly tell ye, there's reports that saul Mistock walks. Now this wad be an uncanny night to meet in him, and wua kens if he wad be ower weel pleased wi' our purpose of visiting this place.

"Aller guter Geister," muttered the adpet, the rest of the conjunction being lost in a tremulous warble of his voice, "I do desires you not to speak so, Mr. Edie, for from all I heard dat one other night, I do much believes"

"Now I," said Ochiltree, entering the chancel, and flinging abroad his arm with an air of defiance, "I wanna gie the crack o' my thumb for him were be to appear at this moment—he's but a disembodied spirit as we are embodied anes."

"For the sake of heavines," said Dousterswivel, "say nothing at all neither about somebodies or nobodyes!"

"Awed," said the beggar, (expanding the shade of the lantern,) "here's the stane, and, spirit or no spirit, I'se be a wee bit deeper in the grave—and I tells ye, this place from which the precious chest had that morning been removed. After striking a few strokes, he tired, or affected to tire, and said to his companion, 'I'm auld and failed now, and cannot man in get in and tak the shule a bit, and shule out the loose earth, and then I'll tak turn about wi' you.'"

Dousterswivel accordingly took the place which the beggar had vacated, and not satisfied, as it appeared, with the zeal that awakened avarice, mingled with the anxious wish to finish the undertaking and leave the place as soon as possible, could inspire in a mind at once greedy, suspicious, and timorous.

Edie, standing much at his ease by the side of the hole, contented himself with exhorting his associate to labour hard. My certie! few ever wrought for aescan a day's charge, or an it be butting the right path o' the size o' the kist, No. I., it will double its value, being filled wi' gowd instead of silver. —Odd ye work as if ye had been bred to pick and shule—ye could win your round half-crown lika day. Tak care o' your tase wi' that stane?" giving a kick to a large one which the adept had heaved out with difficulty, and which Edie pushed back again, to the great annoyance of his associate's shins.

Thus exhorted by the mendicant, Dousterswivel struggled and laboured among the stones and stiff clay, toiling like a horse, and internally blushing in German, as the light he escaped from his lips, Edie changed his battery upon him.

"O dinna swear, dinna swear!—wha ken's what's listening!—Eh! gude guid us, what's yon?—Hout, hout, on we go, it's just a bunch that kent the man's arm wi' a taper in it; I thought it was Misti cut himself. But never mind, work away—fing the earth wudn't be out o' the gate—ye'd do as clean a worker at a grave as Will Winnett himself! What gars ye stop now?—ye're just at the very bit for a chance."

"Stop!" said the German, in a tone of anger and disappointment, "why, I am down at de rocks dat de cursed ruins (God forgive me!) is founded upon."

"Well," said the beggar, "that's the likeliest bit of any—it will be but a muckle through-stane laid down to kiver the gowd; tak the pick till, and pit mair streng, man—ae gude downright devel will split it, I se' ennarrat, ye—Ay, that will do—Ood, he comes on wi' Wallace's strakes."

In fact, the adept, moved by Edic's exhortations, fetched two or three desperate blows, and succeeded, in breaking, not indeed against which he struck, but which, as he had already conjectured, was the same rock, but the implement which he wielded, jarring at the same time his arms up to the shoulder-blades.

"Huura, boys!—there goes Ringan's pick-axe!" cried Edie. "I thocht ye had nae money to sell short folk to sell such an secan frual try. Grant the shule—at it again, Mr. Dusterdevil."

The adept, without reply, scrambled out of the pit, which was but about six feet deep, and addressed his associate in a voice that trembled with anger. "Doe you know, Mr. Edie Ochiltree, who it is you put off your giles and your jest upon?

"Bravely, Mr. Dusterdevil—bravely do I ken ye, and has done mony a day; but there's nee jesting in the case, for I am wearying to see at our treasures; we should hae had baith ends o' the pockmany filled by this time—I hope it's bawk enough to luad at the gear?"

"Look you, baise old person," said the incensed philosopher, "if you do put another jest upon me, will cleave your skull-gave with this shovel!"

"And whare was my hands and my pike-staff be at the time?" replied Edie, in a tone that indicated no apprehension. "Hout, hout, Mr. Dusterdevil. I haeen lived lang in the world neither, to be shooled out o' that gate. What ails ye to be cankered, man, wi' your friends? I'll wager I'll find out the treasure in a minute;" and he jumped into the pit and took up the shovel.

"I do swear to you," said the adept, whose suspicions were now fully awaked, "that if you have played me one big trick, I will give you one big beating, Mr. Edie."

"Hear till him now," said Ochiltree; "we leev\ 29\, how to gar folk find out the gear—Odd, I'm thinking he's been drilled that way himself some day."

At this insinuation, which alluded obviously to the former scene between himself and Sir Arthur, the philosopher, as he was now called, by the title of baronet, turned with an expression of anger, pain, and terror, and it was not until he had sat upright for some minutes that he could arrange his ideas sufficiently to recollect how he could have been so forgetful. When recollection returned, he could have little doubt that the bait held out to him by Ochilltree to bring him to that solitary spot, the sarcasms by which he had provoked him, the readiness with which he had at hand for terminating it in the manner in which it had ended, were all parts of a concerted plan to bring disgrace and damage on Herman Dousterswivel. He could hardly suppose that he was indebted for the fatigue, anxiety, and beating which he had undergone, purely to the malice of Edie Ochilltree. The mendicant had acted a part assigned to him by some person of greater importance. His suspicions hesitated between Oldbuck and Sir Arthur Wardour. The former had been at no pains to conceal a marked dislike of him—but the latter he had deeply injured; and although he judged that Sir Arthur did not know the extent of his wrongs towards him, yet it was easy to suppose he had gathered enough of the truth to make him desirous of revenge. Ochilltree had alluded to at least one circumstance which the adept had every reason to suppose was private between Sir Arthur and himself; but he did not think it necessary to inform the former. The language of Oldbuck also intimated a conviction of his knavery, which Sir Arthur heard without making any animated defence. Lastly, the murder of his wife. Have not to have exercised his revenge, was not inconsistent with the practice of other countries with which the adept was better acquainted than with those of North Britain. With him, as with many bad men, to suspect an injury, and to nourish the purpose of revenge, was one and the same movement. And before Dousterswivel had fairly recovered his legs, he had mentally sworn the ruin of his benefactor, which, unfortunately, he possessed too much the power of accelerating.

But although a purpose of revenge floated through his brain, it was impossible to translate it into operations. The hour, the place, his own situation, and perhaps the presence, or near neighbourhood of his assailants, made self-preservation the adept's first object. His plans had been almost entirely extinguished in the scuffle. The wind, which formerly howled so loudly through the aisles of the ruin, had now greatly fallen, hushed by the rain, which was descending like a shower. In the meantime, the main cause, was totally obscured, and though Dousterswivel had some experience of the winds, and knew that he must endeavour to regain the eastern door of the church, through which he had been carried away, and that he hesitated for some time ere he could ascertain in what direction he was to seek it. In this perplexity, the suggestions of superstition, taking the ravings of darkness and his evil conscience, began again to present themselves to his disturbed imagination. "But bah!" quoth he valiantly to himself, "it is all nonsense—all one part of damn big trick and imposture. Devil that one thick-skulled Scotch Baronet, as I call him, for five years, should cheat Herman Dousterswivel!"

As he had come to this conclusion, an incident occurred which tended greatly to shake the grounds on which he had concluded. He exclaimed in a stern and firm voice, "Shame to ye, man!—Do ye think Heaven or earth will suffer ye to murder an old man that might be your friend!"

Dousterswivel turned instinctively, and beheld, to his utter astonishment, a tall dark figure standing close behind him. The apparition gave him no time to proceed by exorcism or otherwise, but having instantly recoursed to the voire de fait, took measure of the adept's shoulders three or four times with blows so substantial, that he fell under the weight of them, and remained senseless for some minutes between fear and stupefaction. When he came to himself, he was alone in the ruined chancel, lying upon the soft and damp earth which had been thrown out of Mustapha's grave. The figure which he had supposed with himself a couple of minutes before, was not that of a human being, but of an insubstantial form, as if the spirits of the churchmen who had once inhabited these deserted mans, were mourning the solitude and desolation to which their hallowed precincts had been abandoned. Dousterswivel, who had now got upon his feet, and was groping around the wall of the chancel, stood rooted to the ground on the occurrence of this new phenomenon. Each faculty of his soul seemed for the moment concentrated in the sense of hearing, and all rushed back with the unanimous information, that the deep, wild, and prolonged chant which he now heard, was the apprpose mixture of one of the solemn dirges of the church of Rome. Why performed in such a solitude, and by what class of choristers, were questions which the terrified imagination of the adept, stung with the recollections of nixies, goblins, werewolves, hoboobins, black spirits and white, blue spirits and gray, durst not even attempt to solve. Another of these events was soon engaged in the investigation. At the extremity of one of the transepts of the church, at the bottom of a few descending steps, was a small iron-grated door, opening, as far as he recollected, a sort of vault. As he cast his eye in the direction of the sound, he observed a strong reflection of red light glimmering through these bars, and against the steps which led down to the vault. Not knowing what to do; then, suddenly forming a desolate resolution, he moved down the aisle to the place from which the light proceeded. Fortified with the sign of the cross, as many exorcisms as his memory could recover, he advanced to the grate, from which, unseen, he could see what passed in the interior of the vault. As he approached with timidity and uncertain steps, the chant, after one or two wild and confused cadences, died away into profound silence. The grate, when he reached it, presented a singular spectacle in the interior of the crypt. At the top of the grave, with four tall flames, each about six feet high, about as broad as a bier, having a corpse in its shroud, the arms folded upon the breast, rested upon tressels at one side of the grave, as is usual. A priest, dressed in his cope and stole, held open the interchangeable—in another churchman in his vestments bore a holy water sprinkler—and two boys in white surplices held censers with incense—a man, of a figure once tall and commanding, but now bent with age or infirmity, stood alone and nearest to the coffin, attired in deep mourning—such were the most prominent figures of the group. At a little distance were two or three persons of both sexes, attired in long mourning hoods and cloaks; and five or six others in the same lugubrious dress, still farther removed. The incense burned in the glass cases ranged in motionless order, each bearing in his hand a huge torch of black wax. The smoky light from so many flames, by the red and indistinct atmosphere in which it existed, seemed to be a misty, dusky, and, as it were, phantom-like apperance to the outlines of this singular apparition. The voice of the priest—loud, clear, and sonorous, now recited, from the breviary which he held in his hand, the words which the ritual of the Catholic church has consecrated to the rendering of dust to dust. Mean while, Dousterswivel, the place, the hour, and the surprise conspired to direct the adept's attention to what he saw was substantial, or an unearthly representation of the rites, to which, in former times, these walls were familiar, but which are now rarely practised in Protestant countries, and almost never in Scotland. He was uncertain whether to abide the conclusion of the ceremony, or to endeavour to regain the chancel, when a change in his position made him visible through the grate to one of the attendant inquirers. The person who first saw him, indeed, was a lay brother to whom the individual who stood apart and nearest to the coffin by a sign, and upon his making a sign in reply, two of the group detached themselves, and, gliding along with noiseless steps as if fearing to disturb the service, unsealed and opened the grate which separated them from the aedep. Each took him by an arm, and exerting a degree of force, which he would have been incapable of exerting had his fear permitted him to attempt opposition, they placed him on the ground in the chancel, and sat down, one on each side of him, as if to detain him. Satisfied he was in the power of mortals like that, the aedep would have put some questions to them; but while one pointed to the vault, from which the sound of the priest’s voice was distinctly heard, the other placed his finger upon his lips in token of silence, a hint which the German thought it most prudent to obey. And thus they detained him until a loud Alleluia, pealing through the deserted arches of St. Ruth, closed the singular ceremony which it had in a manner so fatal to the baron.

When the hymn had died away with all its echoes, the voice of one of the sable personages under whose guard the aedep had remained, said, in a familiar tone, to the baron, "What is this you? could not ye have let us ken an ye had wusset till has been present at the ceremony?—My lord couldn’t tak it weel your coming blinking and jingling in the chancel.

"In de name of all dat is gootness, tell me what you are?" interrupted the German in his turn.

"What am I? why, who should I be but Ringan Aikwood, the Knight of the Cape, and what are ye doing here at this time o’ night, unless ye were come to attend the leddy’s burial?"

"I do declare to you, mine goot Ponder Aikwood," said the German, raising himself up, "that I have been this dark nights murdered, robbed, and borne in fears of my life."

"Robbed! what did ye do a deed here?—Murdered! I ask ye speak pretty blithe for a murdered man.—Put in fear! what put ye in fear, Mr. Dousteswivel?"

"I will tell you, Maister Ponder Aikwood Ringan, jest now, wee see a dog villain blue-gown, as you call Edie Ochlitree.

"I’ll ne’er believe that," answered Ringan; "Edie was kent to me, and my father before me, for a true, loyal, brave, Christian man; and, mark ye, this saein in front of our parents and shall be son of your siller, ye shall be named "Sae touch ye wha liket, Mr. Dousteswivel, and whether any body touched ye o’ no, I’m waiting for you.

"Maister Ringan Aikwood Ponders, I do not know what you call sacklest, but let alone all de oile and de soot dat you say he has, and I will tell you I was die night robbed of fifty pounds by your oile and sooty friend, Edies Ochlitree; and he is no more in your barn even now dat I over shall be in de kingdom of heaven.

"And, sir, if ye will gae up wi’ me, as the burial company has dispersed, we’ll mak ye down a bed at the lodge, and we’ll see if Edie’s at the barn. There were two wild-looking chaps left theauld kirk when we was coming up wi’ the corpse, that’s certain; and the priest, wha likes ill that any heretics should look on at our church ceremonies, sent twa o’ the riding saulies after them; we’ll hear a’ about it frae them.

"Thus speaking, the kindly apparatus, with the assistance of the mute personage, who was his son, disencumbered himself of his cloak, and prepared to escort the aedep to the place of that rest which the aedep so much needed.

"I will apply to the magistrates to-morrow," said the aedep: "oder, I will have de law put in force against all thebairns.

"While he thus muttered vengeance against the cause of his injury, he tottered from among the ruins, supporting himself on Ringan and his son, whose assistance his state of weakness rendered very necessary.

When they were clear of the priory, and had gained the little meadow in which it stands, Dousteswivel could perceive that a path of blood had caused him so much alarm issuing in irregular procession from the ruins, and glancing their light, like that of the ignis fatuus, on the banks of the lake. After moving along the path for some short space with a fluctuating and irregular motion, the lights were at once extinguished.

"We are put out the torches at the Hallie-croft well on such occasions as this," said the guest; "and accordingly no farther visible sign of the procession offered itself to Dousteswivel, although his ears could catch the distant and decreasing echo of horses’ hoofs in the direction towards which the mourners had bent their course.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Our way may the boatie row, And better may the speed, And may the boatie row o’ the way to the back o’ the sea.

The boatie rows, the boatie rows, The boatie rows weel.

And lichtsome be their life that hear The merkin and the crew!—Old Ballad.

We must now return to the interior of the fisher’s cottage mentioned in the prologue as the starting-point of this editing history. I wish I could say that its inside was well arranged, decently furnished, or tolerably clean. On the contrary, I am compelled to admit, there was confusion,—there was disarray,—there was dirt good store. Yet, with all this, there was about the inmates, Luckie Mucklebackit and her family, an appearance of ease, plenty, and comfort, that seemed to warrant their old-established rank.

"The clariter the cosier," a huge fire, though the season was summer, occupied the hearth, and served at once for cooking light, heat, and the means of preparing food. This fisher had been successful, and the family, with customary imprudence, had, since unlading the cargo, continued an unremitting operation of boiling and frying that part of the produce reserved for home consumption, and the bones and fragments lay on the wooden trestles, mingled with morsels of broken bannocks and shattered mugs of half-drunken Scotch punch. The stout and athletic form of Maggie herself, bustling here and there among the children, or the hand of half-grown girls and younger children, of whom she chucked one now here and another now there, with an expression of toss over, ye little sorrow! was strongly contrasted with the face of an old woman, and half subdued and manner of her husband’s mother, a woman advanced to the last stage of human life, who was seated in his bed, on a black chair close by the fire, the warmth of which she needed more to seem sensible of, now muttering to herself, now smiling vacantly to the children as they pulled the strings of her toy or close cap, or twitched her blue checked apron. With her distaff in her bosom, and her spindle in her hand, she piddled lazily and mechanically the old-fashioned Scotch manner. The younger children, crawling among the feet of the elder, watched the progress of grannie’s spindle as it twisted, and now and then ventured to interrupt its progress as it danced upon the floor in those vagaries which the more regulated spinning-wheel has now so universally superseded, that even the late Princess of the fairy tale might roam through all Scotland without the risk of piercing her hand with a spindle, and dying of the wound. Late as the hour was, and it was long past midnight, the whole family were still on foot, and from proposing to go to bed; the same was still busy broking cakes on the girdle, and the elder girl, the half-naked mermaid elsewhere commemorated, was preparing a pile of Finsdorn haddocks, (that is, haddocks smoked with green wood,) to be eaten along with those relics of improving domesticity.

While they were thus employed, a slight tap at the door, accompanied with the question, "Are ye up yet, sir?" announced a visitor. The answer, "Ay, ay,—come your ways ben, honey," occasioned the lifting of the latch, and Jenny Ritherout, the female servant, entered, with the face of a determined grace. "Ay, ay," explained the mistress of the family,—"high, sir! can this be you, Jenny? a sight o' you's gode for sair een, lass." Oh! a woman, whom we have seen teem up wi' Captain Hector's wond up by, that I havena had my fit out ower the door this fortnight; but he's better now, and uncle Carson sleeps in his room in case he wanted one thing. So, as soon as our old folk gied to be back, I een snooked my head up a bit, and left the house-door on the latch, in case any body should be wanting in or out while I was awa, and just came down that aye, it's yer wife cracks among, ye know."

"Ay, ay," answered Luckie Mucklebackit; "I see ye hae gotten a' your brawns on—ye're looking about for Steenie now—but he's no at hame the night—and ye'll no do for Steenie, lass—a feckless thing like you's no fit to mainte a man."

"Steenie will do no for me," retorted Jenny, with a toss of her head that might have become a higher-born damsel. "I maun hae a man that can maintain his wife."

"Ou ay, hinnie—that's your landward and burnlow-town notions. My cerva! fisher-wives ken bide at home, tend the man, and keep the house, and keep the sillir tok, lass.""

"A when poor drudges ye are," answered the nymph of the land to the nymph of the sea.—"As sure as a man's toot, ye couldna keep a bairn until the lazy fisher-loons would, but the wives maun kilt their coats, and wade into the surf to tak the fish ashore. And then the man casts off the keel, and the dry, and his pipe and his gill-stoup an' the inle, like ony nuld houdie, and never a turn will he do till the coible's afoot again! And the wife, she maun get the scull o' the boat, and sit in the dry, and no be so dainty as a lady, and no be so sick of wind."

"Slaves? gaw-wa, lass!—Ca the head o' the house— cried the old man, chiefly pleased with the zeal displayed by the sea-fisheries at a critical moment, and fearful of precipitating a famine of fishers with a silver punch bowl, to be used on occasions of festivity. But the fisher-women, on hearing what was intended, put in their claim to some separate share in the intended home reward. The men, they said, were their husbands; it was their wives who had suffered, and they were willing to make a capitulation on the price, and to dispose of the fish in their proportion, and to maintain each other in the necessities of life."

"A fowl, sweet Maggie, ilk land has an an' lass, but where's Steenie the night, when's o' come again? and where's the gudeman?"

"I hae put the gudeman to his bed, for he was een sair to the sickness, and he's sicce seen—" But in truth I had not time to explain the news—"Ye'll hae heard o' the muckle kirt o' swa' that Sir Arthur has fund down by at St. Ruth?—He'll be grander than ever now—he'll no come to no fond down his head to sneez, for fear o' seein' his shoon."

"Ou ay—a the country's heard o' that; but milde says they ca' it ten times mair than ever was o't, and he saw them work it up. Oid, it would be lang or a puir body that needed it got a' the winds.

"Na, that's sure enough.—And ye'll hae heard o' the Countess o' Glenallen being dead and lying in state, and how she's to be buried at St. Ruth's at the nig' than's, wi' torch-light; and the papist a' ss, and Ruipan Aikwood, that torch's, papist, too, are to be there, and it will be the grandest show ever was seen.""

"Troth, hinnie," answered the Nred, "if they let naybody but papists come there, it'll no be looked a' the show in the country; for the naylisten, Mr. Blattergowl ca' her, has few that don't hark o' her cup o' enchantments in this corner o' our closed lands. But what can all them to buy the said lady's shoon?"

Here she excited her voice, and exclaimed twir, or thrice, "Gudden o' gudeman! but in the spathy o' age and dillness, the man that ad addressed continued plying her spindle without understanding the appeal made to her."

"Speak to your gran'mother, Jenny. Oid, I was rafflin' for the dillness, and it was awa and awa, and the finest wind whistling in my teenth.""

"A gummie, and the little mermaid, in a voice in which the old woman was better accustomed, "nae wants to ken what for the Glenallen folk eye bury by candle-light in the ruins of St. Ruth."

The old woman paused in the act of twirling the spindle, turned round to the rest of the party, bide her withdrew, trembling, and clay-coloured face raised up her achen-haden and wrinkled face, in which the quick motion of two bright-blue eyes distinctly distinguished from the visage of a corpse, and, as aatching the long licht that blazed up the dark world, answered, "What garra the Glenallen maed inter their dead by torch-light, said the laass?—Is there a Glenallen dead a' now?"

"We none ken it, and they never heard it, and that was let their wife drive the stock to the market, and ca' in the debts. Na, na, na, na."" never gang out o' my auld head? — Eh! to see her lying on the floor wi' her long hair deeping wi' the salt water! — Heaven will avenge on u' that had to do wi' — Sire! is my son out wi' the coble this wintery o' en? —

'Na, na, mither — nae coble can keep the sea this high — I'm sitting in his bed outotther yonder a-shitting in the back o' the muckle bed.'

'Is Steenie out at sea then?'

'Na, granmie — Steenie's awa out o' Edie Ochiltree, the gaberlunzie — maybe they'll be gaun to say the burrs awa.'

'That ca'nna be,' said the mother of the family.

'We ken naething o' till Jock Rand caun in, and we'd us all wi' the old man's friends had been a-rumming to attend; they keep that things unco private and we caunna bring the corpse a' the way frae the castle, ten miles off, under cloud o' night. She has lain in state this eight days at Glenellan-house, in a grand chamber, a' hung wi' black, and lighted wi' wax candle.'

God assolzie her!' ejaculated old Edie, her head apparently still occupied by the event of the Countess's death — she was a hard-hearted woman, but she's gien to account for it a', and His mercy be infinite — God grant she may find it sae!' — And she relapsed into silence, which did not break again during the rest of the evening.

'I wondered what that auld daft beggar-carle and our son Steenie can be doing out in the night as a wi' the horses,' said Mr. Ochiltree, 'and the expression of surprise was echoed by her visiter; 'Gang an' see, one o' ye, hinnies, up to the heugh head, and gi the a' them a cry in case they're within hearing — the carraeks will be burnt to a cinder.'

The little emissary departed, but in a few minutes came running back with the loud exclamation, 'Eh, minnie! eh, granmie! there's a white bogle chasing twa black and down the hough, a voice in a word in a week, unless it be to the bits o' barn.'

'Wha, Mrs. Mucklebackit, she's an a-wome eile!' said Jenny in reply, 'D'ye think she's a-throwin' ma's a', ma's a woman?' — Folk says she's shown to the kirk, but I never saw the Countess's ain table grace, wi' her specially on a Friday — But see our gud-mother's hands and lips are ganging — now it's workin' in her head like barm — she'll speak enough the morn. — She can go to a show, a word in a week, ane's a hard-witted woman.'

'Canny, ye silly rampie! think ye an auld wife's less cauny than another? unless it be Allison Broek — I really couldna in conscience swear for her — I have seen the boxts she set fill'd wi' partana, when——'

'Vear, vear, Maggie,' whispered Jenny, 'your gud-mother's guan to speak again.'

'Vear, vear, Maggie,' said the old lady, 'or did I dream, or was it revealed to me, that gud-mother, Lady Glenallen, is dead, an buried this night?'

'Vear, vear, gud-mother,' screamed the daughter-in-law, 'it's even a.'

'And o'en sae let it be,' said old Edie; 'she's made mony a sair heart in her day — o'en her ain sair heart is living yet.'

'Ay, he's living yet — but how lang he'll live — however, dinna ye mind his coming and asking after re in the spring, and leaving ari.'

'Ay, sair heart,' said Maggie, 'bein' a mind it — but a handsome gentleman he was, and his father before him. Eh! if his father had lived, they might have been happy folk! — But he was gane, and the lady carried it in-her and outter wi' her son, and carr'd him trow the thing he never auld had trowed, and do the thing he has repented a' his life, and will repent still, was his life as lang as this lang and weepin' an gane heep.'

'O what was it, granmie?' — and 'What was it, Luckie Edie?' — sked the children, the mother, and the visiter, in monie a tone.

'Never ask what it was,' answered the old sibyl, but pray to God that ye arena left to the pride and foolishness o' your sin hearts. They may be as powar-ful o' ye as an auld witch, an ye witness that — O that wears and fearfu' night I will it 2 R again, and I just put it in my pocket and keep it safe, and then came the talk of peasant and you cried, 'Rin, rin,' and I had nce mind thought of the book.'

'We man get it back to the loon some gait or other, ye had better take it yourself, I think, wi' peep o' light, up to Rin, and Alwood's. I waitna for a hundred pounds it was fund in our hands.'

Steenie undertook to do as he was directed.

'A bonny night ye hae made o', Mr. Steenie,' said Jenny Rintchour, who, impatient of remaining so long unnoticed, now presented herself to the young fisherman. 'A bonny night ye hae made o', tramping about wi' gaberlunzies, and getting your- self in a state o' anger outside a bed like your father, honest man.'

This attack called forth a suitable response of rustic raillery from the young fisherman. An attack was now commenced upon the ear-cakes and smoked fish, and sustained with great perseverance by assistance of a bicker or two of twopenny ale and a bottle of gin. The mendicant then retired to the straw of an out-house adjoining,—the children had one by one crept into their nests,—the old grand-mother was deposited in her flock-bed,—Steenie, notwithstanding his preceding fatigue, had the gallantry to accompany them to her own home, and at what hour he returned the story saith not,—and the matron of the family, having laid the gathering-coal upon the fire, and put things in some sort of order, retired to rest the last of the family.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Many great ones
Would part with half their states, to have the plan
And credit to be in the first seat—Beggars' Bank.

Old Edie was stirring with the lark, and his first inquiry was after Steenie and the pocket-book. The young fisherman had been under the necessity of running far ahead before daybreak to lay the selvage of the tide, but he had promised, that, immediately on his return, the pocket-book, with all its contents, carefully wrapped up in a piece of sail-cloth, should be delivered by him to Rin, and Alwood, for Dousterswivel, the owner.

The matron had prepared the morning meal for the family, and, shouldering her basket of fish, returned home. They had been idling round the door, for the day was fair and sunny. The ancient grandame, again seated on her wicker-chair by the fire, had resumed her eternal surveillance of the children, and scrutinising of the mother, which had preceded the dispersion of the family. Edie had arranged his various bags, and was bound for the remoter parts of the sea, but, first advanced with due courtesy to take his leave of the ancient crane.

Gude day to ye, cummer, and mony ane o' them. I will be back about the fore-end o' har, and I trust to find ye baith hail and fare.'

'Pray that ye may find me in my quiet grave,' said the old woman, in a hollow and sepulchral voice, but without the agitation of a single feature. 'Ye're auld, cummer, and see am I myself; but we maun abide His will—'we'll no be forgotten in His good time.'

'Nor our deeds neither,' said the crone; 'what's done in the body maun be answered in the spirit.'

'I wot that's true; and I may weel tak the tale hame to myself, that has led a misrule and roving life. But ye were a fancy woman. We derek ye were a fraile but ye canna have see muckle to bow ye down.'

'Less than I might have had—but mair, O far mair than wad sink the stoutest brig e'er sailed ou're harbor! A wid wife, somebody say ye trysteen—at least it seen be in my mind—but auld folk ha' weak fancies—did not somebody say that Josceline, Countess of Gennelawn, was departed.'

'They said the truth whatever said it,' answered Edie: 'she was buried yeestreen by torch-light at St. Ruth's, and I like a fule, get a gliff wi' se' the lights and the riders.'

'It was their fashion since the days of the Great Earl that was killed at Harlaw—They did it to show scorn that they should die and be buried like other mortals—Bless the hoose! the howm wi' wait for the husband, nor the sister for the brother—but is she o'en cad to the lang account?'

'As sure as,' answered Edie, 'as we maun it abide it.'

'When I'll unslave my mind, come o' what will.'

This she spoke with more acrality than usually attended her expressions, and accompanied her word with an attitude of the hand, as if throwing some imprecation on her. She then raised up her form, once all, and still retaining the appearance of having been so, though bent with age and rheumatism, and stood before the beggar like a mummy animated by some wandering and watered air of apathy. Her light blue eyes wandered to and fro, as if she occasionally forgot and again remembered the purpose for which her long and withered hand was searching among the persons present, as sent to her by the faded pocket-book. At length, she pulled out a small chip-box, and opening it, took out a handsome ring, in which was set a braid of hair, composed of two different classes of the human hair, twisted together, encircled with brilliants of considerable value.

'Gudeman,' she said to Ochiltree, 'as ye was her deserter, now ye maun gae and send to the house of Glenellan, and ask for the Earl.'

'The Earl of Glenellan, cummer! oh, ye wins an any o' the gentles o' the country, and what like-hood is in the matter that ye want the see the like o' an auld gablerlunzie?'

'Gang your ways and try—and tell him that Es- speth o' the Craigburnfoot—he'll mind me best by that name—will get him or she he'll get her lang pilgrimage, and that she sends him that ring in token o' the business she was speak o'.'

Ochiltree looked on the ring with some admiration of its apparent value, and then carefully replacing it in the box, and wrote down a short and a neglected handkerchief, he deposited the token in his bosom.

'Well, gudewife,' he said, 'I see your biddings, or it's no be my fault.—But surely there was never a braw gentleman for this sort of business as an auld fish-wife, and through the hands of a gaberlunzie beggar.'

With this reflection, Edie took up his pike-staff, put on his broad-brimmed bonnet, and set forth upon his pilgrimage. The old woman remained for some time standing in a fixed posture, her eyes directed to the door through which her ambassador had departed. Then, as the rest of the family had conversation had occasioned, gradually left her features—she sunk down upon her accustomed seat, and was heard to make mechanical labour of the distaff and spindle, with her wonted air of apathy.

Edie Ochiltree meanwhile advanced on his journey. The distance to Glenellan was ten miles, a march which the old soldier accomplished in about two hours. With the curiosity before him to his rude and animated character, he tortured himself the whole way to consider what could be the mean reversion of this mysterious errand with which he was intrusted, and concluded that no connection existed between the illustrious and powerful Earl of Glenellan could have with the crimes or/penitence of an old doting woman, whose rank in life did not greatly exceed that of her messenger. He endeavoured to call to memory all that he had ever known or heard of the Glenellan family, yet, having done so, remained altogether unable to form a conjecture on the subject. He knew that the whole extensive estate of this ancient and powerful family had descended to the Countess lately deceased, who inherited, in a most remarkable degree, its fierce, and unbinding character, which had distinguish'd the house of Glenellan from the first figure in Scottish annals. Like the rest of her ancestors, she adhered zealously to the Roman Catholic faith, and was married to an English gentleman who, of the name of M'Clane, who did not survive their union two years. To Countess was, therefore, left an early widow, with the uncontrolled management of the large estates of Glenallan, and in 1755, Lord Geraldine, who was to succeed to the title and fortune of Glenallan, was totally dependent on his mother during her life. The second, when he came of age, assumed the name of the late Earl of Geraldine, by act of the House of Lords, 1755, and took possession of his estate, according to the provisions of the Countess's marriage-settlement. After this period, he chiefly resided in England, and paid very few visits to his native county; and these at length were altogether dispensed with, in consequence of his becoming a convert to the reformed religion.

But even before this mortal offence was given to its mistress, his residence at Glenallan offered few inducements to a gay young man like Edward Geraldine Neville, though its gloom and seclusion seemed to suit the retired and melancholy habits of his elder brother. Lord Geraldine, in the outset of life, had been a young man of accomplishment and hopes. The world knew him upon his travels entertained the highest expectations of his future career. But such fair dawns are often strangely overcast. The young nobleman returned to Scotland, and after living for some months at his mother's seat, Glenallan-house, he seemed to have adopted all the vices of that station, and melancholy of her character. Excluded from politics by the incapacities attached to those of his religion, and from all lighter avocations by choice, Lord Geraldine led a life little different from that of his brother. His ordinary society was composed of the clergy of his communion, who occasionally visited his mansion; and very rarely, upon stated occasions of high festival, one or two families who still professed the Catholic religion were formally entertained at Glenallan-house. But this was all—their heretic neighbours knew nothing of the family whatever; and even the Catholics saw little of the sumptuous entertainments and solemn parade which was exhibited on those formal occasions, from which all returned without knowing whether morning or evening at the sterner and stately demeanour of the Countess, or the deep and gloomy dejection which never ceased for a moment to cloud the features of her son. The estate had put him in possession of his fortune and title, and the neighbourhood had already begun to conjecture whether gayety would revive with independence, when those who had some occasional acquaintance with the interior of the family spread abroad a report, that the Earl's constitution was undermined by religious austerities, and that, in all probability, he would soon follow his mother to the grave. The report was confirmed by the records of the age, as his brother had died of a lingering complaint, which, in the latter years of his life, had affected at once his frame and his spirits; so that heralds and genealogists, who recorded his title, discover the heir of this ill-fated family, and lawyers were talking, with gloomy anticipation, of the probability of a great Glenallan cause.

As Edie Ochiltrie approached the front of Glenallan-house, an ancient building of great extent, the most modern part of which had been designed by the celebrated Inigo Jones, he began to consider in what manner he would be most likely to gain access for delivery of his message; and, after much consideration, resolved to send the token to the Earl by one of the domestics. With this purpose he stopped at the lodge, and the domestics of meeting up the ring in a sealed packet like a petition, addressed, 'Fort his hounor the Vert of Glenallan—These. But being aware that missives delivered at the doors of great houses by strangers as himself, do not always make their way according to address, Edie determined, like an old soldier, to reconnoitre the ground before he made his final step. He knocked at the door, and was informed that the house was covered, by the number of poor ranked before it, some of them being indigent persons in the vicinity, and others itinerants of his own beggaring profession; and that it would be more likely to be a general dole or distribution of charity.

'A good turn,' said Edie to himself, 'never goes unrewarded—I'll maybe get a good samwone that I was had missed, but for trotting on this auld wife's errand.' Accordingly, he ranked up with the rest of this ragged regiment, assuming a station as near the front as possible,—a distinction due, as he conceived, to his blue uniform, and his valiant services, for years and experience; but he soon found there was another principle of precedence in this assembly to which he had not adhered.

'Are ye no a friend, that ye press forward so bauldy? I'm thinking no, for there's nae Catholics wear that badge.'

'Na, na, I am no a Roman,' said Edie.

'Then stow it, and awa to the double folk, or single folk, that's the Episcopals or Presbyterians yonder—it's a shame to see a heretic has sic a lang white beard, that would do credit to a hermit.'

Ochiltrie, thus rejected from the society of the Catholic mendicants, or those who called themselves such, went to station himself with the paupers of the communion of the church of England, to whom the noble donor allotted a double portion of his charity. But never was a poor occasional confraternity more roughly rejected by a High-church congregation, even when that matter was furiously agitated in the day. 'See to him wi' his badge!' they said; 'he hears aye the king's Presbyterian chaplains souch out a sermon on the morning of every birth-day, and now he would press to the kirk!—An, the Episcopal church! Na, na! We'll take care o' that.'

Edie, thus rejected by Rome and prelacy, was fain to shelter himself from the laughter of his brethren among the thin group of Presbyterians, who had never disdained to disguise their religious opinions for the sake of an augmented dole, or perhaps knew they could not attempt the imposition with a certainty of doing the common folk an injury.

The same degree of precedence was observed in the mode of distributing the charity, which consisted in bread, butter, and a piece of money, to each individual of all the three classes. The almoner, an ecclesiastic of grave appearance and demeanour, superintended in person the accommodation of the Catholic mendicants, asking a question or two of each as he delivered the charity, and recommending to them prayers the soul of Joscelind, late Countess of Glenallan, mother of their benefactor. The porter, distinguished by his long staff headed with silver, and by the black gown tufted with lace of the same colour, which he had assumed upon the general mourning in the family, overlooked the distribution of the dole among the paupers. The less favoured kirk-folk were committed to the charge of an aged domestic.

As this last discussed some disputed point with the porter, his glance fell upon the square button mentioned, and then his features, struck Ochiltrie, and awakened recollections of former times. The rest of the assembly were now retiring, when the porter, again approaching the place where Edie still lingered, said, in a strong Aberdeen accent, 'Fat is the auld feel-body deeing that he canna gang awa, now that he's gotten baith meat and ailer.'

'Francie Macraw,' answered Edie Ochiltrie, 'd'ye no mind Fonteyn, and 'Keep thegither, front and rear!'

'Ochon, ochon!' cried Francie, with a true north-country yell of recognition, 'naebody could ha' said that word but my auld front-rank man, Edie Ochiltrie! But I'm sorry to see ye in sic a poor state, man.'

'No sae ill aff as ye may think, Francie. But I'm laith to leave this place without a crack wi' you, and I kenna when I may see you again, for your folk are as weel as the Jeninses, and dinna make me laith to leave ye, auld man, and that's a reason that I has never been here before.'

'Fusht, fusht,' said Francie, 'let that flies wide, i' the wa'-when the dirt's dry it will rub out—and come you awa wi' me, and I'll see ye somewhat better than ye look o' th' face o' man, man.'

Having then spoke a confidential word with the porter, (probably to request his continuance) and having waited until the almoner had returned to the house, left the doors wide open and walked off. Francis Macraw introduced his old comrade into the court of Glenallan-house, the gloomy gateway of which was surmounted by a huge scutch-pin, in which the herald and heraldic symbols of the Marquis of Huntly were fixed, and up a long flight of stairs, to the edifice of human pride and of human nothingness; the Countess's hereditary coat-of-arms, with all its numerous quarterings, disposed in a lozenge, and surmounted by the badge of her paternal and maternal ancestry, intermingled with seys, hourglasses, skulls, and other symbols of that mortality which levels all distinctions. Concluding his friend as he was about to leave the hall, he offered to take care of the armoury. Macraw led the way through a side-door to a small apartment near the servants' hall, which, in virtue of his personal attendance upon the Earl of Glenallan, he was entitled to call his own. To produce cold meat of various kinds, strong beer, and even a glass of spirits, was no difficulty to a person of Francis's importance, who had not lost, in his sense of conscious dignity, the keen northern prudence which recommended a good understanding with the Butler. Our mendicant envoy drank ale, and talked over old stories with his comrade, until no other topic of conversation was left, and then turned to the theme of his embassy, which had for some time escaped his memory.

"He had a petition to present to the Earl," he said, "and he judged it prudent to say nothing of the ring, not knowing as he afterwards observed, how far the manners of a single soldier might have been corrupted by service in a great house." Francis Macraw then led the way to the stables and said, "The Earl will look at your petition—but I can give the almoner the list."

"But it relates to some secret, that maybe your lordship will ask before me, I think it is a very reason that the almoner will be for seeing it the first and foremost.

"But I have come this way on purpose to deliver it, Francis, and I really mean to give me a pinch.

"Never speak that if I discontent you," answered Francis, "for about to give you a sentence about this kind, but Francis imposed silence on him by signs, and opening a door at the end of the long picture-gallery ushered him into a small antechamber hung with black. Here then found the almoner a round table, and a door opposite that by which they entered, in the attitude of one who listens with attention, but is at the same time afraid of being detected in the act.

The old domestic and churchman started when they perceived each other. But the almoner first recovered his recollection, and, advancing towards Macraw, said under his breath, but with an authoritative tone, "How dare you approach the Earl's apartment without knocking? and who is this stranger, or what has he to do here?—Retire to the gallery and wait for me there."

"It's impossible, just now to attend your reverences," answered Macraw, raising his voice so as to be heard in the next room, being conscious that the priest would not more readily utter without hearing his patron's name. "The Earl's bell has rung again." He had scarce uttered the words, when it was rung again with greater violence than before; and the ecclesiastic, perceiving further procrastination impossible, lifted his finger at Macraw with a menacing attitude, as he left the apartment.

"I'll tell ye sae," said the Aberdeen man in a whistle to Edie, and then proceeded to open the door near which they had observed the chaplain stationed.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

This ring—

The ancient forms of mourning were observed in Glenallan-house, notwithstanding the obsequies with which they were followed, and the Countess was disposed to refuse to the dead the usual tribute of lamentation. It was remarked, that when she received the formal letter announcing the death of her second, and as was expected with her favour for the Countess did not shake, nor her eyelid twinkle, any more than upon perusal of a letter of ordinary business; but merely knowing that the signature of mortal sorrow, which her pride condemned might not have some effect in hastening her ov death. It was at least generally supposed, that the apostolic stroke, which so soon afterwards terminated the life of the relation, was as a mark of outraged Nature for the restraint to which her feelings had been subjected. But although Lady Glenallan forebore the usual external signs of grief, and appeared to act as if she was entirely at home among others her own and that of the Earl, to be hung with the exterior trappings of wo.

The Earl of Glenallan was therefore seated in an atmosphere of solemn yet unbroken repose, the waves of dusky folds along its lofty walls. A screen, also covered with black baize, placed towards the high and narrow window, intercepted much of the broken light, so that the painted and gilded figure that represented, with such skill as the fourteenth century possessed, the life and sorrows of the prophet Jeremiah. The table at which the Earl was seated was lighted with two lamps wrought in silver, shedding that unpleasant and doubtful light which arises from the mingling of artificial lustre with that of general daylight. The same table displayed a silver crucifix, and one or two clasped parchment books. A large picture, exquisitely painted by Spagnoletto, represented the martyrdom of St. Stephen, and was the only ornament of the apartment.

The visitor of this Elijah-like unshorn chamber was a man not past the prime of life, yet so broken down with disease and mental misery, so gaunt and ghastly, that he appeared but a wreck of mankind. He was covered with the white cloak, the bare feet, the creased stature, and undaunted presence and bearing of the old mendicant, indicated patience and content in the extremity of age, and in the lowest condition to which human nature is capable at any period of life. He entered, and beckoned to the visitor, the exertion seemed almost to overpower his enfeebled frame. As they met in the midst of the apartment, the contrast they exhibited was complete—white cloaked, with white face, and wasted eye, the visitor, in his full stature, and in his unwearied vigour, a sight for every eye. When he was satisfied with this security against being overheard, Lord Glenallan came close up to the mendicant, and, in the most friendly manner, addressed himself to some person of a religious order in discourse, and said, in a hasty yet faltering tone, "In the name of all our religion holds most holy, tell me, reverend father, what might you wish to express as a communication, opened by a token connected with such horrible recollections?"

The old man, appalled by a manner so different from what he had expected from the proud and powerful nobleman, was at a loss how to answer, and in what manner to undeceive him—"Tell me," continued the Earl, in a tone of increasing triumph and agony—"tell me, by all that is dear to you, that all that has been heard by me, I am not made false by your persuasion, nor a clergyman, but, with all reverence, only puri Edict Oichlert, the king’s bedman and your honour’s."

It was evident that he was accompanied by a profound bow after his manner, and then drawing himself up erect, raised his arm on his staff threw back his long white hair, and fixed his eyes upon the Earl, as he waited for an answer.

"And you,” said he, "who are you then?” said Lord Glenallan, after a pause of surprise, "you are not then a Catholic priest?”

"God forbid!" said Edie, forgetting in his confusion to whom he was speaking—"I am only the king’s bedman and your honour’s, as I said before."

The Earl turned hastily away, paced the room twice or thrice, as if to recover the effects of his surprise, and then, turning to the mendicant, he demanded, in a stern and commanding tone, what he meant by intruding himself on his privacy, and from whence he had got the ring which he had thought proper to send. The poor unhappy woman was less daunted at this mode of interrogation than he had been confused by the tone of confidence in which the Earl had opened their conversation. To the reiterated question from whom he had obtained the ring, he answered composedly, "From one who was better known to the Earl than to him."

"Better known to me, fellow," said Lord Glenallan; "what is your meaning? Explain yourself instantly, or you shall experience the consequence of breaking in upon the hour of family distress."

"It was said Elspeth Muckle-skeet that sent me here," said the mendicant, and then added, "You know her, if I ca’ed her Elspeth o’ the Craigsburn-foot. She had that name when she lived on your honour’s land, that is, your honour’s worshipful mother’s that was then—Grace be with her!"

"Ay,” said the appalled nobleman, as his countenance sunk, and his chock assumed a hue yet more censurable; "that name is indeed written in the most horrid page of the tragic story—but what can she desire of me? Is she dead or living?"

"Living, my lord; and entreats to see your lordship before she dies, for she has something to communicate that hangs upon your very soul, and she says she cannot sit in peace until she sees you."

"Not until she sees me!—what can that mean?—but she is doating with age and infirmity—I tell thee, friend, I called at her cottage myself, not a week-morn from, since a report that she was in distress, and she did not even know my face or voice."

"If your lordship will permit it, says Edie, to whom the length of the consequence restored a part of his professional audacity and native talkativeness—"if your honour wad but permit me, I wad say, under the circumstances, to correcting the misconception which has arisen from Elspeth’s like of some of the ancient ruined strangues and castles that are seen among the hills. There are many parts of her mind that appear, as I may say, laid waste and plundered by the pack of the stiver, and the stronger, and the grander, because they are ranging just like to fragments among the ruins o’ the rest—She’s a woman’s life."

"She always was so," said the Earl, almost unconsciously echoing the observation of the mendicant—"she always was different from other women—likewise perhaps to her who is now no more, in her temper and turn of mind.—She wishes to see me, then?”

"Before she dies," said Edie, "she earnestly entreats that pleasure."

"It will be a pleasure to neither of us,” said the Earl sternly; "and she’s a woman. But I think, on the sea shore to the southwest of Fairport?"

"Just between Monkburns and Knockwinnock Castle, but no farther," says Edie. "Your worship’s honour will ken the laird and Sir Arthur, doubtless?"

"A stare, as if he did not comprehend the question, was Lord Glenallan’s answer. Edie saw his mind was for a mo’ than mused, and went upon a query which was so little germane to the matter.

"Are you a Catholic, old man?” demanded the Earl.

"No, my lord," said Oichlert stoutly; "for the remembrance, I have a sequel to the old story in his mind at the moment; "I thank Heaven I am a good Protestant."
CHAPTER XXIX.

For he was one in all their idle sport,
And, like a monarch, ruled their little court;
The bat, the wicket, were his labours all.

Crabb's Village.

FRANCIS MACRAW, agreeably to the commands of his master, attended the mendicant, in order to see him fairly out of the estate, without permitting him to have conversation, or intercourse, with any of the Earl's dependents or domestics. But, judiciously considering that the restriction did not extend to himself, who was the person entrusted with the convoy, he used every measure in his power to extort from Eddie the nature of his confidence. He secret interview with Lord Glenallan. But Eddie had been in his time accustomed to cross-examination, and easily evaded those of his quondam comrade. "The secrets of grit folk," said Ochiltree within himself, "are just like the wild beasts that are shut up in cages. Keep them hand and fast smacked up, and it's a very weel or better—but anes let them out, they will turn and rend you. I mind how ill Dugald Gunn came off for letting loose his tongue about the Major's leddy and Captain Bandelier."

Francis was, therefore, foiled in his assaults upon the fidelity of the mendicant, and, like an indifferent chaffinch, desirous of making use of any unperceived movement, more liable to the counter-checks of his opponent.

"Sae ye uphaud ye had nae particulars to say to my lord, ye may say true in the main, neighbour—" replied the beggar; "but maybe he's had some hard play in his younger days, Francis, and that while unseeties folk say."

"Troth, ye may say that—and since it's like ye'll ne'er come back to the estate, or, if ye do, that ye'll find me there, I see e'en tell you had a heart in his young time sae wreacked and rent, that it's a wonder it hasn't broken outright lang afore this day."

"Ay, say ye sae?" said Ochiltree; "that man has been about a woman, I reckon?"

"Troth, and ye lass guessed it," said Francis—"jesus a cuinin o his maids—Miss Eveline Nevall, as they said hae ca'd her—there was a sough in the country about it, but it was hushed up, as the gentry do—ye can see it's up there for twenty years—ay, it will be three and twenty."

"Ay, I was in America then," said the mendicant, "and no in the way to hear the country stories."

"There was little chlass about it, man," replied Macraw; "he liked this young leddy, and said hee married her, but his mother fand it out, and then the deil gied o'er Jack Webster. At last, the peer less clched herself o'er the scarr at the Creighburnfoot into the sea, and there was an end o't."

"An end o't wi' the purr leddy," said the mendicant, "for me I ruched me o' wi' the yerl."

"Nae end o't till his life makes an end," answered the Aberdeen.

"But what for did the said Countess forbid the marriage?" inquired the perspicacious Francis.

"Fat for!—she may be divins weel ken for fat herself, for she gird a bow to her bidding, right or wrong—but it was the young leddy was inclined to some o' the hereisies of the country—near by token, she was sib to him nearer than our Church's rule admits of—Sae the leddy was driven to the desperate act, and the yerl has never since held his head up high."

"Weel away!" replied Ochiltree; "it's e'en queer I ne'er heard this tale afore."

"It's e'en queer that ye hear it now, for dealing o' the same sort has spok o' hae the said Countess been living—Ed! man, Eddie, but she was a trimmer—it wad hae been a skely man to hae aquired wi' her!—But she's in her grave, and we may look in the future for a bit fan of the Countess."

But fare ye weel, Eddie, I maun be back to the evening service. An ye come to Inverurie maybe six months awa, dinna forget to ask after Francis Macraw."

What one kindly pressed, the other as firmly promised; and the friends having thus parted, with every testimony of mutual regard, the domestic of Lord Glenallan took his road back in the seat of his master, leaving Ochiltree to trace on ward his habitual pilgrimage.

It was a fine summer evening, but the world, that is, the little circle which was all in all to the individual by whom it was trodden, lay before Ochiltree, for the choosing of his night's quarters. When he had passed the less hospitable domains of Glenallan, he had in his option so many pleasant places of refuge for the evening, that he was nice and even fastidious in the choice. Alle Stiu's public was on the roadside about a mile before him; but there would be a parcel of young fellows there, and the refuges, the Saturday night, and that was a bar to civil convassation. Other "gudemen and gudewives," as the farmers and their dames are termed in Skotsland, would be a success. But one was dead, and could not hear him; another toothless and could not make him hear; a third had a cross temper; and a fourth an ill-natured house-dog. At Monkbar's or Knockwinnock he was sure of a favourable and hospitable reception; but the bay too distant to be conveniently reached that night.

"I dinna ken how it is," said the old man, "but I am nicht aboot my quarters this night than ever I was before. Latterly, I think, having seemed the braws wanner, and finding out ane may be happier without them, has made me proud o' my sin lot—but I wuss it bode me guide, for pride goeth before the fall. Life's a layin' in wa' be a pleasant abode than Glenallan-house, wi' a' the pictures and black velvet, and silver bonny-wawlies belonging to it—So I'll een sette at an' keep my ain Smoky.

As the old man descended the hill above the little hamlet to which he was bending his course, the setting sun had relieved its inmates from their labour, and the young men availing themselves of the fine evening, were engaged in the sport of long-bowls on a patch of common, while the women and elders looked on. The shout, the laugh, the exclamations of the that as losers, came in blended chorus up the path which Ochiltree was descending, and awakened in his recollection the days when he himself had been a keen competitor, and frequently victor, in games of strength, skill, and daring. As the recollection fail to excite a sigh, even when the evening of life is cheered by brighter prospects than those of our poor mendicant. At that time of day, was his natural reflect, and if not himself, at least the old sun, stopped, palmering body that was coming down the edge of Kenblythmount, as one o' those stalwart young chieftains doo' enow about said Edie Ochiltree.

He had been forgetful, and, by finding that more importance was attached to his arrival than his modesty had anticipated. A disputed cast had occurred between the bands of players, and as the gauger found that the former had the right, the matter might be said to be taken up by the higher powers. The Miller and Smith, also, had espoused different sides, and, considering the vivacity of two such disputants, there was reason to doubt whether the strife might be amicably terminated. But the first person who caught a sight of the mendicant exclaimed, "Ah! here comes auld Edie, that knows the rules o' country games better than any man that ever draw a bawl, or threw an axe-tree, or put a stane either—it's nae quarrelling, calmer will still stand, auld Edie's judgment.

Edie was accordingly well entertained as umpire, with a general shout of gratulation. With all the modesty of a bishop to whom the mitre is proper, a speaker called to the chair, and the old man declined the high trust, pointing to the responsibility with which it was proposed to invest him, and, in requital for his self-denial and humility, had the pleasure of receiving the reiterated assurances of young, old, and middle-aged, that he was the simplest and best qualified person for the office of arbiter "in the hall country-side."

Thus encouraged, he proceeded gravely to the execution of his duty, and, strictly forbidding all aggravating expressions on either side, he heard the smith and gauger on one side, the miller and schoolmaster on the other, as junior and senior counsellors. Edie, as a matter of justice, had made up his mind before the pleading began; like that of many a judge, who must, nevertheless, go through all the forms, and endure in its full extent, the eloquence and arguments and the justice and the law that has been said on both sides, and much of it said over oftener than once, our senior, being well and ripey advised, pronounced the moderate and healing judgment which alwa's the law in the villages and the borders of village sport, and the more eager were already stripping their jackets, and committing them, with their coloured handedkerchiefs, to the care of styers, gentry, and mistresses. But their mirth was singularly interrupted.

On the outside of the group of players began to arise sounds of a description very different from those of sport—that sort of suppressed sigh and exclamation, with which the first sounds received by the hearers, began to be heard indistudes of human affairs, which had so suddenly consigned one of their comrades to the grave, and placed their water of the river in some danger of being hanged. The character of Doubtswivel being pretty generally known, which was in his case equivalent to being pretty generally detested, there were many sources of information to lead to an accusation of being malice. But all agreed, that, if Edie Ochiltree behaved in all events to suffer upon this occasion, it was a great pity he had not better merited his fate by killing Doubtswivel outright.

Old Play.

"Axn the poor young fellow, Steenie Muckle-backit, is to be buried this morning," said our old friend the Antiquary, as he exchanged his gaited night-gown for an old-fashioned black coat in lieu of the dresses of dissent which he ordinarily wore, and, I presume, it is expected that I should attend the funeral?"

"Oh, ay," answered the faithful Caxon, officiously bowing and not sparing his patron's habit: "the body, God help us, was see broken against the rocks that they're lain to burn the burial.
The sea's a kittle cast, as I tell my daughter, puir ting, when I was a poor girl, the seas—get up the triumphs,—the sea, says I, Jenny, is as uncertain a calling—"

"As the calling of an old periwigmaker, that's robbed of his business by crops and the powder-tax.
Caxon, thy topics of consolation are as ill chosen as they are foreign to the present purpose. Quid mihi cum fiemina? What have I to do with thy woman-kind, who have enough and to spare of mine own?— I pray you again, am I expected by those poor people to attend the funeral of their son?"

"Ou, doubtless, your honour is expected," answered Caxon; "weel I wot ye are expected. Ye ken in this country like gentleman is wusied to be seen civil as to see the corpse aff his grounds—Ye needn gang higher than the long-head—it's no expected your honour shall leave the land—it's just a Kelso convoy, and a Kelso convoy's as good as any other.
A Kelso convoy!" echoed the inquisitive Antiquary; "and why a Kelso convoy more than any other?"

"Dear sir," answered Caxon, "how should I ken? it's just a by-word."

"Caxon," answered Oldmuck, "thou art a mere periwigmaker—Had I asked Ochiltree the question, he would have had a leg ready made to my hand."

"My business," replied Caxon, with more animation than he commonly displayed, "is with the outside of your honour's head, as ye are accustomed to say."

"True, Caxon, true; and it is no reproach to a hatter that he is not an upholder."

He then took out his memorandum-book and wrote down: "Kelso convoy—said to be a step and a half over the threshold. Authority—Caxon. Quare—Where derived? Mem. To write to Dr. Graysteel upon the subject."

Having made this entry, he resumed: "And truly, as to this custom of the landlord attending the body of the peasant, I approve it, Caxon. It comes from uncertain times upon the probability of the circulation of mutual aid and dependence between the lord and cultivator of the soil. And herein I must say, the feudal system (as also in its cuttivity towards woman-kind in which it existed)—herein I say, the feudal usages mitigated and softened the sternness of classical times. No man, Caxon, ever heard of Spartan attending the funeral of a Helot—yet I dare be sworn the children of the Girdell—ye have heard of his Caxon?"
cottage, will probably acquit poor Juno of that aggravation of guilt which the lawyers call a dastäumis gratia, and which makes the distinction between burglary and a high private taking that is usually made by the law."

"I am truly sorry, sir," said Hector, "that Juno has committed so much disorder; but Jack Murhead, the breaker, was never able to bring her under command. She travels more than any bitch I ever knew, but—"

"Then, Hector, I wish the bitch would travel half as much of my grounds."

"We will try to restrain her to-morrow, or to-day, but I would not willingly part from my mother's brother in unkindness about a palpity pickin'."

"O, brother, brother!" ejaculated Miss M'Intyre, in utter amazement at the reports of a temperature at Juno's place which were so high.

"Why, why would you have me say it?" continued Hector; "it was just such a thing as they use in Egypt to cool wines, or cherbet, or water—I brought home a pair of them—I might have brought home twenty!"

"What!" said Oldbuck, "shaped such as that your dog threw down?"

"Yes, sir, such a sort of a carthen jar as that which was on the bedside. They are in my lodgings at Fairport; we brought a parcel of them to cool our drinks yesterday and the past days. It runs well—if I could think that they would in any degree repay your loss, or rather that they could afford you pleasure, I am sure I should be much honoured by your sanctioning them."

"And my dear boy, I should be highly gratified by possessing them. To trace the connexion of nations by their usages, and the similarity of the implements which they employ, has been long my favourite study. Everything that can illustrate such connexions is most valuable to me."

"Well, sir, I shall be much gratified by your acceptance of them, and a few trinkets of the same kind. And now, am I to hope you have forgiven me?"

"O, my dear boy, you are only thoughtless and foolish."

"But Juno—she is only thoughtless too, I assure you—the breaker tells me she has no vice or stubborness."

"Well, I grant Juno also a free pardon—conditioned, that you will imitate her in avoiding vice and stubborness, and that henceforward she banish herself forth of Monkbars parlour; you are the soldier. I should have been very sorry and ashamed to propose to you any thing in the way of expiation of my own sins, or of those of my follower, that I thought worth your acceptance, but I will allow you the orphan-nephew, to whom you have been a father, to offer you a trifle, which I have been assured is really curious, and which only the cross accident of my woe has prevented my delivering to you before. I got it from a French Savant, to whom I rendered some service after the Alexandria affair."

The captain put a small ring-case into the Antiquary's hands, which, when opened, was found to contain an antique ring of massive gold, with a cameo, most beautifully executed, bearing a head of Cleopatra. The Antiquary broke forth into unreserved admiration, and shook his nephew cautiously by the hand, thanked him a hundred times, and showed the ring to his sister and niece, the latter of whom had the tact to give it sufficient admiration; but Miss M'Intyre (although she had the same affection for her nephew) had not address enough to follow the lead.

"It's a bonny thing," she said, "Monkbarns, and, I dare say, a bottle—" but it's out o' my way—ye ken I am nae judge o' sic matters."

"There spoke all Fairport in one voice!" exclaimed Oldbuck; "it is the very spirit of the borough has imbued all the town with the same passion during these two days, that the wind has stuck, like a remora, in the north-east—and its prejudices fly farther than its vappours. Believe me, my dear Hector, we are all the same to-day. My word of honour, the Antiquary, and myself, are playing this inestimable gem in the eyes of each one I met, no human creature, from the provost to the town-crier, would stop to ask me its history. But if I carried a bale of linen cloth under my arm, I could not prevent the horror market end I should be overwhelmed with queries about its precise texture and price. O, one might parody their brutal ignorance in the words of Gray:"

\[ we love and we hate the weed, \\
\[ The windingshit of wit and sense; \\ \[ Dull garment of defensive proof; \\
\[ O curse, that doth not vex the peace.\]

The most remarkable proof of this peace-offering being quite acceptable, was that while the Antiquary was in full declamation, Juno, who held him in awe, according to the remarkable instinct by which dogs instantly discover those who like or dislike them, peeped several times into the room, and encountering nothing very forbidding in his aspect, had at length presumed to introduce her full person, and finally, becoming bold by impunity, she actually ate up Mr. Oldbuck's toast, as, looking first at one, then at another of his audience, he repeated with self-complacency:

"You remember the passage in the Fatal Sisters, which, by the way, is not so fine as in the original—\[ But, boy—day—broad—dry—O—I see which way—ah, thou type of womankind, no wonder they take offence at thy generic appellation!—\[ (So saying, he shook his fist at Juno, who scoured out of the parlour.)—"

"And this Juno, according to Homer, could not rule Juno in heaven, and as Jack Murhead, according to Hector M'Intyre, has been equally unsuccessful on earth, I suppose she must have her own way." And this inspired the brother and sister justly accounted a full panegyric for Juno's offences, and sate down well pleased to the morning meal.

When breakfast was over, the Antiquary proposed to his nephew to go down with him to attend the funeral. The soldier pleaded the want of a morning habit.

"O that does not signify—your presence is all that is requisite. I assure you, you will see something that will entertain—no, that's an improper phrase—but that will interest you, from the resemblances which I will point out between popular customs on such occasions and those of the ancients."

Heaven forgive me! I thought M'Intyre; I shall certainly misbelieve, and lose all the credit we have so lately and successfully gained.

When they set out, schooled as he was by the warning and entreaties of his sister, the soldier made his resolution strong to give no offence by reviving in her mind the ideas which were fast in his breast when his nephew had hurried him in a discussion upon the "age of hills," to remark that a large sea-gull, which flitted around them, had come twice within shot. This error being acknowledged and pardoned, Oldbuck resumed his dignification.

"These are circumstances you ought to attend to and be familiar with, my dear Hector; for, in the strange contingencies of the present war which agitates every corner of Europe, there is no knowing where you may be called upon to serve. If in Norway, for example, or Denmark, or any part of the ancient Scania, or Scandinavia, as we denominate it, we could be more convenient than to have at your finger's ends the history and antiquities of that ancient country, the officium gentium, the mother of modern Europe, the nursery of three hundred empires, the birthplace of all the learned words of the world, then were you in a position to fulfill your profession to the life and to the letter."

How animating, for example, at the conclusion of an investment, to find all the ancient works, and the ancient memorials of a Runic monument, and discover that you had pitched your tent beside the tomb of a hero!"

"I am afraid, sir, our messes would be better supplied if it chanced to be in the neighbourhood of a good poultry-yard."

\[ 280 \]
THE ANTIQUARY.

"Alas, thy: you should say so!—No wonder the days of Cressy and Agincourt are no more, when link or forte, if the time has died away in the breasts of the British soldier."

"By no means, sir—by no manner of means. I dare say that Edward and Henry, and the rest of them, are as much of the other dinner, however, before they thought of examining an old tombstone. But I assure you, we are by no means insensible to the memory of our fathers' fame; I used often of an evening, when out of gear, to sing my songs out of Ossian about the battles of Fingal and Lammon Mor, and Magnús and the spirit of Muirnacht."

"And did you believe," asked the aroused Antiquary, "did you believe, sir, that Macpherson's son is to be really ancient, you simple boy?"

"Believe it, sir?—how could I but believe it, when I have heard the songs sung from my infancy?"

"But not the same as Macpherson's English Ossian—you're not absurd enough to say that, I hope!"

said the Antiquary, his brow darkening with wrath. But Hector stouter abode the storm; like many a sturdy Celt, he imagined the honour of his country and native language connected with the authenticity of these popular poems, and would have fought knock-dead, or forfeited life and land, rather than have given up a single line. He therefore solemnly maintained, that Rovry M'Alpine could repeat the whole book from one end to another; and it was only upon cross-examination that he explained an assertion so general, so ancient, as he was allowed, whisky enough, he could repeat as long as any body would hear him to.

"Ay, ay," said the Antiquary; and that, I suppose, was not very long.

"Why, we had our duty, sir, to attend to, and could not sit listening all night to a piper."

But do you recollect, now," said Oldbuck, sitting his horse, and addressing himself to the young poet, "and without opening them, which was his custom when contradicted. Do you recollect, now, any of these verses you thought so beautiful and interesting—a capital judge, no doubt, of such things?"

"I don't pretend to much skill, uncle; but it's not very reasonable to be angry with me for admiring the antiquities of my own country more than those of the Harolds, Harfangs, and Hacos you are so fond of."

"Why, these, sir,—these mighty and unconquered Goths—were your ancestors! The bare-breasted Celts, scurvy, subduéd, and subdued, and subdued only to exist, like the fearful people, in the crevices of the rocks, were but their Maccibers and Sersis!"

Hector now grew red in his turn. "Sir," he replied, "I don't understand the meaning of Mánca, and Sersis, but I conceive such names are very improperly applied to Scotch Highlanders. No man but my mother's brother dared to have such mad language in my presence; and I pray you will observe, that I consider it as neither horrible, handsone, kind, nor generous usage towards your guest and your kinsman. My ancestors, Mr. Oldbuck."

"Were great and gallant chiefs, I dare say, Hector; and really I did not mean to give you such immense offense in treating a point of remote antiquity, a subject on which I always am myself cool, deliberate, and unprejudiced. But you are as hot and hasty, as if you were Hector and Achilles, and Agamemnon to boot!"

No more about it, lad; I meant them no affront—nothing.

"I am glad of it, sir; for the house of M'Intyre—"

"Peace be with them all, every man of them," said Oldbuck, "let us return to our subject. Do you recollect, I say, any of those poems which afforded you such amusement?"

"Very hard this, thought M'Intyre, that he will speak of me and all of everything which is ancient, accepting my family as the order of the intellectuals, be added aloud, "Yes, sir, I think I do remember some lines; but you do not understand the Gaelic language."

"And will readily excuse hearing it. But you can give me some idea of the sense in our vernacular idiom?"

"I shall prove a wretched interpreter," said M'Intyre, running up the original, well garnished with gaege, aughis, and aughis, and similar gutturals, and then coughing and hawking as if the translation stuck in his throat. At length, having promised that the poem was a dialogue between the poet Ossian, or Ossian, and Patrick, the tutelar Saint of Ireland, and that it was difficult, if not impossible, to render the exquisite felicity of the first two or three lines, he said the absolutely last of this purpose:

"Patrick the psalm-singer, since you will not listen to one of my stories, though you never heard it before, I am sorry to tell you, you are little better than an ass—"

"Good! good!" exclaimed the Antiquary; "let go on. Why, this is, after all, the most admirable foiling—I dare say the poet was very right. What says the Saint?"

"He replies in character," said M'Intyre, "let you should hear M'Alpine sing the original. The speeches of Ossian come in upon a strong deep bass—those of Patrick are upon a tenor key."

"I like M'Alpine's drone and small pipes, I suppose," said Oldbuck. "Well? Pray, go on."

"Well, then, Patrick replies to Ossian:"

"Upon my word, son of Fingal, while I am warbing the psalms, the clamon of ye worde women's tales Disturb my devotions exercises."

"Excellent!—why, this is better and better. I hope Saint Patrick sung better than Blattergowl's precen- tor, or it do bawdy, chang-choise among the poet and psalmist. But what I admire is the courtesy of these two eminent persons towards each other. It is a pity there should not be a word of this in Macpherson's translation."

"If you are sure of that," said M'Intyre, gravely, "he must have taken very unwarrantable liberties with his original."

"It will go near to be thought so shortly—but pray proceed."

Then, said M'Intyre; "this is the answer of Ossian:"

"Dare you compare your psalms, Your son of—a.

Son of a what?" exclaimed Oldbuck. "It means, 'son of a youth,' said the young soldier, with some reluctance, 'son of a fellow-crook.

"Do you compare your psalms To the tales of the bare-arm'd Pennants."

"Are you sure you are translating that last epithet correctly?

"Quite sure, sir," answered Hector, doggedly. "Because I should have thought the nudity might have been quoted as existing in a different part of the body."

Disdaining to reply to this insinuation, Hector were heed in his recitation:

"I shall think it so great harm To touch your bald head from your shoulders—"

"But what is that youder?" exclaimed Hector himself. "One of the herd of Proteus," said the Antiquary— "snoozing asleep on the beach."

"Upon which M'Intyre, with the eagerness of a young sportsman, totally forgot both Ossian, Patrick, his uncle, and his wound, and exclaming, "I shall have her! I shall have her!" snatched the walking-stick out of the hand of the astonished Antiquary, and with some risk of throwing him down, and set off at full speed to get between the animal and the sea, to which element, having caught the alarm, she was rapidly attracted.

Not Sancho, when his master interrupted his account of the combats of Pentapolitan with the naked sword, to enquire in person of the charge of the rock of Ash, stood more confounded than Oldbuck at this sudden escarade of his nephew.
THE ANTIQUARY.

Was the devil in him," was his first exclamation, "to go to disturb the brute that was never thinking of him!" Then elevating his voice, "Hector—nephew—fool—let alone the Phoebe—let alone the Phoebe, Phoebe, I tell you, like funes. He minds me no more than a bit of a Ezra—Glod the Phoebe has the best of it! I am glad to see it," said he, in the bitterness of his heart, though really alarmed for his nephew's hard fate; "I am glad to see it, with all my heart and spirit."

In truth, the seal, finding her retreat intercepted by the light-footed soldier, confronted him manfully, and to the astonishment of the spectators, she knitted her brows, as is the fashion of the animal when incensed, and making use at once of her forepaws and her unwieldy strength, wreathed the weapon of her nephew's hand, overwrought him on the sand, and scuttled away into the sea without doing him any further injury. Captain M'Intyre, a good deal out of countenance at the issue of his exploit, just rose in time to receive the ironical congratulations of his uncle, upon a single combat, worthy to be commemorated by Osian himself, "since," said the Antiquary, "your magnanimous condescension to support your nephew's wing from the foe that was low—Glod, she wallowed away with all the grace of triumph, and has carried my stick off also, by way of apolia optima."

"Oh!" said Hector, "that is not all. His first and last words were to push a salmon; and as a salmon, there was a possibility of having a trial of skill with them, and that had he had one, of raising him in us. He also made this an apology for returning back to Monkbarns, and thus escaped the farther rancour of his uncle, as well as his lamentations for his walking-stick.

"I was," in the classic woods of Haworth, when I did not expect always to have a bachelor—I would not have given it for an ocean of seals—O Hector, Hector!—thy namesake was born to be the prey of Troy, and thou to be the plague of Monkbarns!"

CHAPTER XXXI.

Tell me not of it, friend—when the young weep, Their tears are like warm balsam—from our old eyes Sorrows falls down like half-dropping of the North, Chilling the furrows of our withered cheeks. Cold as our hopes, and harder as our feeling—Farewell, hard-hearted souls, you sink insensible, Hemp the fair plain, and blinds all before us.

The Antiquary, being now alone, hastened his pace, which had been retarded by these various discussions, and the rencontre which had closed them, and soon arrived before the half-dozen cottages at Monkbarns, which had, with the usual squalid and uncomfortable appearance, the melancholy attributes of the house of mourning. The boats were all drawn up on the beach; and, though the day was fine, and the season favourable, the chant, which is used by the fishermen when at sea, was silent, as well as the prattle of the children, and the shrill song of the mother, as she sits mending her mats by the door. A few of the neighbours, some in their antique and well-saved suits of black, others in their ordinary clothes, but all bearing an expression of mournful sympathy with distress so sudden and unexpected, stood gathered around the door of Mucklebackit's cottage, waiting till the "body was lifted." As the Laird of Monkbarns approached, they made way for him to enter, doffing their hats and bowing with the smile of melancholy courtesy, and he returned their salutes in the same manner.

In the inside of the cottage was a scene, which occasioned the Antiquary no surprise, that exquisitely feeling of nature that characterizes its enchanting productions.

The body was laid in its coffin within the wooden box of its coffin, and then the box was closed while alive. At a little distance stood the father, whose rugged weather-beaten countenance, shaded by his arched hair, had faced many a stormy night and night-like day. He was apparently revolving his loss in his mind with that strong feeling of painful grief, peculiar to harsh and rough characters, which almost breaks forth into hatred against the world, and all that rests in it, after so steadfastly objective a trial, in which the old man had made the most desperate efforts to save his son, and had only been withheld by main force from renewing them at a moment when, without the possibility of assisting the sufferer, he must himself have perished. All this was boiling in his recollection. His glance was directed sidelong towards the coffin, as so often an object on which he could not steadfastly gaze, and from which he could not withdraw his eyes. His answers to the necessary questions which were occasionally put to him, were brief, harsh, and almost fierce. His fervour had not yet ceased to soften him a word, either of sympathy or consolation. His masculine wife, virago as she was, and absolute mistress of the family, as she justly boasted herself, on all ordinary occasions, was, by this great loss, terrified into silence and submission, and compelled to hide from her husband's observation the bursts of her female sorrow. As he had rejected food ever since the discovery of his son's death, and the approach him, she had that morning, with affectionate artifice, employed the youngest and favourite child to present her husband with some nourishment. She dried her tears, and, resuming her place at his side, said--"You'll be a bra' follow, an ye be spared, Pater—but we'll never be the same again. He has sailed the cable wi' me since he was ten years old, and here wasna the like o' him drew a not betwixt his meat and Buchan-ness—They say folks maun submit—" which he had been silent from that moment until compelled to answer the necessary questions we have already noticed. Such was the disconsolate state of the father.

In another corner of the cottage, her face covered by her apron, which was flung over it, sat the mother, the nature of her grief sufficiently indicated, by the wringing of her hands, and the convulsive agitation of the bosom which the covering could not conceal. Two or three gosips, officiously whispering into her ear the common-place topic of resignation under irreparable misfortune, as they were necessarily, were endeavouring to stifle the grief which they could not console.

The sorrow of the children was mingled with wonder at the arrangements they had been witness to, and at the unusual display of wheaten bread and wine, which the poorest peasant, or fisher, offers to the guests on these mournful occasions; and thus their grief found a vent to the sight which they had already lost in admiration of the splendour of his funeral.

But the figure of the old grandmother was the most remarkable of the sorrowing group. Seated on her accustomed chair, with her usual air of apathy, and want of interest in what surrounded her, she seemed every now and then mechanically to resume the motion of twirling her spindle—then to look towards her bosom for the distaff, although both had been laid aside. She would then cast her eyes about as if surprised at missing the usual implements of her industry, and appear struck by the black colour of the gown in which they had dressed her, and embarrassed by the number of persons by whom she was surrounded—then, finally, she would raise her head with a glistly look, and fix her eyes upon the bed which contained the coffin of her grandson, as if she had had at once, and for the first time, acquired sense to comprehend her inexpressible calamity. These alternate feelings of embarrassment, wonder, and grief, seemed to excel each other, just as that exquisite feeling of nature that characterizes its enchanting productions.
a being in whom the light of existence was already obscured by the approaching shadows of death.

When Oldbuck entered this house of mourning, he was received by a general and silent inclination of the heads to the floor. On such occasions, wine and spirits and bread were offered round to the guests. Elspeth, as these refreshments were presented, surprised and startled flushed and screwed up her eyes, and so young a person who bored them to stop; then, taking a glass in her hand, she rose up, and, as the smile of dotation played upon her shrivelled features, she pronounced with a hollow and sickly voice, "Each glass, ma'am! Each glass, ma’am, and often may we have such merry meetings!"

All shrank from the ominous pledge, and set down the unchilled liquor with a degree of shuddering horror, which no surfeit solace to know how many superstitions are still common on such occasions among the Scottish vulgar. But as the old woman tasted the liquor, she suddenly exclaimed with a sort of shriek, "What’s this?—this wine—how should there be wine in my son’s house?—Ay," she continued with a suppressed groan, "I mind the sorrowful cause now," and, dropping the glass from her hand, her features all fixedly on one point, she gazed in which the coffin of her grandson was deposited, and then sinking gradually into her seat, she covered her eyes and forehead with her withered and pale hands.

At this moment the clergyman entered the cottage. Mr. Blattergowl, though a dreadful prosier, particularly on the subject of augmentations, localities, and genealogies, and in that sense, a member of the General Assembly, to which, unfortunately for his auditors, he chanced one year to act as moderator, was nevertheless a good man, in the old Scottish presbyterian phrase, as Blattergowl and many another was more attentive in visiting the sick and afflicted, in catechizing the youth, in instructing the ignorant, and in reproving the erring. And hence, notwithstanding of his garrulous and prejudiced personal or professional, and notwithstanding, moreover, a certain habitual contempt for his understanding, especially on affairs of genius and taste, on which Blattergowl was apt to be diffuse, from his hope of one day fighting his way to a chair of rhetoric or belles lettres, notwithstanding, I say, all the prejudices excited against him by those circumstances, and with great regard and respect on the said Blattergowl, though I own he could seldom, even by his sense of decency and the remonstrances of his womankind, be contradicted or provoked. And the minister was literature, to take his own metaphors, and regularly took shame to himself for his absence when Blattergowl came to Monkbars to dine, to which he was invited by a Sunday, a mode of testing his respect for the minister's time and tastes in the glass down and sunk upon the settle from where she had risen to snatch at it.

As the general amazement subsided, Mr. Oldbuck whose was the extreme of what he considered the string of the enfeebled intellect struggling with the toread chill of age and sorrow, observed to the clergyman that it was time to proceed with the duty of the undertaker, to proceed in his solemn charge. The clergyman thought his voice probably thought fully as agreeable to the clergyman, and rather more congenial to his own habits.

To return from a digression which can only serve to introduce the honest clergyman more particularly to our readers, Mr. Blattergowl had no sooner entered the hut, and received the mute and melancholy salutations of the company whom it contained, than he edged himself towards the unfortunate father, and seemed to endeavour to slide in a few words of condolence or consolation. But the old man was incapable as yet of receiving either; he nodded, however, gruffly, and shook the clergyman's hand in acknowledgment of his good intentions, but was either unable or unwilling to make any verbal reply.

The minister next passed to the mother, moving along the floor as slowly, silently, and gravely, as if he had been afraid that the ground would, like unsafe ice, break beneath his feet, or that the first echo of his footfall through some magic spell, and clunge the hut, with all its human habitation, into a mean abyss. The tenor of what he had said to the poor woman could only be judged by her answers, as he walked by all oppressed, and by the covering which she still kept over her face, she lightly answered at each pause in his speech—"Yes, sir, yes!—Ye’re very gude—ye’re very gude!—Nae doubt, nae doubt!—It's our duty to submit!—But, O dear, my poor Steenie, the pride o' my very heart, that was the handsome and comely, and a help to his family and a comfort to us a’, and a pleasure to a-th' lookit on him!—O my bairn, my bairn, my bairn!—What for a' leavin' ye there, and eh! what for am left to greet for ye!"

There was no contending with this burst of sorrow and natural affection. Oldbuck had several times, by recurrence and whisper, asked him, to his face, what was the cause, and, despite his shrewd and caustic temper, were apt to start on such occasions. The female assistant, hummed, the men held their bonnets to their face, and spoke not a word to each other, and the mean time, addressed his ghastly consolation to the aged grandmother. At first she listened, or seemed to listen, to what he said, with theupidity of her unconscious nature. But as in tears, she then approached so near to her car, that the sense of his words became distinctly intelligible to her, though unheard by those who stood more distant, her constant assurance at once assumed that stern and expostulating cast which characterized her intervals of intelligence. She drew up her head and body, shook her head in manner that showed at least impatience, if not scorn and reproach, and with a gesture so expressive, as to indicate to all who witnessed it a marked and disdainful rejection of the ghastly consolation proffered to her. The minute stopped, and she left her seat, and dropping his hand, seemed to show at once wonder, sorrow, and compassion for her dreadful state of mind. The rest of the company sympathized, and a stifled sigh passed through the group, for how much her desperate and determined manner impressed them with awe and even horror.

In the mean time the funeral company was complete, by the arrival of the two persons who had been expected from Fairport. The wine and spirits again circulated, and the dumb show of greeting we knew interchanged. The grandame a second time took a part, led, and pronounced the last claim, with a sort of laugh,—"Hey! ha! he tasted wine twice in a day.—When did I that before, think ye, cummers?—Never since!—And the present glories vanished from her countenance, she at the glass down and sunk upon the settle from where she had risen to snatch at it.

be only answered by shaking his hand and his head in token of refusal. With better intention than judgment, the friends, who considered this as an act of duty, moved their consent, and the communicant towards the deceased, would have proceeded to enforce their requests, had not Oldwick interfered between the distressed father and his well-meaning tormentors, and informed him that the will unsealed to be found in the hands of Mr. Brock, who was present among other fish-women, swore almost aloud, "His honour Monkibarns should never want sex warp of yawer in the season, of which it is to be respected; and again, that the wretched mother, terrified by the remembrance of her husband's affliction—affliction still more fearful as apting a man of hardened manners and a robust frame—suppressed her own sobs and tears, and, pulling him by the skirt of his coat, implored him to rise and remember that, though one was removed, he had still a wife and children to comfort and support. The appeal came to too early a period of his anguish, and was totally unattended to; he continued to remain prostrate, indicating, by sobs so bitter and violent that they shook the bed and partition against which he was pressed, that he in the deepest anguish and motion of his legs, how deep and how terrible was the agony of a father's sorrow.

"O, what a day is this!" said the poor mother, her womanish affliction already exhausted by sobs and tears, and now almost lost in terror for the state in which she beheld her husband; "O, what a day is this! I have no strength to help a poor lone woman—O, gademother, could you but speak a word to him!—wad ye but bid him be comforted!"

The plea for his intercession, and even to the increase of her fear, her husband's mother heard and answered the appeal. She rose and walked across the floor without support, and without much apparent feebleness, and standing by the bed on which her son had extended himself, she said, "Rise up, my son, and sorrow not for him that is beyond sin and sorrow and temptation—Sorrow is for those that remain in this vale of sorrow and darkness—I, wha dinna sorrow, and wha canna sorrow for any gae, hae maist need that ye should sorrow for me."

The voice of his mother, not heard for years as taking part in domestic duties during her offering advice or consolation, produced its effect upon her son. He assumed a sitting posture on the side of the bed, and his appearance, attitude, and gestures, seemed to have an influence to deaden and delude. The grandmother retired to her nook, the mother mechanically took in her hand her tattered Bible, and seemed to read, though her eyes were drowned with tears.

They were thus occupied, when a loud knock was heard at the door.

"Heigh, sirs!" said the poor mother, "wha is it that can 'e coming in that gait c' enow? They canna hae heard o' our misfortune, I'm sure."

The knock being repeated, she rose and opened the door, saying querulously, "Whatha gair's that to disturb a sorrowing old woman?"

A tall man in black stood before her, whom she instantly recognised to be Lord Glenallan.

"Is there not," he said, "an old woman lodging in this or one of the neighbouring cottages, called Elspeth, who was long resident at Craigburnfoot of Glenallan?"

"It's me gademother, me lord," said Margaret, "but she canna be the body o' enn—Ohon! we're droving a sair weir—we hae hae a heavy dispensation!"

"God forbid," said Lord Glenallan, "that I should on light occasion disturb your sorrow—but my days are numbered, and I am tired of dwelling on the extremity of age, and, if I see her not to-day, we may never meet on this side of time."

"And what," answered the desolate mother, "was ye see at an said woman, broken down wi' age and sorrow and heartbreak?—Gentle or sample shall not darken my doors the day my bairn's been carried out a corpse.

While she spoke thus, indulging the natural irritable disposition and passion, which began to mount in the degree of grief which was the first uncontrollable bursts were gone by, she held the door about one third part open, and placed herself in the gap, as if to render the visitor's entrance impossible. The door was opened and was heard from within—"What is that, Maggie? what for the ye stalking them out?—let them come in—it does signify an old rope's end who comes in or who goes out; I'll have the door draw this time forward."

The door stood at the threshold of her command, and permitted Lord Glenallan to enter the hut. The dejection exhibited in his broken frame and emaciated countenance, formed a strong contrast with the effects of grief, as they were displayed in the rude and weather-beaten visage of the fisherman, and the masculine features of his wife. He approached the old woman as she was seated on her usual settle, and asked her, in a tone as audible as his voice could make it, "Are you Elspeth of the Craigburnfoot of Glenallan?"

"Why is it that asks about the unallowed residence of that evil woman?" was the answer returned to his query.

"The unhappy Earl of Glenallan."

"The unhappy Earl of Glenallan?"

"He who was called William Lord Geraldin," said the Earl; "and whom his mother's death has made Earl of Glenallan."

"Open the door?" said the old woman firmly and has no daughter-in-law, "open the bolt we speed, that I may see if the right Lord Geraldin—the son of my mistress—him that I received in my arms within the house after he was born—him that never had to look to one that I didna smother him before the hour was past?"

The window, which had been shut, in order that a gloomy twilight might add to the solemnity of the funeral meeting, was opened as she commanded, and threw a sudden and strong light through the smoky and misty atmosphere of the stuffing cabin. Falling in a stream upon the chimney, the rays illuminated, in the way that Rembrandt would have chosen, the features of the unfortunate nobleman, and those of the old shiel, who now, standing upon her feet, and holding him by one hand, keenly anxious in his features for the face of one searching her long, withered, and withered fore-finger within a small distance of his face, moved it slowly as to trace the outlines, and reconcile them—she recoiled with that she noted, beholding her face with a deep sigh, "It's a sair—sair change—and what's fault it is?—but that's written down where it will be remembered—in written on tablets of brass with a pen of steel, where all is recorded that is done in the flesh. And what," she said, after a pause, "what is Lord Geraldin seeking from a poor old creature like me, that's dead already, and only belongs see to the living that she lies yet laid in the moulds?"

"Nay," answered Lord Geraldin, "in the name of Heaven, why was it that you requested so urgently to see me? and why did you back your request by sending a token which you knew you did not have to give to her?"

As he spoke thus, he took from his purse the ring which Edie Ochiltrie had delivered to him at Glenallan house. The sight of this token produced a strange and instantaneous effect upon the old woman. The palsy of fear was immediately added to that of age, and she began instantly to search her pockets with the tremulous and hasty agitation of one who is forced by necessity to remove of her own accord something of real importance—then, as if convinced of the reality of her fears, she turned to the Earl, and demanded, "Was ye ever by ye, in a trying now, and then now and is he left?—I thought I kept it safe securely—what will the Countess say?"

"You know," said the Earl, "at least you must have heard your mother is dead."

"Dead are ye no for aye ye have time? has she left—of last lands and life and lineage?"
the nature of which it formed—the high cliff that joined it with the pleasure-grounds of the house of Countess Glenallan—yes, I may forget that I had a husband and have lost him—that I have but one alive of our four fair sons—that misfortune upon misfortune has devoured one after the other till they carried the corpse of my son's eldest-born from the house this morning—but I never can forget the days spent at bonny Craigburnfoot.

"You were a favourite of my mother," said Lord Glenallan, desiring to bring her back to the point from which she was wandering.

"I was, I was,—ye noesna mind me o' that. She brought me up, and she taught me knowledge mair than my fellows—but, like the tempter of auld, wi' the knowledge of guide she taught me the knowledge of evil.

"For God's sake, Elspeth," said the astonished Earl, "proceed, if you can, to explain the dreadful hints you have thrown out! I well know you are con- dent to one dreadful secret, which should spilt this roof even to hear it named—but speak on further.

"I will," she said, "I will—but bear wi' me for a little!—and again she seemed lost in recollection, but it was not longer tinged with imbecility or apathy. She was now entering upon the topic which had long loaded her breast, and which doubtless often occupied her whole soul at times when she seemed dead to all around her. And I may add, as a remarkable fact, that from this time forth the Countess re- gained the complete operation of mental energy upon her physical powers and nervous system, that notwithstanding her infirmity of deafness, each word that Lord Glenallan spoke during this remarkable conversation, although in the lowest tone of horror or agony, fell as full and distinct upon Elspeth's ear as it could have done at any period of her life. She spoke also herself clearly, distinctly, and slowly, as if she were the intelligence she communicated should be fully understood; consecutively at the same time, and with none of the verbage or circumlocutory additions natural to those of her sex and condition. In short, her language bespoke a clear, lucid, and as I may say, as an uncommonly firm and resolved mind, and a character of that sort from which great virtues or great crimes may be naturally expected. The tenor of her communication is disclosed in the following chapter.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Remorse—she never forsakes us—

A blood-red branch—she tracks our rapid step

Through the wild labyrinths of youthful frenzy, enchantment stirs in the wild, lost heart of childhood, which longed for a world out of itself; and

A love of the mystic, a love of the mystic

Comes to our heart, where 'tis caught child's spirit

Old Play.

"I knew not tell you," said the old woman addressing the Earl of Glenallan, "that I was the favourite and confidential attendant of Josceline, Countess of Glenallan, whom God assuage it!"—(here she crossed herself)—and, I think farther, ye may not have forgotten, that I shared her regard for many years. I returned it by the most sincere attachment, but I say this, and the rest of what I am about to report to your mother by ane that thought, and she was wrang, that I was a spy upon her actions and yours.

"I charge thee, woman," said the Earl, in a voice trembling with passion, "name not her name in my hearing!"

"I swear," returned the penitent firmly and calmly, "nor can I understand why.

The Earl leaned upon one of the wooden chairs of the hut, drew his hat over his face, clenched his hands together, set his teeth like one who summons up courage to undergo a painful operation, and made a signal to her to proceed.

"I say then," she resumed, "that my disgrace with my mistress was chiefly owing to Miss Eveline Ne-villes, the daughter of a cousin-german and intimate friend of your father that was gone. There was much mystery in her history; but who dared to inquire farther than the Countess knew. Because she was so kind in-house-loving Miss Neville—all but twa—your mother and myselfs—we bated hirh.

"God for what reason, since a creature so mild, so gentle, so meek, so prone to inspire affection, never walked on this wretched world?"

"It may have been sae," rejoined Elspeth, "but your mother hated a that cam of your father's family—a that hated herself. Her reason was of the strum which fell between them soon after her marriage; the particulars are nothing to this purpose. But, Oh, doubly did she hate Eveline Neville when she perceived that there was a ground to hate ye and that unfortunate young laddie! Ye may as well guess that the Countess's dislike didna gang farther at first than just showing o' the cauld shouter—at least it wasna seen farther; but at the lang run it break out into such downright violence that Miss Neville was even fain to seek refuge at Knock winnock Castle with Sir Arthur's laddie, who (God earn her) was then wi' the living.

"You read my heart by recalling those particulars—but go on, and may your present agony be accounted as additional penance for the involuntary crime!

"She had been absent some months," continued Elspeth, "when it came to a noight, catching in my hat the return of my husband from the hunting and my mind in private those bitter tears that my proud spirit wrung free whenever I thought on my disgrace. The sneeze was cough, the grieve, your mother, entered my dwelling. I thought I had seen a spectre, for, even in the height of my favour, this was an honour she had never done me, and she looked as pale and ghastly as if the head had raised from the grave. She sat down and wrung the drapes from her hair and cloak, for the night was drizzling, and her walk had been through the plantations, that were a' loaded with dew.

"I only mention these things to you that you may understand how well that night lived in my memory—and weel it may. I was surprised to see her, but I durstna speak first, mair than if I had seen a phanto-m.—No, I couldna have spoken to her. But I then heard the grave and сдела, and in my mind the scenes of terror, and never shook at them—Sae, after a silence, she said, "Elspeth Cheyne, (for she always gave me my maiden name,) are ye not the daughter of that Reginald Cheyne, who died to save his master, Lord Glenallan, on the field of Sheriffmuir?" And I answered her as proudly as herself nearly—As sure as you are the daughter of that Earl of Glenallan whom I loved, and that day by his own death."

"Here she made a deep pause.

"And what followed?—what followed?—For Heaven's sake, good woman—But why should I use that word?—Yet, good or bad, I command you to tell me.

"And little I should value earthly command," answered Elspeth, "were there not a voice that has spoken to me sleeping and waking, that drives me forward to tell this sad tale. Ah, my lord—the Countess said to me, 'My son loves Eveline Neville—they are agreed—they are plighted—should they have a son, my right over Glenallan morses—I sink, from this moment, from a Countess into a miserable stipendiary dowager—I who brought lands and vassals, and high blood and ancient fame, to my husband's line, I must be abandoned, and his heir male. But I care not for that—he had married any but one of the hated Nevilles, I had been patient—But for them—that they and their descendants should enjoy the right and honours of ancestors, goes through my heart like a two-edged dirk. And this girl!—I detest her!—And I answered, for my heart kindled at her words, that her hate was equalled by mine."

"Wretch!" exclaimed the Earl, in spite of his de-terminaton to preserve silenc,—"Wretch, woman! what cause of hate could have arisen from a being so innocent?"

"I hated what my mistress hated, as was the with the liege vassals of the house of Glenallan; for though, my lord, I married under my degrees, yet, an ancestor of yours never went to Glenallan;

but an ancestor of the true, belonging, sold, un wretched who now speaks with you, carried his shield upon his head; and in his direct and well-aughted form, he seemed the bedlam, her earthly and evil passions redounding as she became heated in her narration; "tart was not a—"

I hated Miss Eveline Neville for her ain sake—I brought her what we had been, a gill in my pocket—loves being offered by a heedless school-girl without intention, with a degree of inveracity, which, at such a distance of time, a mortal offense would neither have been unknown—In a well-known (mind)—"—Yes, she scorned and jestted at me—but let them that scorn the tartan bear the dirk!"
She passed, and then went on. "But I deny not that I hated her more than she deserved. My mistres, the Countess, persevered and said, 'Elsiehow she knew, this unruly boy will marry with the false English blood—were days as they have been, I could throw her into the Masseymore* of Glenellan, and let her in the Keep of Strathbogie—But these times are passed, and the authority which the nobles of the land should exercise is delegated to quibbling lawyers and their base dependants. Hear me, Elspeth Cheyne! If you are your father's daughter as I am mine, I will find means that they shall not marry—She walks often to that cliff that overhangs you for her land, that—or may remember the pleasure ye took on the sea, and my lord—let him find her forty fathom lower than he expects—'Yes!—ye may stare and frown and chace your hand, but, as sure as I am to face the only being I ever feared, and O that I had feared him more!—these were your mother's words—What avail do you to me to lie to you?—But I will not consent to stain my hand with blood. In the name of God, in the memory of our holy Church they are over sibb together. But I expect nothing but that both will become heretics as well as disobedient reprobates.' that was her addition. Then she said, 'By the religion of our holy Church they are over sibb together.' But I expect nothing but that both will become heretics as well as disobedient reprobates. This was her addition. Then she said, 'By the religion of our holy Church they are over sibb together.'

Here the Earl of Glenellan echoed her words with a shriek so piercing, as to almost rend the roof of the cottage. "Ail then Eveline Neville was not the—"
"The daughter, you would say, of your father?" continued Elspeth: "No be it a torment or be it a confound the truth, but now no longer I dare a daughter of your father's house than I am."
"Woman, deceive me not—make me not curse the memory of the parent I have so lately laid in the grave of his bidding; in a plot the most cruel, the most infamal—"
"Bethink ye, my Lord Geraldin, ere ye curse the memory of a parent that's gone, is there none of the blood of Glenellan living, whose faults have led to this dreadful catastrophe?"
"Mean you my brother?—he, too, is gone," said the Earl.
"No," replied the sibyl, "I mean yourself, Lord Geraldin. Had you not transgressed the obedience of a son by wedding Eveline Neville in secret while a guest at Knockwinnock, our plot might have separated you for a time, but would have left at least your sorrows without remorse to canker them—but your ain conduct had put poison in the weapon that we threw, and it pierced you with the mair force, because ye came rushing to meet it. Had your marriage been a proclaimed and acknowledged action, our stratagem to throw an obstacle into your way that couldna gut over, neither wad nor could have been practised.
"Great Heaven!" said the unfortunate nobleman; "it is as if a film fell from my obscured eyes!—Yes, I now well understand the doubtful hints of consilium thrown out by my wretched mother, tending to indicate the existence of the horribleness of which her exist had led me to believe myself guilty."
"She could not speak mair plainly," answered Elspeth, without confessing her ain fraud, and the Earl, with the skill of the old horses, rather than unfold what she had done; and, if she had still lived, so would I for her sake. They were stout hearts the race of Glenellan, male and female, and saw what they saw in cold times creeces the horror of Clocabones—they stood shudder—Nae man parted free his child or of gold or of gain, or of right or of wrong.—The times are changed in aye. And, if ye have powers to listen."

"Yes," answered the beldam, "the hour when you shall hear, and I shall speak, is indeed passing rapidly away. Death is the curse that wolves have crossed your brow with his anger, and I find his grasp turning every day cauler at my heart. Interrupt me nae mair with exclamations and groans and accusations, but hear my tale to the end! And when ye hear the strange story of the Earl of Glenellan as I have heard of in my day—make your manner gather the thorn, and the brier, and the green hollin, till they heap them as high as the house-riggin, and ye may have the finish of Elspeth Cheyne, and a' that can put ye in mind that sic a creature ever crawled upon the land!"
"Go on," said the Earl, "go on—I will not again interrupt you.
He spoke in a half-suffocated yet determined voice, resolved that no irritability on his part should deprive him of this opportunity of acquiring proofs of the wondrous story, as he had heard it. He became exhausted by a continuous narration of such unusual length; the subsequent part of her story was more broken, and, though still distinctly intelligible, was not the most truth, but no longer in the mind of which the first part of her narrative had displayed to such an astonishing degree. Lord Glenellan found it necessary, when she had made some attempts to continue her story without some small attempt to reanimate her memory, by demanding, what proofs she could pro the bring of the truth of a narrative so different from that which she had originally told?
"The evidence," she replied, "of Eveline Neville's real birth was in the Countess' possession, with reasons for its being, for some time, kept private. They may yet be found, if she has not destroyed them, in the left-hand drawer of the ebony chest that stood in the dressing-room—these she meant to suppress for the time until you went abroad again, when she trusted, before your return, to send Miss Neville back to her ain country, or to get her settled in marriage."
"But did you not show me letters of my father's, which seemed to me, unless my senses altogether failed me in that horrible moment, to avow his relation to—" the unhappy."
"We did; and, with my testimony, how could you doubt the fact, or her ether?—But we suppressed the true explanation of these letters, and that was, that your father had sent it right to your young lady should pass for his daughter for a while, until he account o' some family reasons that were amang them."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Still in his deed hand clench'd remain the strings
That thrill his father's heart—'e'en as the limb, Long'd off and laid in grave, they tell him,
Strange commerce with the mutilated stump.
Whose swords are twining still in main's existence.

Old Play.

The Antiquary, as we informed the reader in the end of the tenth chapter, had shaken the company of worthy Mr. Blattergoul, although he offered to entertain him and I had been of the assembly who had never been known to the court, delivered by the procure of the church in the remarkable case of the parish of Gatherham. Restraining this temptation, our old acquaintance, he passed again, and, to my surprisducted him to the cottage of Mucklebeck. When he he came in front of the fisherman's hut, he observed a man working intently, as if to repair a shattered boat which was not finished, at least, and, to my surprise, it was not seen he was Mucklebeck himself. "I am "I am glad," he said, in a tone of sympathy-"I am glad, Saunders, that you feel yourself able to make this ex-
"And what would ye have me to do," answered the fisher gruffly, "unless I wanted to see four children starve, because she is drowned? It's wet wi' you hankers, that can sit in the house wi' hands before your eyes when you lose a friend? But the like of a man to our work again, if our hearts were beating as hard as my hammer.

Without taking more notice of Oldbuck he proceeded in his labour; and the Antiquary, to whom the display of human nature under the influence of agitating passions was never indifferent, stood beside him, in silent attention, as if watching the progress of the work. He was more than usually distinct in his features, as if by the force of association, prepared to accompany the sound of the saw and hammer with his usual sympathy of a rude tone hummed or whisthpered. So slight was the impression of the words which trembled on the words, as it were, so short was the sound, that it seemed to be uttered, a cause for suppressing it rushed upon his mind. At length, when he had patched a considerable rent, and was beginning to mend another, his feelings appeared although to derange the power of attention necessary for his work. The piece of wood which he was about to nail on was at first too long; then he sawed it off too short, then chucked another equally ill adapted for the purpose. At length, throwing it down in anger, after wiping his dim eye with his quivering hand, he exclaimed, "There is a curse either on me or on this sand black butt of a boat, that I have baulked it up high and dry, and patched and clouted one moon, and the woman you, for the end of them, and be it to her?-and he flung his hammer against the boat, as if she had been the intentional cause of his misfortune. Then recollecting himself, he added, "Yet what needs one be angry at her, that has neither soul nor sense?—though I am no that much beetle, but my brain is but a pack of nuts and hauled together, and warped wi' the wind and the boat—and I am a dour coar, battered by foul weather at sea and land till I am must as senseless as herself.

Dusk had thought again the morning tide—"that's a thing of certainty.

Thus speaking, he went to gather together his instruments and attempt to resume his labour, but Oldbuck took him, kindly by the arm. "Come, come," he said, "Saunders, there is no work for you this day—I'll send down Shaving the carpenter to mend the boat, and he may put the day's work into my account—and you had better not come out to morrow, but stay to comfort your family under this dispensation, and the gardener will bring you some vegetables and meat from Monkbarns."

Oldbuck took this up, and said, "Poor fisher, and have little to say for myself: I might have learned fairer fashions from my mother's gene, but I never saw muckle gude they did her; however, I thank ye. Ye were eye kind and neighbourly, whatever folk says' o' your being near and close; and I have often said in these times when they were gangin' to raise up the poor folk, I said, no man should steer a hae touching to Monkbarns while Steenie and I could wag a finger—and so said Steenie too. And Monkbarns, when ye laid his head in his arms on my shoulder and the reproach of saw the moulds laid on an honest lad that lakit you weel, though he made little phrase about it.

Oldbuck, beaton from the pride of his affected sympathy, would not willingly have had any one by upon that occasion to quote to him his love for the poor. He felt fast from his own eyes, as being the fool who was now melted at recollecting the breach of the generous sentiments of his son, to forget the love of a poor girl at home, where another scene awaited her anxious eyes. As he entered, the first person whom he beheld was Lord Glenellan.

Mutual esteem was in their countenances as he saluted each other, with hearty reserve on the part of Mr. Oldbuck, and embarrassment on that of Lord Glenellan.

"My Lord Glenellan, I think?" said Mr. Ol-buck.

"Yes—much changed from what he was when he knew Mr. Oldbuck.

"I do not mean," said the Antiquary, "to impose upon yourlordship—I only came to see this deserved family.

And you have found one, air, who has still great sympathy with our labours, for his compassion—if Lord Glenellan could need it, I think he would hardly ask it.

Our former acquaintance, said the Earl—
"I own you, my lord, was of so short a duration, and was connected with circumstances so exquisitely painful, that I think we might dispense with renewing it." So saying, he turned away, and left the but Lord Glenellan followed him into the sal-and, in spite of a hasty "Good morning, my lord," requested a few minutes' conversation, as the fashion of his advice in an important matter.

Your lordship will find many more capable to advise you, my lord, and by whom your interests will be deemed an honour. For me, I am a servant of the business and the world, and not the son of my heart. I follow you as best I can, and your lordship like's—it stops short.

"Like a villain, you would say," said Lord Gellenellan, for such I must have appeared to you.

"Your lordship, my lord, I have no desire to hear your shriek," said the Antiquary.

But, sir, if I can show you that I am not more than what you have seen, that I have been no more than what you have heard, I am not unac-scious of the honour which you have paid to me, and which you will not refuse the confidence which, accepting your appearance at this critical moment, I have to offer. I will not press on you.

Assuredly, my lord, I shall shun no longer the continuation of this extraordinary interview.

I must then recall to you our occasional meeting forwards of twenty years since at Knockwin-castle, and I need not remind you of a lady who was then a member of that family.

I must then recall to you our occasional meeting forwards of twenty years since at Knockwin-castle, and I need not remind you of a lady who was then a member of that family.

The unfortunate Miss Evoline Neville, my lord,
I remember it well.

Towards whom you entertained sentiments—
"Very different from those with which I was familiar since he had regarded her sex; her delicacy, her pleasure in the studies which I pointed to her, attached my affections more than before my ego, (though that was not then much advanced) for the solidities of my character. But I need not remind your lordship of the many modes in which you induced your gayety at the expense of a sad and retired student, embarrassed by the terms of the expression with which, and I have no doubt that the young lady joined you in the joined you in the bestowed ridicule—It is the way of woman kind.
I have spoken at once to the painful circumstances, within the shadow of my address and their rejection, that you may may be satisfied everything is full in my memory and, so far as I am concerned, tell your story without scruple or useless delay.

"I wish," said Lord Glenellan, but far let us say, you do injustice to the memory of the gentlest and kindest, as well as to the most unhappy of women, to suppose she acted out of the interested and sordid motives of a man like you. Frequently did she blame me, Mr. Oldbuck, for indulging my levity at your expense—may I now presume you will excuse the gay freedom which I now employ in your defence?

My dear Mr. Oldbuck, it is never since I made my profession of the necessity of apologizing for the inadvertencies of a light and happy temper.

"My dear lady, you are entirely pardoned," said Mr. Oldbuck. "You are aware, that, like all others, I was ignorant at the time that I placed myself in competition with your lordship, and understood that Miss Neville was in a state of distress which may be called a total abandonment of independence and the hand of an honest man—but I am wasting time—I would I could believe that the views entertained towards her by others were as fair and honest as mine!"

"Mr. Oldbuck, you judge harshly."

"Not without cause, my lord. When I only, of all the magistrates of this county, having neither, like some of your reverend and honourable to be connected with your powerful family, nor, like others, the meanness to fear it—when I made some inquiry into the manner of Miss Neville's death—I shook you, my lord, but I seemed to feel it, and I believe you do feel it. I believe she had met most unfair dealing, and had either been imposed upon by a counterfeit marriage, or that very strong measures had been adopted to destroy her reputation. And I cannot doubt in my own mind, that this cruelty on your lordship's part, whether coming of your own free will, or proceeding from the influence of the late Countess, hurried the unfortunate young lady to the desperate act by which her life was terminated."

"You are deceived, Mr. Oldbuck, into conclusions which are not just, however naturally they flow from the feelings of a man crushed by misfortune. The man who was most embarrassed by your active attempts to investigate our family misfortunes. You showed yourself more worthy of Miss Neville than I, by the spirit with which you persisted in vindicating her reputation even after her death. But the firm belief, that your well-meant efforts could only serve to bring to light a story too horrible to be detailed, induced me to join my unhappy harassed in schemes to remove or destroy all evidence of the legal union which had taken place between Eveline and myself. And now let us sit down on this bank, for I feel morally certain of finding on your part the readiness to listen to the extraordinary discovery which I have this day made."

They sat down accordingly; and Lord Glenellan began to relate the family history—his concealed marriage—the horrid invention by which his mother had designed to render impossible that union which had already taken place. He detailed the arts by which the Countess, having all the documents relative to Miss Neville's birth in her hands, had produced those only relating to a period during which for family reasons, his father had consented to own that young lady as his natural daughter, and showed how impossible it was that he could either suspect or detect the fraud put upon him by his mother, and vouched for by the oaths of her attendants, Teresa and Penelope. It was a consummation enterprised as if the furnaces of hell had driven me forth, and travelled with frantic velocity I knew not whither. Nor have I the slightest recollection of what I did or where I went, until I was discovered by my brother, I will not trouble you with an account of my sick-beds and recoveries, or how, long afterwards, I ventured to inquire after the sharer of my misfortunes, and heard that I had found her ready for all the ills of life. The first thing that roused me to thought was hearing of your inquiries into this cruel business; and you will hardly wonder, that, believing what I did you not expect, I was determined to stop your investigation, which my brother and mother had actively commenced. The information which I gave them concerning the circumstances and witnessed of our private marriage enabled them to baffle your zeal. The clergyman, therefore, and witnesses, who persons who aided in the matter only to please the powerful hero of Glenellan, were accessible to his promises and threats of all sorts of evil, provided they had no objections to leave this country for another. For myself, Mr. Oldbuck," pursued this narrative, "from that moment. I considered myself as poted. I knew the habit of a living, and as having nothing left to do with this world. My mother tried to reconcile me to life by every art—every by intimation which I can now interpret as calculated to produce some horrible tale she herself had fabricated. But I continued, she all the others as the fictions of maternal affection.

"I will forbear all reproach—she is no more—and, as her wretched associates sealed, she had not been poisoned, or how deep it must sink, when she threw it from her hand. But, Mr. Oldbuck, if ever, during these twenty years, there crawled upon earth a living being deserving of your pity, I have been that man. My food has not nourished me—my sleep has not refreshed me—my devotions have not comforted me—all that is cheering and necessary to man has been in vain to me converted into poison. The tire and limited intercourse which I have held with others has been most odious to me. I felt as if I were bringing the contamination of unnatural and inexpressible being in among the pure, and I have never been moments when I had thoughts of another description—to plunge into the adventures of war, or to brave the dangers of the traveller in foreign and barbarous countries—desire of the peace of mind to retire to the stern seclusion of the anarchists of our religion—All these are thoughts which have alternately passed through my mind, but each required an energy, which was a blow to my spirit from the stroke I had received. I vegetated on as I could in the same spot—fancy, feeling, judgment, and health, gradually decaying, like a tree whose bark has been destroyed,—dukes, until I was at last perceived, by the looks of the man, until its state resembles the decayed and dying trunk that is now before you. Do you now pity and forgive me?"

"My lord," answered the Antiquary, much affected, "my pity—my forgiveness, you have not to ask, for your dismal story is of itself not only an ample excuse for whatever appeared mysterious in your conduct, but a narrative that might move your worst enemies (and I, my lord, was never of the number) to tears and to sympathy. But permit me to ask what you now mean to do, and why you have honoured me, whose opinion you were so anxious to conciliate, with your confidence on this occasion?"

"Mr. Oldbuck," answered the Earl, "as I could never have foreseen the nature of that confession which I have this day made, had I no formal plan of consulting you or any one upon affairs, the tendency of which I could not even suspected. But I am without friends, unsued to business, and, by long retirement, unaccounted alike with the laws of the land and the habits of the living generation; and when, most unexpectedly, I find myself immersed in the matters of which I know least, I catch, like a drowning man, at the first support that offers. You are that support, Mr. Oldbuck. I have always heard you mentioned as a man of wisdom and intelligence—I have known you myself as a man of a resolute and indomitable spirit made, in all circumstances," said he, "which ought to combine us in some degree—our having paid tribute to the same excellence of character in poor Eveline. You offer yourself to me in my need, and you were already acquainted with the beginning of my misfortunes. To you, therefore, I have recourse for advice, for sympathy, for support."

"You shall seek none of them in vain, my lord," said Oldbuck. "so far as my slender ability extends; and I am honoured by the preference, whether it arises from choice or is prompted by chance. But this is a matter to be considered. May I ask, what are your principal views at present?"

"To ascertain the fate of my child," said the Earl, "to be the consequences what they may, and to sacrifice to the honour of Eveline, which I have said..."
THE ANTIQUARY.

To these, the inmates of his household, Oldbuck presented the Earl of Glenallan, who underwrote, with meek and subdued civility, the postponements of the honest divine, and the lengthened apologies of Miss Grieselda Oldbuck, which her brother in vain endeavoured to abridge. Before the dinner hour, Lord Glenallan entered the Green Room, and coming into the chamber. Mr. Oldbuck accompanied his guest to the Green Room, which had been hastily prepared for his reception. He looked around with an air of painful recollection.

"I think," at length he observed, "I think, Mr. Oldbuck, that I have been in this apartment before."

"Yes, my lord," answered Oldbuck, "upon occasion of a similar appearance of horror, perhaps, when we are upon a subject so melancholy, you may perhaps remember whose taste supplied these lines from Chaucer, which now form the motto of the tapestry."

"I guess," said the Earl, "though I cannot recollect—She exalted me, indeed, in literary taste and information, as in every thing else, and it is one of the many splendid dispensations of Providence, Mr. Oldbuck, that a creature so excellent in mind and body should have been cut off in so miserable a manner, merely from her having formed a fatal attachment to such a wretch as myself."

Mr. Oldbuck did not attempt an answer to this burst of the grief which lay ever nearest to the heart of his guest, but, pressing Lord Glenallan's hand with one of his own, he left the room, entwining his arm round the neck of the woman, and we will visit the old woman, Elspeth, alone, and take down her examination."

After a formal apology for the encroachment, Lord Glenallan agreed to go with him, and underwent with patience in their return home the whole history of John of the Girells, a legend which Mr. Oldbuck was never known to spare any one who crossed his threshold.

The arrival of a stranger of such note, with two saddled horses and a servant in black, which servant had hoisters on his saddle-bow, and a coronet upon the hoisters, created a general commotion in the house of Monkbarns. Jenny Rintervour, scarce recovered from the hysterics with which she had taken on hearing of poor Steenie's misfortune, chased about the turkeys and poultry, cackled and screamed louder than they did, and ended by killing one-half too many. Miss Grieselda made many wise reflections on the hot-headed wildness of her brother, who had occasioned such a devolution — but she remained firm on them a point with the nobleman. And she ventured to transmit them to Mr. Blattergowl, some hint of the unintentional slaughter which had taken place in the bass-court, which brought the housekeeper to the door to ask that, should Monkbarns have got home, and whether he was not the worse for being at the funeral, at a period so near the ringing of the bell for dinner, that the Antiquary had no choice but to invite him to stay and bless the meat. Miss M'Intyre had on her part some curiosity to see this mighty peer, of whom all had heard, as an Eastern caliph or sultan is heard of by his subjects, and felt some degree of timidity at the idea of encountering a person, of whose unsocial habits and stern manner so many stories were told, that her fear kept at least pace with her curiosity. The aged housekeeper was no less flustered and hurried in obeying the numerous and contradictory commands of her mistress, concerning preserves, pastry, and fruit, the mode of marshalling and dressing the dinner, the necessity of not permitting the melted butter to run to oil, and the danger of allowing Juno—who, though formally banished from the parlour, failed not to manage the out-settlements of the family—to enter the room.

The only inmate of Monkbarns who remained entirely indifferent on this momentous occasion was Hector M'Intyre, who cared no more for an Earl than he did for a parson, and who inclined up instead to the unexpected visit, as it might afford some protection against his uncle's displeasure, if he harboured any, for his not attending the funeral, and still more against the prospect of having to make a speech in the parlour or to save any of their most precious posies or seals.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Life, with you, Glow in the brain and dance in the arteries; That glides the heart and elevates the fancy.—Sir Walter Scott.

Vapid, and dull, and tasteless, only soiling, With its base drops, the vessel that contains it.

"Now only think what a man my brother is, Mr. Blattergowl, for a wise man and a learned man, to bring this Yerl into our house without speaking a single word to a body!—And there's the distress of the Mucklebackies—we canna get a fin o' fish—and we hae none time to send ower to Fairport for beef, and the Yerl's a man of substance! Jenny Rintervour, has taken the excuses, and done nothing but laugh and greet, the skirt at the tail of the guff, for two days successfully—and now we must speak to Mrs. Grieselda, and ask the Yerl himself, to stand at the sideboard! And I canna gang into the kitchen to direct any thing, for he's hovering there making some posowsome* for my lord, for he dooms eat like lither folk neither. And how to sort the strange servant man at dinner-time— I am sure, Mr. Blattergowl, a' thegeither, it passes my judgment.

"Truly, Miss Grieselda," replied the divine, "Monkbarns was inconsiderate. He should have taken a day to see the invitation, as they do wi' the titular's condescension in the process of valuation and sale. But the least man could not have admired the readiness to any house in this parish where he could have been better served with victuals—that I must say—and also that the steam from the kitchen is very gratifying to my nostrils—and if we have any household affairs to attend to, Mrs. Grieselda, never make a stranger of me—I can amuse myself very well with the larger copy of Erskine's Institutes."

And the window seat was the house seat, which, amusing soliloquy (the Scottish Cock upon Littleton), he opened it, as if instinctively, at the tenth title of Book Second, "of Tents, or Tythes," and was presently into the discussion concerning the temporality of benefices.

The entertainment, about which Miss Oldbuck expressed so much anxiety, was at length placed upon the table; and the Earl of Glenallan, for the first time since the date of his calamity, sat at a stranger's board surrounded by strangers. He was known, but not greatly respected, for his brain was not fully recovered from the effects of an intoxicating potion. Relieved, as he had that morning been, from the image of guilt which had so long haunted him, and equipped with a proper toilet, he had become a lighter and more tolerable load, but was still unable to take any share in the conversation that passed around him. It was, indeed, of a cast very different from that which he had been accustomed to.

The bluntness of Oldbucket, the tiresome apologoic harangues of his sister, the pedantry of the divinity, and the vivacity of the young soldier, which savoured more or less of the indulgence of a very young man, were all new to a nobleman who had lived in a retired and melancholy state for so many years, that the manners of the world seemed to him equally strange and unpleasant. Miss M'Intyre alone, from the natural politeness and unpertaining simplicity of her manners, appeared to belong to that class of society to which he had been accustomed in his earlier and better days.

Nor did Lord Glenallan's deportment less surprise the company. Though a plain but excellent family-dinner was provided, (for, as Mr. Blattergowl had just said, that which had been prepared was too large when her larder was empty,) and though the Antiquary boasted his best port, and assimilated it to the Falernian of Horace, Lord Glenallan was proof to the allure of the finest wine, so that placed before him a small mess of vegetables, that very dish, the cooking of which had alarmed Miss Griselida, arranged with the most minute and scrupulous niceties. He tasted as if he felt no repugnance to it; he drank a glass of pure water, sparkling from the fountain head, completed his repast. Such, his servant said, had been his lordship's diet for very many years, unless upon the festivals of the Church, or when company of the first rank were entertained at Glencavenhouse, when he relaxed a little in the austerity of his diet, and permitted himself a glass or two of wine. But at Monkbarne, no anchoret could have made a more simple and scanty meal.

The Antiquary was a gentleman, as we have seen, in feeling, but blunt and careless in expression, from the habit of living with those before whom he had nothing to suppress. He attacked his noble guest without scruple on the severity of his regimen.

A few half-coled greens and potatoes—a glass of ice water—these were his servants; no warrant for it, my lord. This house used to be accounted a hospitium, a place of retreat for Christians; but your lordship's diet is that of a heathen Phrygian, and, in my opinion, an absurdity more severe than either, if you refuse these fine apples.

"I am a Catholic, you are aware," said Lord Glenallan, wishing to escape from the discussion, "and you know that our church—"

"Lay down many rules of mortification," proceeded the dauntless Antiquary; "but I never heard that they were quite so rigorously practised—Bear witness my predecessor, John of the Girmell, or the Jolly Abbot, who gave his name to this apple, my lord.

And as he pared the fruit, in spite of his sister's—"Oh fie, Monkbarne," and the prolonged cough of the minister, accompanied by a shake of his huge wig, the Antiquary proceeded to detail the intrigue which had given rise to the garden apple, with more alarm and circumstantiality than was at all necessary. His jest (as may readily be conceived) missed fire, for this anecdote of conventional gallantry failed to produce the slightest smile on the visage of the Earl. Oldbucket then took up the subject of Ossian, Macpherson, and Mac-Cribb; but Lord Glenallan had never so much as heard of any of them. He had been well in modern literature. The conversation was now in some danger of flagging, or of falling into the hands of Mr. Blattergowl, who had just pronounced the formula, "I wish you all to think of the French Revolution started; a political event on which Lord Glenallan looked with all the prejudiced horror of a bigoted Catholic and zealous aristocrat. Olderuck was far from carrying its detestation of its principles to extremes; but, on the other hand, his brain was not fully recovered from the effects of an intoxicating potion. Glenallan-house has been to me rather a prison than a dwelling, although a prison which I had neither foreseen nor feared when I left the Earl.

"Let me first ask your lordship," said the Antiquary, "what are your own wishes and designs in this matter?"

"For myself especially," answered Lord Glenallan, "to declare my luckless marriage, and to vindicate the reputation of my unhappy Eveline; that is, if you see a possibility of doing so without making public the sad truths among his friends and retainers, as to how to hear where the child is, if, fortunately, it shall be still alive."

"I dare hardly hope it," said the Earl, with a deep sigh, "why should my brother have been silent to me?"

"Nay, my lord! why should he have communicated to your lordship the existence of a being, whom you must have supposed the offspring of"

"Most true—there is an obvious and a kind reason for his being silent. If any thing, indeed, could have added to the horror of the ghastly dream that has poisoned my whole existence, it must have been the knowledge that such a child of misery existed."

"Then," continued the Antiquary, "although it would be rash to conclude, at the distance of more than twenty years, that your son is not alive, because he was not destroyed in infancy, I own I think you should instantly act on foot inquiries."

"It shall be done," replied Lord Glenallan, catching eagerly at the ray of hope thus thrown out to him. "The boy, or what had nourished for many years; "I will write to a faithful steward of my father, who acted in the same capacity under my brother Neville—but, Mr. Oldbuck, I am not by the above evidence, to..."

"Indeed!—I am sorry for that, my lord—it is a noble estate, and the ruins of the old castle of Neville's-Burgh alone, which are the most superb relics of Anglo-Saxon times, in that part of the country, are a possession much to be coveted. I thought your father had no other son or near relation."

"He had not, Mr. Oldbuck," replied Lord Glenallan; "but my brother adopted views in politics, and a form of religion, alien from those which had been always held by our house. Our temper had long differed, nor did my unhappy mother always think him sufficiently observant to her. In short, there was a family quarrel, and my brother, whose property was at his own free disposal, availed himself of the power vested in him to choose his own child and heir. It is a matter which never struck me as being of the least consequence; for, if worldly possessions could alleviate misery, I have enough and to spare. But now I think I may tell you, that, if it be such a chamber as the sick chamber of a dying nobleman. And yet he said, he has always kept afloat, or in the salory and the poore. My consolations has only next to be made a lying-in hospital, and then, I row, the transformation will be complete."

"In he returned with the remedy, Lord Glenallan was much better. The new and unexpected light which Mr. Oldbuck had thrown upon the melancholy history of his family had almost overpowered him. You think, then, Mr. Oldbuck,—for you are able to imagine, better than I am, you think, the narrative of the boy's escape, and the discovery of his brother's means. He was known to be a gay and dissipated man, but not cruel nor dishonourable,—nor is it possible, that, if he had intended any foul play, his own conscience would not have revealed the child, and he would have been punished by the charge of the infant, as I will prove to your lordship he did."

So saying, Mr. Oldbuck opened a drawer of the cabinet, and produced a bundle of papers tied with a black ribbon, and labeled Examinations, &c. taken by J. P. on the 18th of February, 17—1, a little under was written, in a small hand, Ecule Evelina! The tears dropped, in vain, to unfasten the knot which secured these documents.

The word Quicken requires in like manner to be altered,

SHAKESPEARE.

In the morning of the following day, the Antiquary, who was something of a singer, was summoned from his bed a full hour earlier than his custom by Caxton.

"What's the matter now?" he exclaimed, yawning and stretching forth his hand to the large gold repeater, which, bedded upon his India silk handkerchief, was laid safe by his pillow. "What's the matter now, Caxton?—It can't be eight o'clock yet!"

"Ah, sir—but my lord's man sought me out, for he fancied me your honour's valley-de-sham, and sure I am, there's nae doubt o'it, baith your honour's and the minister's—at least ye has nae other that I ken o'—and I go back to Sir Antur too, but that's mair in the way o' my profession."

"Well, well—never mind that," said the Antiquary, "Happy is he that is his own valley-desham, as you call it—but why disturb my morning's test?"

"Oh, sir, the great man's been up since peep o'

day, and he's steered the town to get aas an express to fetch his carriage, which will be here brawly, and he was like to see your honour afore he came aw.

"Naebody" ejaculated Oldbuck. "These great men use one's house and time as if they were their own property. Well, it's once and again. Has Jenny come to her senses yet, Caxton?"

"Truth, sir, but just mending," replied the banner, "she's layin' in a flutter about the business of this morning, and was like to have adorned it with into the lap-bason, and drank it herself in her ecstasy—but she's won over 'ee wi' the help o' Miss M'dear.

"Then all my womankind are on foot and scramble, and I must enjoy my quiet bed no longer, if I would have a well-regulated house. Lend me my gown; and if the news are the news from Fairport?"

"Ou, sir, what can they be about but this grand news o' my lord," answered the old man; "that hasn't been over the door-stone they throe up to me, for many years—this grand news of his coming to visit your honour!"

"Aha!" said Monkbarns, "and what do they say of this Caxton?"

"Ded would they have various opinions. There follow that the democrats, as they ca' them that are again the king and the law, and hair powder and dressing o' gentlemen's wigs—a when it be guard—they say he's come down to speak wi' your honour about bringing down his hill lands and Highland tenantry to break up the meetings of the Friends of the People—and when I said your honour never meddled wi' the like of six things where there was like to be strakes and bloodshed, they said, if ye didna, your nevvy did, and that he was week kend to be a kingsman that wad fight kneesdown for the king; that he was the poor, and that the Yerl was to bring out the men and the siller.

"Come, said the Antiquary, laughing, 'I am glad the Court's got me nothing but common dirt.'"

"Na, na," said Caxton, "nobody thinks your honour wad either fight yourself, or gie any feck o' speaking on any side of the question."

"Then it was the opinion of the democrats, as you call them—What say the rest of Fairport?"

"Aye, aye, said Oldbuck—fire away as if you were Captain Coquet's whole plantation. I can stand it."

"Well, then, they say, sir, that as ye didna encourage the petition about the peace, and waish petition in favour of the new tax, and as ye were again bringing in the tax, the democrats said, and just setting the folk wi' the constables—they say ye're no a guid friend to government; and that these sort o' meetings between sic a powerful man as the Yerl, and sic an enemy as Captain Coquet, and sic a classed society as ye would be looker after, and some say ye should be shankit aff to Edinburgh Castle."

"Aye, aye," said the Antiquary, "I am infinitely obliged to my neighbours for their good opinion of me! And so, I, that have never interfered with their bickerings, but to recommend quiet and moderate measures, am given up on both sides as a man very likely to commit high treason, either against King or People?—Give me my coat, Caxton,—give me my coat!—It's lucky I live not in their report.—Have you heard anything of Tafflin and his vessel?"

"Caxton's countenance fell. Na, na, said Caxton, the winds has been high, and this is a fearin' coast to cruise on in thae eastern gales—the headlands rin seas out far, that a vessel's embayed afore I could see a thing; and then there's a sea-harbour or city of refuge on our coast, a' creeks and breakers. A vessel that rins ashore wi' her fleeces assunder like the sea, and that's the least landers could do, and that's as it is—least was it gathering o' anything. Aye, I say tell my daughter these things when she grows weaned for a letter fine Lieutenant Tafflin—It aye an apology for him—Ye said to blame him, said I, funny, for little ken what may has happened.

"Aye, aye, Caxton, thou art as good a comforter as a valet-de-chambre.—Give me a white stock, man,—if ye don't come down with handkerchief about the neck which I have company?

"Dear sir, the Captain says a three-nookit handker-
At this was no part of Lord Glenallan's system: saluting the company with the grave and meek politeness which distinguished his manners, servant placed before him a slice of toasted bread, a bit of cheese and a glass of water. He sat down and ate the slice, and then left the room.

"Your lordship's carriage, I believe," said Oldbuck, going to the window. "On my word, a handkerchief! for such, according to the best ideas, was the ras or signet of the Romans for a riot which, like that of your lordship, was drawn four horses.

"And I will venture to say," cried Hector, eagerly peering through the window, "that four-handled or tier-matched bays never were put in harness—at fine fore-hands!—what capital chargers they old make!—I might ask if they are of your lordship's own breeding?"

"I—I rather believe so," said Lord Glenallan; "but I have been so negligent of my domestic affairs, that I am ashamed to say I must apply to Cap-"certainly!"

"They are of your lordship's own breeding," said lvert, "got by Mad Tom out of Jenima and Yi-ris, your lordship's brood mares."

"That is the case," said Lord Glenallan. "Two, my lord, one rising four, the other five off a grass, both very handsome."

"Then let Dawkins bring them down to Monk-"Hector, sir!—Come, confound it was thrown away."

"Indeed it was, sir; but I see no reason that my folly should make me less grateful for his intended kindness."

"Bravo, Hector! that's the most sensible thing I ever heard you say—but always tell me your plans without reservation."

"Well, sir. I am aware that you are the kind of man who is not only willing to sacrifice himself to the cause, but also to be fit for the ear of a stranger, but the Earl mingled again in the conversation when the planable tone of the Antiquary expressed anxiety. Having received a brief account of the sentiments and hopes of the accession brought against him, which Oldbuck did not hesitate to ascribe to the miscalculation of Dousterswivel, Lord Glenallan asked, whether the individual in question had not been a soldier formerly? He was an awed in the air of command and independence."

"Had he not," continued his lordship, "a coarse blue coat, or gown, with a badge?—Was he not a tall striking-looking old man, with gray hair and beard, who kept his body remarkably erect, and talked with an air of command and independence, which formed a striking contrast to his profession?"

"They are an exact picture of the man," returned Oldbuck.

"Why, then," continued Lord Glenallan, "although I fear I can be of no use to him in his present condition, yet I owe him a debt of gratitude for being the first person who brought me some tidings of the utmost importance. I would willingly offer him a place of comfortable retirement, when he is extricated from his present situation."

"I fear, my lord," said Oldbuck, "he would have difficulty in reconciling his voracious habits to the acceptance of your bounty, at least I know the experiment has been tried without effect. To beg from the public at large is considered as independence, in comparison to drawing his whole support from the bounty of an individual. He is more a true philosopher, as to be a conterminer of all ordinary rules of hours and times."

"I will permit me to inquire into the nature of business, Hector!" answered his uncle, who loved the exercise of a little brief authority over his relative—"I should suppose any regimental affairs might be transacted by your worthy deputy the sergeant,—an honest gentleman, who is as good as to make Monkhill's house of fame on which he so lorry broke his fast. But I should be truly sorry if they sent the poor light-hearted old man to lie for weeks in a jail. I am convinced the confinement would break his heart.

Thus finished the conference. Lord Glennallen, having taken leave of the ladies, renewed his offer to Captain M'Intyre of the freedom of his manors for service to the cause. "I can only add," he said, "that if your spirits are not liable to be damped by dull company, Glennallen-house is at all times open to you—On two days of the week it is closed to the public, and a good deal of injury is done to the antiques and rare books in the apartments, which will be rather a relief to you, as you will be left to enjoy the society of my almoner, Mr. Gladamoor, who is a scholar and a man of the world."

Hector, his heart exulting at the thoughts of ranging through the preserves of Glennallen-house, and over the well-protected moors of Clochneban, nay, joy of joys, the deer-forest of Strath-Bonnal, made many acknowledgments of the honour and gratitude he felt. Mr. Oldbuck was sensible of the Earl's attention to his nephew; Miss M'Intyre was pleased because her brother was gratified; and Miss Gresda Oldbuck looked forward to a rich legacy from the whole bags of moor-fowl and black game, of which Mr. Blattergow was a professed admirer. Thus—which is always the case when a man of rank leaves a private family—Mr. Oldbuck had studied to appear obliging—had all been ready to provide the praise of his nephew as soon as he had taken his leave, and was wheeled off in his chariot by the four admired bags. But the pantry-wire was cut about for Oldbuck and his nephew departed themselves in the Fainport back, which, with one horse trotting, and the other urged to a canter, creaked, jingled, and hobbled towards that celebrated seaport, in a manner that formed a strong contrast to the rapidity with which the present Mr. Oldbuck's equipage had seemed to vanish from their eyes.

CHAPTER XXXVII

Yes! I love justice well— as well as you do—
But since the good dame's blind, she shall excuse me.

If, time and reason fitting, I prove dumb—
The breath I utter now shall be no means
To take away from me my breath in future.

By dint of charity from the town's people, in aid of the load of provisions he had brought with him into durance, Edie Ochiltree had passed a day or two's confinement with much impatience, regretting his wrongs, and hating the lass, as the weather proved broken and rainy.

"The prison," he said, "wasnae sae doon in a place as it was ca'd. Ye hae aye a good roof over your head to fend off the weather, and, if the wind- dows werenae glazed, it was the mair airy and pleasant for the summer season. And there were folk e'en to crack wi', and he had bread eneuch to eat, and what need he bash himself about the rest o' it?"

The course of our philosophical mendicant began, however, to abate, when the sunbeam shone fair on the rusty bars of his grated dungeon, and a miserable linnet, whose cage some poor debtor had obtained permission to attach to the window, began to greet them with his whistle.

"Ye're in better spirits than I am," said Edie, addressing the bird, "for I can neither whistle nor sing for thinking o' the bonnie bunrusses and green shaws that I should have been dandering beside in weather like this.—But hae, there's some crumps t'ye, an ye are welcome enough to the prison to sing an ye ken it, for your cage comes by nais faut o' your am, and I may thank myself that I am closed up in this weary place.

Ochiltree's soliloquy was disturbed by a peace-officer, who came to summon him to attend the magistrate.

So lie set forth in awful procession between two poor creatures, neither of them to stout as he was himself, to be conducted into the presence of inquisitorial justice. The people's, as the aged prisoner was led along by his decrepit guards, exclaimed to each other, "Edie see sic a grey-haired man as this is, to have committed such a crime! portable magnificence, from whom corporation crusts had not been conferred in vain. He was a zealous loyalist of that zealous time, somewhat rigorous and peremptory in the execution of his duty, and a good landlord and a good tenant which will be rather a relief to you, as you will be left to enjoy the society of my almoner, Mr. Gladamoor, who is a scholar and a man of the world."

Hector, his heart exulting at the thoughts of ranging through the preserves of Glennallen-house, and over the well-protected moors of Clochneban, nay, joy of joys, the deer-forest of Strath-Bonnal, made many acknowledgments of the honour and gratitude he felt. Mr. Oldbuck was sensible of the Earl's attention to his nephew; Miss M'Intyre was pleased because her brother was gratified; and Miss Gresda Oldbuck looked forward to a rich legacy from the whole bags of moor-fowl and black game, of which Mr. Blattergow was a professed admirer. Thus—which is always the case when a man of rank leaves a private family—Mr. Oldbuck had studied to appear obliging—had all been ready to provide the praise of his nephew as soon as he had taken his leave, and was wheeled off in his chariot by the four admired bags. But the pantry-wire was cut about for Oldbuck and his nephew departed themselves in the Fainport back, which, with one horse trotting, and the other urged to a canter, creaked, jingled, and hobbled towards that celebrated seaport, in a manner that formed a strong contrast to the rapidity with which the present Mr. Oldbuck's equipage had seemed to vanish from their eyes.

CHAPTER XXXVII

Yes! I love justice well—as well as you do—
But since the good dame's blind, she shall excuse me.

If, time and reason fitting, I prove dumb—
The breath I utter now shall be no means
To take away from me my breath in future.

By dint of charity from the town's people, in aid of the load of provisions he had brought with him into durance, Edie Ochiltree had passed a day or two's confinement with much impatience, regretting his wrongs, and hating the lass, as the weather proved broken and rainy.

"The prison," he said, "wasnae sae doon in a place as it was ca'd. Ye hae aye a good roof over your head to fend off the weather, and, if the wind- dows werenae glazed, it was the mair airy and pleasant for the summer season. And there were folk e'en to crack wi', and he had bread eneuch to eat, and what need he bash himself about the rest o' it?"

The course of our philosophical mendicant began, however, to abate, when the sunbeam shone fair on the rusty bars of his grated dungeon, and a miserable linnet, whose cage some poor debtor had obtained permission to attach to the window, began to greet them with his whistle.

"Ye're in better spirits than I am," said Edie, addressing the bird, "for I can neither whistle nor sing for thinking o' the bonnie bunrusses and green shaws that I should have been dandering beside in weather like this.—But hae, there's some crumps t'ye, an ye are welcome enough to the prison to sing an ye ken it, for your cage comes by nais faut o' your am, and I may thank myself that I am closed up in this weary place.

Ochiltree's soliloquy was disturbed by a peace-officer, who came to summon him to attend the magistrate.

So lie set forth in awful procession between two poor creatures, neither of them to stout as he was himself, to be conducted into the presence of inquisitorial justice. The people's, as the aged prisoner was led along by his decrepit guards, exclaimed to each other, "Edie see sic a grey-haired man as this is, to have committed such a crime! portable magnificence, from whom corporation crusts had not been conferred in vain. Hector, his heart exulting at the thoughts of ranging through the preserves of Glennallen-house, and over the well-protected moors of Clochneban, nay, joy of joys, the deer-forest of Strath-Bonnal, made many acknowledgments of the honour and gratitude he felt. Mr. Oldbuck was sensible of the Earl's attention to his nephew; Miss M'Intyre was pleased because her brother was gratified; and Miss Gresda Oldbuck looked forward to a rich legacy from the whole bags of moor-fowl and black game, of which Mr. Blattergow was a professed admirer. Thus—which is always the case when a man of rank leaves a private family—Mr. Oldbuck had studied to appear obliging—had all been ready to provide the praise of his nephew as soon as he had taken his leave, and was wheeled off in his chariot by the four admired bags. But the pantry-wire was cut about for Oldbuck and his nephew departed themselves in the Fainport back, which, with one horse trotting, and the other urged to a canter, creaked, jingled, and hobbled towards that celebrated seaport, in a manner that formed a strong contrast to the rapidity with which the present Mr. Oldbuck's equipage had seemed to vanish from their eyes.
may just write down that Edic Ochiltree, the declarant, was up for the liberty—na, I maunna say that neither—I am nac liberty-boy—I hae fought again them in the riots in Dublin—besides, I have ate the king’s bread many a day—Stay, let me see—Ay— well, the caree of the state; the state stands for the prerogative—for that ye spell that word right—it’s a lang ane—for the prerogative of the subjects of the land, and winna answer a single word that sae be said for it, if ye be fishing. Those seem a reason for it—Put down that, young man.”

“Then, Edic,” said the magistrate, “since you will give me no information on the subject, I must send you to the police station till you shall be delivered in due course of law.”

“Awee, sir, if it’s Heaven’s will and man’s will, nac doubt I maun say, replied the declarant; “I hae nac great objection to the prison, only that a body canna win oot a; and if it was plea you as well, Baillie, I wad give my word to acquaint the Lords at the Circuit, or on any other court ye like, on any day ye’re pleased to accept.”

“I rather think, my good friend,” answered Baillie Littlejohn, “your word might be a slender security where there may be no danger; I am sure to think you would suffer the pledge to be forfeited. If you could give me sufficient security, indeed.”

At this moment the Antiquary and Captain M’Intyre were returned from pressing the matter on the gentlemen,” said the magistrate; “you find me toiling in my usual vocation—looking after the impropriety of the people—labouring for the revalorized, Mr. Old- bon, and—beating the King our master Captain M’Intyre—yea, for I suppose you know I have taken up the sword?”

“It is one of the emblems of justice, doubtless,” answered the Antiquary; “but I should have thought the sword a more fitting instrument, better, Baillie, especially as you have them ready in the warehouse.”

“Very good, Monkbars—excellent; but I do not take the sword up as justice, but as a soldier—indeed I believe I am the only person that may stand at the elbow of my gouty chair, for I am scarce fit for drill yet—A slight touch of our old acquaintance podagra—I can keep my feet, however, while our sergeant puts me through the manual. I should like to know, Captain M’Intyre, if he follows the regulations correctly—he brings us but awkwardly to the present.” And he hobbled towards his weapon to illustrate his doubts and display his proficiency.

“I rejoice we have such zealous defenders, Baillie,” replied Captain M’Intyre; “and I dare say, Baillie, I do not take the sword up as justice, but as a soldier, I believe I am the only person that may stand at the elbow of my gouty chair, for I am scarce fit for drill yet—A slight touch of our old acquaintance podagra—I can keep my feet, however, while our sergeant puts me through the manual. I should like to know, Captain M’Intyre, if he follows the regulations correctly—he brings us but awkwardly to the present.” And he hobbled towards his weapon to illustrate his doubts and display his proficiency.

“What do you say to that body of evidence against your friend,” said the magistrate, when he had observed the Antiquary had turned the last leaf.

“Why, were it in the case of any other person, I own, I should say it looked prima facie, a little ugly; but I cannot imagine that to be in any way for beating Dousterswivil—Had I been an hour younger, or had but one single flash of your warlike genius, Baillie, I should have done it myself long ago—He is anubio nebulo in a word, a man of impudence and a great quack, that has cost me a hundred pounds by his roguery; and my neighbour Sir Arthur, God knows how much—and besides, Baillie, I do not hold him to be a sound friend to warrant.”

“Rightly; for, in beating him,” observed Oldbuck, “the bedesman has shown great gratitude to the king by thumping his enemy; and in robbing him, he would only have plundered an Egyptian, whose wealth it is lawful to spoil. Now, suppose I interview in the ruins of St. Ronan’s, the false view...”
politicals—and this story of hidden treasure, and so forth. It boiled down to the other side of the water for some great man, or the funds destined to maintain a sedulous club?

"My dear sir," said the magistrate, catching at the idea, "how fortunate it might have been for me! How fortuitous it would have been for me if the old man—by which I mean Oldbuck—had approached me without being observed by the woman he was meeting, by saying kindly, 'I am sorry, Edie, to see you so much cast down about this matter.'"

The mendicant started; dried his eyes very hastily with the back of his hand. "I thought as much," said Oldbuck. "Well, Edie, if I procure your freedom, you must keep your day, and appear to clear me of the bail-bond, for these are not times for prudent men to incur forfeitures, unless you can point out another Aulium autem placem quaerendum--

"Ah!" said the beggar, shaking his head, "I doubt the bird's flown that laid those golden eggs—f OR I wanna ca' her goose, though that's the gait it stands by—" Sir Arthur made his successful attack upon Misticot's grave, and also that when the labourers began to flag, you, Edie, were again the first to leap into the trench, and to me that, too, says no poor man, till you may explain all this to me, unless you would have me use you as ill as Euclio does Staphylus in the Ajax.

"Lordsake, sir," replied the mendicant, "what do I ken about your Howlowliana?—it's mair like a dog's language than a man's."

"You know, however, of the box of treasure being there?" continued Oldbuck.

"Dear sir," answered Edie, assuming a countenance of great simplicity, "what likelihood is there that I do think see puir an auld creature as me with a big empty chair, humbugging some guile out o' it?—and ye wot weel I sought name and g奈 name, like Michael Scott's man. What concern could I have in it?"

"That's just what I want you to explain to me," said Oldbuck; "for I am positive you knew it was there."

"Your honour's a positive man, Monkbarne—and, for a positive man, I must needs allow ye're often in the right."

"You allow, then, Edie, that my belief is well-founded?"

Edie nodded acquiescence.

"Then please to explain to me the whole affair from beginning to end," said the Antiquary.

"If it were sec'n o' me, Monkbarne," replied the beggar, "ye sulka twa times; for I hae aye said a hint your back, that, for a' the nonsense maggotye that ye whiles take into your head, ye are the most wise and discreet o' our country gentle. But I se' e'en be open-hearted wi' you, and tell you, that this is a friend's secret, and that they sall draw me wi' wild horses, or saw me sammer, as they did the children of Ammon, sooner than I would speak a word mair about the matter, excepting this, that there was nae ill intended, but muckle gaud, and that the purpose was to serve them that are worth twenty hun- dred o' the best. But, at last, I troosed it as a sin to ken where other folk's silver is, if we dinna pit hand till'ersell'ours?"

Oldbuck walked once or twice up and down the room, and endeavoured to find some plausible reason for transactions of a nature so mysterious, but his ingenuity was totally at fault. He then placed himself before the prisoner.

"This story of yours, friend Edie, is an absolute enigma, and would require a second Oedipus to solve it—who Oedipus was, I will tell you some other time, if you remind me—However, whether it be owing to the obscurity or the maggotye with which you compli- ment me, I am strongly disposed to believe that you have spoken the truth, the rather, that you have not made any of those obstructions of the superior person, which I observe you and your comrades always make use of when you mean to deceive folks." (Here Edie could not suppress a smile.) "If, therefore, you will answer me one question, I will endeavour to procure your liberation.

"If ye'll let me hear the question," said Edie, with the caution of a canny Scotchant, "I'll tell you whether I'll answer it or no."

"Then, in the Antiquary, "Did Doutser-swill know any thing about the concealment of the chest of bullion?"

"He, the ill-fa'ard loon!" answered Edie, with much emphasis. "For his name sake, and for a little spoorings o' t o' had Dunstanswill kend it was there—it wad has been butcher in the black dog's house."

"Vor H"
the Bailie could tell us the value of seal-skins just now.

"They are up," said the magistrate, "they are well up—the fishing has been unsuccessful lately."

"We can bear witness to that," said the tormenting Antiquary, who was delighted with the hank this incident had added to the young sportsman: "One word more, Hector, and—"

"We'll hang a seal-skin on the recanting limbo."

Aha my boy!—come, never mind it, I must go to business. Bailie, a word with you—you must take bail—moderate bail—you understand—for old Ochiltree's appearance.

"You have not considered what you ask," said the Bailie; "the offence is assault and robbery."

"Hush! not a word about it," said the Antiquary; "I gave you a hint before—I will possess you more fully hereafter—I promise you, there is a secret."

"But, Mr. Oldbuck, if the state is concerned, I, who do the whole drudgery business here, really have a title to be consulted, and until I am—"

"Hush! hush!" said the Antiquary, winking and putting his finger to his nose,—"you shall have the full credit, the entire management, whenever matters may be; I am an old man; I have no sons or nieces who will not hear of two people being as yet lift into his mystery, and he has not fully acquainted me with the view to Doubster's welfare.

"So we must up to fellow the alien act, I suppose?"

"To say truth, I wish you would."

"Say no more," said the magistrate, "it shall forthwith be done; he shall be removed tanguis suspect—I think that's one of your own phrases, Monkbars?"

"It is classical, Bailie—you improve."

"Why, public business has of late pressed upon me so much, that I have been obliged to take my foreman into partnership—I have had two several correspondences with the Under Secretary of State—one on the proposed tax on Riga hemp-seed, and the other on putting down political societies. So you might as well communicate to me as much as you know of this old fellow's discovery of a plot against the state."

"I will, instantly, when I am master of it," replied Oldbuck—"I hate the trouble of managing such things, but whenever, I do not say decidedly a plot against the state; I only say, I hope to discover, by this man's means, a foul plot."

"If it be a plot at all, there must be pression in it or sedition at least," said the Bailie—"will you bail him for forty hundred marks?"

"Four hundred marks for an old Blue-Gown!—This is a rogue of the bai•bons—Strike off a cypher from the sum—I am content to bail him for forty marks."

Well, Mr. Oldbuck, every body in Fairport is always willing to oblige you—and besides, I know that you are a prudent man, and one that would be as unwilling to lose forty, as four hundred marks. So I will accept your bail—meo percuto—what say you to that law phrase again?—I heard it from a learned counsel—I will vouch it, my lord, he said, meo percuto."

And I will vouch for Edie Ochiltree, meo percuto, in like manner," said Oldbuck. "So let your clerk draw out the bail-bond, and I will sign it."

When this ceremony had been performed, the Antiquary communicated to Edie the joyful tidings that he had been cleared of all suspicion, and directed him to make the best of his way to Monkbars-house, to which he himself returned with his nephew, after having perfected their good work.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

"Wish to Heaven, Hector," said the Antiquary, next morning after breakfast, "you would spare our nerves, and not be keeping snapping that arquebus of yours."

"Well, sir, I'm sure I'm sorry to disturb you," said his nephew, still handling his fancy-piece: "but it's a capital gun; it's a Joe Manton, that cost forty guineas."

"A fool and his money are soon parted, nephew; there is a Joe Miller for your Joe Manton," answered the Antiquary; "I am glad you have so many guineas to throw away."

"Every one has their fancy, uncle—you are fond of books."

"Ay, Hector," said the uncle, "and if my collection were yours, you would make it fly to the pantheon, the sheep market, the docks, and—Caesar undique mobilis libros—mutilare fortis Iberis."

"I could not use your books, my dear uncle," said the young soldier; "that's true; and you will do well to provide for their being in better hands—but don't let the faults of my head fall on my heart—I would not part with a Cordery that belonged to an old friend, to get a set of horses like Lord Glenalkin's."

"I don't think you would, lad, I don't think you would," said his softening relative—"I love to tease you a little sometimes; it keeps up the spirit of discipline and habit of subordination—you will pass through your time of service, not as an officer of Captain, or Colonel, or Knight in Arms as Milton has; and instead of the French," he continued relapsing into his ironical humour, "you have the Gentleman portent—for, as Virgil says,

'Susternum so moro diverse in litora phene,' which might be rendered,

'Here phene slumber on the beach,'

Within our Highland Hector's reach.

Nay, if you grow angry I have done.—Besides, I see Old Edie in the court-yard, with whom I have business. Go and see him—Do you know what she splashed into the sea like her master Proteus, et factum delit dilectus in altum?

M'Intyre, waiting, however, till the door was shut, then gave way to the natural impatience of his temper.

My uncle is the best man in the world, and in his way the kindest; but rather than hear any more about that cursed phene, as he is pleased to call it, I would exchange for the West Indies, and never see his face again.

Miss Marmion is most gratefully attached to her uncle, and passionately fond of her brother, was, on such occasions, the usual envoy of reconciliation. She hastened to meet her uncle on his return, before he entered the parlour.

"Well, now, Miss Womankind, what is the meaning of that impolite countenance?—has Juno done any more mischief?"

"No, uncle, but Juno's master is in such fear of your joking him about the seal—I assure you, he feels it much more than you would wish—it's very silly of him, to be sure; but then you can turn every body sharply into ridicule."

"Well, my dear," answered Oldbuck, propitiated by the compliment, "I will rein in my satire, and if possible, speak no more of the phene—I will not speak of sealing a letter, but say, as they used to nod to you when I want the wax-light—I am a membritis asper, but Heaven knows, the most mild, quiet, and easy of human beings, whom sets, niece, and nephew, guide just as a best pepper."

With this little panegyric on his own docility, Mr. Oldbuck entered the parlour, and proposed to his nephew a walk to the Mussel-crag.

"I have some questions to ask, a woman to examine, and a case to take charge of," he observed; and I would willingly have sensible witness with me—so, for fault of a better Hector, I must be contented with you."

Therewith, Edie, sir, or Caxton, would not do better than me?" answered M'Intyre, for, somewhat alarmed at the prospect of a long lecture with his uncle.

"Upon my word, young man, you turn me over to pretty companions, and I am quite sensible of your politeness," replied Mr. Oldbuck. "No, no, I shall..."
the old Blue-Gown shall go with me as not a competent witness, for he is at present, as our friend Hai-ke Littlejohn says, (blessings on his learning!) tanquam suspicatus, and you are suspicius major, as our law has it.

I was a major, sir, "said Hector, catching only the last, and, to a soldier's ear, the most impressive word in the sentence,—"but, without money or interest, there is little chance of getting the strew.

"Well, well, most doughty son of Prian, said the Antiquary, "be ruled by your friends, and there's no saying what may happen—Come away with me, and you'll see if you're going to sit in any court-martial, sir," answered Captain M'Intyre. "But here's a new case of you!"

"Much obliged, much obliged,"

"I bought it from our drum-major," added M'Intyre, "who came into our regiment from the Bengal army, and it came down the Red Sea. It was cut on the banks of the Indus, I assure you."

"Upon your word, 'tis a fine ratar, and well replaces that which the p——Bath! what was I going to say?"

The party, consisting of the Antiquary, his nephew, and the old beggar, now took the sands towards Mussel-crag, the former in the very highest mood of conversation. He was out of the question, understanding the sense of former obligation, and some hope for future favours, decently attentive to receive it. The uncle and nephew walked together, the mendicant about a stone's throw behind, just near enough for the patron to speak to him by a slight inclination of his neck, and without the trouble of turning round. Petrie, in his Essay on Good-breeding, dedicated to the magistrates of Edinburgh, recommends, upon his own experience, as tutor in a family of distinction, this attitude to all led captains, tutors, dependants and bottle-holders of every description. Thus escorted, the Antiquary moved along full of his learning, like a long-tailed man of war, and every now and then wavering to starboard and larboard to discharge a broadside upon his followers.

And so it is your opinion," said he to the mendicant, "that this waffeln—this area auris, as Plautus has it, will not greatly avail Sir Arthur in his necessities."

Unless he could find ten times as much," said the beggar, and that I am sure doubtful—if I heard Pugg-Pugrock, or the tother thief of a sheriff-officier, or messenger, speaking about it—and things are ill all when like of them can speak, crushly about any good. I do not think it will be Sir Arthur's stane was for debt, unless there's swift help and certain.

"You speak like a fool," said the Antiquary. "Nephew, it is a remarkable thing, that in this hamp countrie no man can be legally imprisoned for debt."

"Indeed, sir?" said M'Intyre; "I never knew that before—that part of our law would suit some of our mean well."

"And if they are confined for debt," said Ochiltree, "what is it that tempts so many poor creatures to reside in the tolbooth o' Fairport yonder—they a's they wau' about their creditors. Odd! it is no man like it better than I do if they're thare free will."

A very natural observation, Edie, and many of your brothers would make the same; but it is founded entirely upon ignorance of the feudal system. Hector, be so good as to attend, unless you are looking out for another—Aham! (Hector compelled himself to give attention, but his heart it may prove useful to you, rerum cognoscere causes. The nature and origin of warrant for capture is a thing haud alienum a Sacrolo studis. You must know then once more, that nobody can be arrested in Scotland for debt.

"I haume muckle concern wi' that, Monkbarns," said the old man, "for somebody wad trust a bodie to a pr'ythe peace, man—as a compulsoir, there. of payment—that being a thing to which no debtor is naturally inclined, as I have too much reason to warrant from the experience I have had with my own,—we had first the letters of four forms, a sort of gentle invitation, by which our sovereign lord the king, interested in his successe, as if a minister of the regulation of his subjects' private affairs, at first by mild exhortation, and afterwards by letters of more strict enjoynment and more hard compulsyon—What do you see extraordinary about that, Hector?—it's but a seaweed."

"It's a pictornis, sir," said Edie.

Well, what and if it were—what does that signify at present? I see you're going to sit in any court-martial, sir," answered Captain M'Intyre. "But here's a new case of you."

"Much obliged, much obliged."

"I bought it from our drum-major," added M'Intyre, "who came into our regiment from the Bengal army, and it came down the Red Sea. It was cut on the banks of the Indus, I assure you."

"What shall we do, Hector?" said Oldluck, pausing; "I got into disgrace with my womankind for making a bad bargain with her before. These maritime animals, Hector, are unlucky to our family."

"Auch, sir, what would you do?—give poor Maggie what she asks, or allow me to send a dish of fish up to Monkbarne?"

And he held out the money to her; but Maggie drew back her hand. "Na, na, Captain; ye're ower young for yer age. Ye never would understand the art of being a fish-wife's first bide, and troth I think maybe a flyte wi' the auld housekeeper at Monkbarne, or Miss Gregor, would do me some good—And I want to see what's doing. Och, don't ye ken Jamesie's doing?—The folk said she wasna well—She'll be vaxing herself about Steenie, the silly twappie, as if he wad ever hae look oot her loohters at the like o' her!—Well, Monkbarne is a brak calling place, and they'll bid me unco little indeed at the house if ye want craipp-heads the day.

And so on she paced with her burden, grief, gratitude for the sympathy of her betters, and the habitual love of traffic and of gain, chasing each other through her thoughts.

"And now that we are before the door of their hut," said Ochiltree, "I wad ken, Monkbarne, what has smir'd ye plague yoursel wi' me a' this length? I tell ye sincerely I hae nae pleasure in ganging in there, I donwa bide to think how the young hae fa' en on a' sides o' me, and left me an useless auld stump wi' hardly a green leaf on'."

"This o'ld woman," said Oldluck, "sent you a message to the Earl of Glenallan, did she not?"

"Ay!" said the surprised mendicant; "how ken ye that nae weel?"

"Lord Glenallan told me himself," answered the Antiquary; "so there is no delusion—no breach of trust to wriggle about—and as he was so near to take his evidence down on some important family matters, I chose to bring you with me, because in her situation, hovering between dotation and consciousness, it is possible that the exercise and spirituality and trains of recollection which I should otherwise have no means of exciting. The human mind—what are you about, Hector?"

"I was only whistling for the dog, sir," replied the Captain; "'She always roves too wide—I knew I should be troublesome to you."

"Not at all, not at all," said Oldluck, resuming the subject of his disquisition—"The human mind is to be treated like a skim of ravelled silk, where you must cautiously secure one free end before you can make any progress in disentangling it."

"I ken not a name about that said the gablerunie; "but an auld acquaintance be herself, or ony thing like herself, she may come to wind us a pirn. It's learsome baith to see and hear her when she wampshes about her arms, and gets to her English book, and spends as she were a prette-book,—let a bide an auld fisher's wife. But, indeed, she had a grand education, and was muckle then out afore she married an unco bit beneath herself. She's auldter than me, half more—but I'mna weel enough they naed as muckle work about her making a half-mark marriage wi' Simon Mucklebackit, this Saunders's father, as if she had been ane o' the gentry."

"But, sir, she was a shrewd, clever woman, and then she was again, as I heard her son say, when he was a muckle chield; and then they got muckle ailer, and left the Countess's land and settled here. But things never thrive wi' them. Howsoever, she's a weel-educated woman, and an she win to her English, as I hae heard her de at an orra time, she may come to tickle us a'."

CHAPTER XL

Life ebbs from such old age, unmark'd and silent, as the gleanings of a poor cow. Late she rock'd merrily at the least impulse; That wind or wave could give; but now her keel Is settling on the sand, her mast has taken An angle with the sky, from which it shifts not. She doesn't offer to dispute the harkless sea, Till, boddied on the strand, she shall remain Useless as motionless.

Old Play.

As the Antiquary lifted the latch of the hut, he was surprised to hear the shrill tremulous voice of Elspeth chanting forth an old buidal in a wild and doleful recitative.

"The herring loves the merry moonslight,
The mackerel loves the wind,
But the oyster loves the drowsy sang
For they come of a gentle kind.

A diligent collector of these legendary scraps of ancient poetry, his foot refused to cross the threshold when his ear was thus arrested, and his hand instinctively took the book, and menaced the page with the rule. From time to time the old woman spoke as if to the children—"O ay, hannies, whisth, whisth! and I'll begin a bonner one than that—"Now hang your tongue, bairn and wifie, and listen to me. And I will sing of Glenellan's Earl That fought on the red harlaw—The cronch's cried on Benachie, And down the Don and a', And hieland and lewland may mornus' be For the sair field of Harlaw."

I dinna mind the neist verse weel—my memory's fail'd, and there's unco thoughts come o'er me—God keep us free temptation! Here he looks around in distinct muttering.

"It's a historical ballad," said Oldluck eagerly, "a genuine and undoubted fragment of minstrelsy! Percy would adumbrate its simplicity—Rison could not impugn its authenticity."

"Ay, but it's a sad thing," said Ochiltree, "to see human nature sae far outworn as to be skirling at auld sangs on the back of a loss like hers."

"Hush, hush, said the Antiquary,—"she has got the thread of the story again. And as he spoke she sung:

"They saffed a hundred milk-white steeds,
Their horses were bridled a hundred black.
With a charcoal of steel on every horse's head,
And a good knight upon his back."

"Chaforn!" exclaimed the Antiquary,—"equivalent, perhaps, to cherister—the word's worth a dollar; and down it went in his red book."

"They had ridden a mile, a mile, A mile, but barely ten. When Donald came brakking down the brae Wi' twenty thousand men.
Their tartans they were waving wide, Their glasses were glancing clear, The crooke ran fine side to side, Would deaden ye to hear.
The great Earl in his stirkrose stood That highland host to see.
Now here a knight that's stout and good May prove a jeopard:
What wouldst thou do, my squire so gay, That rides beside my reyne, Were ye Glenellan's Earl the day, And I was Roland Cheyne?"

"To turn the rein were sin and shame, As an earl's fight were wondrous pitty, What would ye do now, Roland Cheyne, Were ye Glenellan's Earl?"

Ye maun ken, hannies, that this Roland Cheyne, for as poor andUILD as I sit in the chimnie-neuk, was my forber, and an auld man he was that day in the fight, but specially after the Earl had faen'; for he blamed himself for the counsel he gave, to fight before Mar came up wi' Mearns, and Aberdeen, and Angus.
think I see the coble whumbled 1st up, and some of them struggling in the waves—eh, aye, sic weery dreams as folk has when they're sleeping or waking, before they win to the lang sleep and the sound—I could almost think whiles, my son, or else Steenie, my ow, was dead, and that I had seen the burial. I saw that a queer dream for a daft said cartine: what for should any o' them dee before me?—it's oot the course o' nature, ye ken.

"I think you'll make little of this stupid old woman," said Hector, who still nourished, perhaps, some feelings of the dislike excited by the disparaging mention of his countrymen in her lay—"I think you'll make but little of her, sir; and it's wastin' our time to sit here and listen to her dotage."

"Hector," said the Antiquary indignantly, "if you do not respect her misfortunes, respect at least her old age and gray hairs,—this is the last stage of existence, so finely treated by the Latin poet:

Omni
Membrorum damnau major dementia, quae sec
Nomina servorum, nec vestris argentis amicis, Cum quisque perierit conscivit nocte, nec illis Quos genuit, quos edavit.

"That's Latin," said Eslegh, pushing herself as if she attended to her own dreams which her mind recited with great pomp of diction,—"That's Latin!" and she cast a wild glance around her—"Has there a priest found me out at last?"

"You see, newly, her comprehension is almost equal to your own of that fine passage."

"I hope you think, sir, that I knew it to be Latin as well as she did it?

"Why, as to that—but stay, she is about to speak."

"I will have no priest—none," said the bard, with impatient vehemence,—"as I have lived I will die—none shall say that I betrayed my mistress, though I were to save my soul!"

"That bespeaks a foul conscience," said the mendicant; "I wuss she wad mak a clean breast, on't she was but for her that pleasant guest, think ye, and she dismissed her withered fingers as she spoke—"first Pride, then Malice, then Revenge, then False Witness; and Murderer! at the door-pin, if he cannot get in—and warnen for that dispair, think ye, to take up their quarters in ane woman's heart! I trow there was rath o' company!"

"But, cummer," continued the bogan, "it wauns the Countess of Glenarain's heart, but her son, him that was Lord Geraldin."

"I mind it now," she said; "I saw him no th' lang syne, and we had a heavy speech together—eh, aye, the comely young lord is turned as sad as I am—it's muskle that sorrow and heart-break, and crossing of true love, will do wi' young blood—But sulde his mither has lookit to that housil."

"We were but to do her bidding, ye ken—I am sure there's nobody can blame me—he was my son, and she was my mistress—Ye ken how the rhyme says—I hae maist forgotten how to sing, or else the tune's left my auld head!"

"He turn'd him right and round again,
Said, corn na at me and say Light love I may get mone y a, a
But mire nae sinther, sir.

Then he was but half the blude, ye ken, and here was the right Glenalain after a'. Na, na, I micht never maen doing and suffering for the Countess Joscelin. Never will I maen for that."

Then drawing her flax from the distaff, with the dogged air of one who is resolved to confess nothing, she resumed her interrupted occupation.

"I see hae," said the mendicant, taking his cue from what Oldluck had told him of the family history—"I see hae—" but the rough, ever-elusive, ever-adaptable, ever-openmouthed voice of the bard said has come between the Earl, that's Lord Geraldin, and his young bride."

"I'll tongue!" she said, in angry alarm, "an' what?"
Edie ran to support her, but hardly got her in her arms, before her strength was gone, and she passed away even with that last word.

"Impossible," said Oldbuck, hastily advancing, as did his nephew. But nothing was more certain. She had expired. Her last hurried word left her lips; and all that remained behind was the mortal relics of the creature who had so long struggled with an internal sense of concealed guilt, jounced to all the necessary effects of age and poverty.

"God grant that she be come to a better place," said Edie, as he looked on the lifeless body; "but, oh! there was something lying hard and heavy at her heart. It was a stone, a one, dealt with in the field of battle, and a fair-army, set up in the cause of the cause, that I wished rather see them at a corner, as sic a fear's hittin' as her's.

"We'll keep the dead in the neighbours," said Oldbuck, when he had somewhat recovered from his horror and astonishment, "and give warning of this additional calamity—I wish she could have been brought to a consciousness, though of far less consequence. I could have wished to transcribe that mental fragment. But Heaven's will must be done!"

They left the hut accordingly, and gave the alarm in the huts of the near-by marrons instantly assembled to compose, the limbs and intellects of the deceased might be considered as the mother of their settlement.

Oldbuck promised his assistance for the funeral.

"Young man," said Allison Breck, who was next in age to the deceased, "I'll give you a word or two to keep up our hearts at the lyke-wake, for a Saumur's gin, yon man, was dracken out at the burial o' Steenie, and we get no money to dry-lip it inside the corpse. Elejep was unveritable in her young days, as I can mind right well, but there was aye a word o' her no being that chancy—An' auldina speak ill o' the dead—mair by token, o' men's summer and neighbour—but there was never any things said about a loney or a barn or she left the Craigburnfoot. And sae, in guide truth, it will be a fur lyke-wake, unless your honour sends us something to keep us aither in the huts!"

"You shall have some whisky," answered Oldbuck, "the rather that you have preserved the proper word for that austerc custom of watching the dead. Ye observe, Hector, this is genuine Teutonic, from the Gothic Leitcham, a corpse. It is quite erroneously called Late-trake, though Brand worthes that modest corruption and derivation.

"I'll be at the door," replied Hector to himself, "my my would give away Monk-larns to any one who would come to ask it in genuine Teutonic! Not a drop of whisky would the old creatures have got, had the providence and courage not interceded for them.

While Oldbuck was giving some further directions and promising assistance, a servant of Sir Arthurs came riding very hard along the sands, and stood by his horse when he saw the Antiquary. "There has been something," he said, "very particular happened at the Castle," (he could not, or would not, explain what,) and Miss Waringston had sent him off express to Monk-larns, to beg that Mr. Oldbuck would come to them without a moment's delay.

"I am afraid," said the Antiquary, "his course she is drawing to a close. What can I do?"

"Do, or, excusin Hector, with his characteristic impatience,—get on the horse, and turn his head homeward—you will be at Knockwinnock Castle in ten minutes.

"He is quite a free goer," said the servant, exclaiming, "comparing to adjust the girdle and stirrup,—he only pulls a little if he feels a dead weight on him."

"I should soon be a dead weight off him, my friend," said the Antiquary, as he put on his boots. "Do I say you use the weight of life, that I should get on the back of such a Bucephalus?"

"Such a scene, although the people of the neighbourhood were behawteen that the bell sounded of its own accord. King, however, it should be rembered that it is very difficult to find a horse that will rise up in his bed, and fattered, in broken accents, "Yes, yes, my Lord Duke!—Gee-ise, I will wait on your Grace tomorrow, and—" but these words on his lips, he was said to have at once fallen back and died.

time that Sir Arthur Wardour had cessor of the treasure found in Mistick's ad been in a state of mind more resen- than sober sense. Indeed, at one time had become impressively apparent to for, as he had no doubt that he had the assessing himself of wealth to an un- sm, his language and carriage were those to had seen, wretched. Troops of inventory, id already, in fancy, marshalled in his for what may not unbounded wealth possessory to aspire to?—the coronet of a number of duties, is given up before mot. His daughter—to what manner t look forward? Even an alliance with the blood-royal was not beyond the sphere of his hopes. His son was already a general—and he himself whatever ambition could dream of in his wildest visions.

In this mood, if any one endeavoured to bring Sir Arthur down to the regions of common life, his replies were in the voice of Ancient Piston: "A sco for the world, and wordlings base! I speak of Africa and golden joys!"

The reader may conceive the amazement of Miss Wardour, when, instead of undergoing an investigation concerning the addresses of Lovel, as she had expected from the long conference of her father with Mr. Oldbuck, upon the morning of the fated day when the treasure was discovered, the conversation of Sir Arthur announced an imagination heated with the hopes of possessing the most unbounded wealth. But she was seriously alarmed when Dousterswivel was sent for to the Castle, and was closeted with her father—his mishap consoled with—his part taken, and his loss compensated. All the suspicions which she had long entertained respecting this man became strengthened, by observing his pains to keep up the golden dreams of her father, and to secure for himself, under various pretenses, as much as possible out of the windfall which had so strangely fallen to Sir Arthur's share.

Other evil symptoms began to appear, following close on each other. Letters arrived every post, which Sir Arthur, as soon as he had looked at the directions, flung into the fire, as he was unable to open them. Miss Wardour could not help suspecting that these epistles, the contents of which she seemed to know her father by a sort of intuition, in the mean time, while the temporary aid which he had received from the treasure, dwindled fast away. By far the greater part had been swallowed up by the necessity of paying the bill of six hundred pounds which he had con- sented Sir Arthur with instant distress. Of the rest, some part was given to the adopt, some wasted upon extravagances which seemed to the poor knight fully authorized by his full-blown hopes—and some went to stop for a time the mouths of such claimants, who, being weary of fair promises, had become of opinion with Harpagus, that it was necessary to touch something substantial. At length circumstances announced but too plainly, that it was all ex- tended within two or three days after its discovery; and there appeared no prospect of a supply. Sir Ar- thur, naturally impatient, now grew coarsely knew with breach of those promises, through which he had hoped to convert all his lead into gold. But that worthy gentleman's turn was now sequent, and as he had grace enough to avoid witnesses of the fall of the house which he had undermined, he was at the trouble of bestowing a few learned terms of art upon Sir Arthur, that at least he might not be tormented before his time. He took leave of him, with assurances that he would return to Knockwin- nock the next morning, with such information as would not fail to relieve Sir Arthur from all his dis- tresses.

"For, since I have consulted in such matters, I ave never," said Mr. Herman Dousterswivel, "approach so near de cromme, that you call de great mis- story,—de Pancheba, de Polchocka—I do know as much of it as Pelaso de Taranta, or Basilus—and either I will bring you in two and three days de No. III. of Mr. Missulgoat, and you shall not know myself, and never look me in de face again no more at all."

The adept departed with this assurance, in the firm resolution of making good by letter part of the pro- gramme. Sir Arthur remained in a doubtful and anz- ulous state of mind. The positive assurances of the philosophers, with the hand of Panch, and so forth, produced some effect on his mind. But he had been too often deluded by such jargon to be absolutely relieved of his doubt, and he retired the evening into his library, in the darkness of the night, who, hanging over the window, who, without the means of retreat, perceives the stone on which he rests gradually departing from the rest of the crew, and about to give way with him. The visions of hope decayed, and there increased in proportion that feverish agony of anticipation with which a man, educated in a sense of consequence, and, perhaps, a father of a daughter of a noble name, and the father of two promising children—foresees the hour approaching which should deprive him of all the splendour which time had made him heir to, and send him forth into the world to struggle with poverty, with rapacity, and with scorn. Under these dire forbodings, his temper, exhausted by the sickness of delayed hope, became peevish and fretful, and he-words and ejaculations expressed a reckless desperation, which alarmed Miss Wardour extremely. We have seen, on a former occasion, that Sir Arthur was a man of passions lively and quick, in proportion to the weakness of his character in other respects; he was unused to contradiction, and if he had been hitherto, in general, good-humoured and cheerful, it was probably because the course of his life had afforded no such frequent provocation as to render his irritability habitual.

On the third morning after Dousterswivel's departure, Sir Arthur read the newspaper and letters of the day. Miss Wardour took up the former to avoid the continued ill-humour of her father, who had wrought himself into a violent passion, but now began to lose it.

"I perceive how it is," was his concluding speech on this interesting subject,—"my servants, who have had their share of my fortune, begin to think there is little to be gained from me in future. But while I am the scoundrel's master I will be so, and permit no neglect—no, nor endure a hair's-breadth diminution of the respect I am entitled to exact from them."

"I am resolved to leave you a legacy of service this instant," said the domestic upon whom the fault had been charged, "as soon as you order payment of my wages.

"And the honor, as if stung by a serpent, thrust his hand into his pocket, and instantly drew out the money which it contained, but which was short of the man's claim. What money have you got, Miss Wardour?" he said, in a tone of affected calmness, which which concealed violent agitation.

Miss Wardour gave him her purse: he attempted to count the bank notes which it contained, but could not do so. He threw the whole to his daughter, and saying in a stern voice, "Pay the rascal, and let him leave the house instantly!" he strode out of the room.

Miss Wardour, in a state of consternation and astonishment at the agitation and vehemence of his manner.

"I am sure, ma'am, if I had thought I was particularly wrong, I would have made my answer when Sir Arthur was speaking, but he has given me no service, and he has been a kind master, and you a kind mistress, and I wish you joy of the house when you are in it."

"And I thought there was not such an instant's haste."

"It is haste, Miss Wardour," answered her father, interrupting her,—"What I do hereforth in the case of my forefathers, must be done speedily, or never."

He then sat down, and took up with a trembling hand the box of tea prepared for him, protracting the outer layer of the packages, opening the post-letters which lay on the table, and which he led from time to time, as if they had been a nest of adders ready to start into life and upon his father.

"You will be happy to hear," said Miss Wardour, willing to withdraw her father's mind from gloomy reflections in which he appeared to be plunged. "But you will be happy, sir, that Lord Taffirih's gift has got to me, I think. I observe there had been apprehensions for his life, but I am glad we did not hear them till they were tried and reduced."

"And what is Taffirih and his gun-brig to me?"

"Sir!" said Miss Wardour in astonishment. "Sir Arthur, in his ordinary state of mind, is a fit signal of interest in all the gossip of the country, and country, and country."

"I say," he repeated, in a higher and still impatient key, "what do I care who is saved and is not? It's nothing to me. I suppose I didn't know you were busy, Sir Arthur, thought, as I have never attended to him, I could have said anything more happily;—this places the stone upon his new page, and is indeed a great news in return. And he caught up a letter, "It does not signify which I open first—they all lead to the same thing."

He broke the seal hastily, ran the letter over, and then threw it to his daughter,—"I've read it—read it aloud," said his father; "it is not to be read too often; it will serve to break your other news of the same kind."

She began to read with a faltering voice, "Sir!"

"He dears me too, you see,—this impatient.—a writer. Not a writer, a young fellow, the most particular, the most literary, the most contemptible, the most servile, the most cloying, the most ungrateful, the most peremptory;—"I see the contents are upon sir—it will only vex you my reading them aloud."

"If you will allow me to know my own Miss Wardour, I entreat you to go on—I pretend it was unnecessary, I should not ask you to the trouble."

"Having been of late taken into copartnership, timmed Miss Wardour, reading the letter, "by Gilbert C., a gentleman of lat connoisseur, and man of business, Sir Guy Greenaway, Esq., to the signet, whose business I conducted as merchant-house clerk for many years, which has been, I am happy to say, the most successful, my affairs being, of late, not very prosperous, in consequence of his absence at the Lamberts race, the honour to reply to your said favour."

"You see my friend is methodical, and common by explaining the causes which have procured so modest and elegant a correspondent—Go on and read it."

And he laughed that bitter laugh which is the most peculiar expression of mental mortification to proceed, and yet afraid to disobey. Wardour continued to read: "I am, for myself and partner, sorry we cannot oblige you by looking into the sums you mention, and the case of the Goldiebird's bond, which would more inconsistent, as we have been employed as the said Goldiebird's procurators and attorneys, which capacity we have taken, in the hope of avoiding you by the means left by the messenger, for the sum of four thousand seven hundred and fifty-six pounds five shillings and sixpence. the day wi’ a’ his tackle. I ken it frae aye o’ his concurrence, as they ca’ them, ’swards to meet him—and they’ll be about their wark beline—where things there needs nae kame—they shear close enough.

“Are you sure this bad hour, Edie, is so very near?—come, I know it, it will.

“I tell you, Edie, but dinna be cast down—there’s a heaven ower your head, as well as in that fearful night stiwe the Ballyboughness and the Halket-head. D’ye think He, who ruled the waters, canna protect you against the wrath of men, though they be armed with human authority?”

“It is, indeed, all we have to trust to.”

“Dinna ken—ye dinna ken when the night’s darkest, the dawn’s nearest. If I had a gude horse, or could ride him when I had him, I reckon there wad be help yet—’twas trusted to have gotten a cast wi’ the Royal Charlotte, but she’s cupped yonder, it’s like, at Kittlebrig. There was a young gentleman on the body and he behaved to drive; and Tom Sang, that said has mair sense, he believed to let him, and the daft callant couldna tak the turn at the corner o’ the hrig, and odd! he took the curb-stane, and he’s whelmed her as I wad whome a toom bicker—it was a luck I hadna gotten on the tap o’ her—Sae I cast down between hope and despair to see if ye wad send me on.”

“And, Edie—where would ye go?” said the young lad.

“To Tannoburgh, my leddy” (which was the first stage from Feaiport, but a good deal nearer to Knockwinnock,) “and that without delay—it’s a’ on your ain business.”

“Our business, Edie? Alas! I give you all credit for your good meaning, but—”

“But what is it that you would do at Tannoburgh?—or how can your going there benefit my father’s affairs?”

“Indeed, my sweet leddy,” said the subterfuge, “ye maun just trust that his secret to send Edie’s gray pow, and ask nae questions about—Certainly if I wad hae warred my life for you o’er night, I can hae nae reason to play an ill trick i’ ye in the day o’ your distress.”

“Well, Edie, follow me then,” said Miss Wardour, “and I will try to get you sent to Tannoburgh.”

“Mak haste, then, my bonny leddy, mak haste, for the love o’ goodness!” and he continued to exhort her to expedition” until they reached the castle.

CHAPTER XIII.

Let those see who will—I like it not—For, say he was a star to rank and song, and all the noise he is now divorced from By the hard dooms of stern necessity, I trust to mark his alder’s bair.”

Where Vanity adjusts her finery well ‘Tis the deep wrinkles of repentant anguish. Old Play.

When Miss Wardour arrived in the court of the Castle, she was apprised by the first glance, that the visit she was making was in a manner already taken place. There was confusion, and gloom, and sorrow, and curiosity among the domestics, while the retainers of the law went from place to place, making and breaking up the doors and chambers falling under their warrant of distress, or pouncing, as it is called in the law of Scotland. Captain M’Intyre flew to her, as struck dumb with the melancholy conviction of her being at the scene of ruin, she paused upon the threshold of the gateway.

“Dear Miss Wardour,” he said, “do not make yourself uneasy; my uncle is coming immediately, and I am sure you will find some way to clear the house of these rascals.”

“Alas! Captain M’Intyre, I fear it will be too late.”

“No,” answered Edie, impatiently—“could I but get to Tannoburgh. In the name of Heaven, Captain! contrive to get me some way on, and ye’ll do this poor ruined family the best day’s doing that has been done them since Redhand’s days—for as sure as ever I take my oath, he came true, Knockwood house and land will be lost and won this day.”

“Why, what good can you do, old man?” said Hector.

But Robert, the domestic with whom Sir Arthur had been so much displeased in the morning, as if he had been watching for an opportunity to display his zeal, stepped hastily forward and said to his mistress, “Miss Wardour, your orders on the carriage; if you please, I will.” If you are very skilful and full-about many things, as the diseases of cows, and horse, and sick like, and I am sure he disdains to be at Tannoburgh the day for once, he insists on this gate; and, if your leddyship pleases, I’ll drive him there in the taxed cart in an hour’s time—I was fain to be of some use—I could bite my very tongue out when I think on this morning.”

“I am obliged to you, Robert,” said Miss Wardour; “and if you really think it has the least chance of being useful”

“In the name of God,” said the old man, “you have been so long, less or more, I’ll gie ye leave to fling me ower Kittlebrig as ye come back again.”

But O man, haste ye, for time’s precious!—”

Robert looked at his Mistress as she retired into the house, and seeing he was not prohibited, flew to the stable-yard, which was adjacent to the court, in order to mount the carriage; the beggar was the personage least likely to render effective assistance in a case of pecuniary distress, yet there was among the common people of Edie’s circle, a general idea of his prudence and sagacity, which authorized Robert’s conclusion, that he would not so earnestly have urged the necessity of this expedition had he not been convinced of its utility. But so soon as the servant took hold of a horse to harness him for the tax-cart, an officer touched him on the shoulder—“My friend, you must let that beast alone, he’s down in the schedule.”

“You must remove nothing here,” said the man of office, “or you will be liable for all consequences.”

“What the devil, sir,” said Hector, who, having followed to examine Ochiltree more closely on the nature of his hopes and expectations, already began to be a little brattish with the terror of the terraces and mountains, and sought but a decent pretext for venting his displeasure, “have you the impudence to prevent the young lady’s servant from obeying her orders?”

There was something in the air and tone of the young soldier, which seemed to argue that his interference was not likely to be confined to mere expostulation; and, if it promised finally the advantages of a process of battery and deforcement, would certainly commence with the unpleasant circumstances necessary for founding such a complaint. The legal officer, confronted with him of the militia, grasped with one doubtful hand the greedy bludgeon which was to enforce his authority, and with the other produced his short official baton, tipped with silver, and having the inevitable ring upon it—“Captain!” said—“Sir, I have no quarrel with you—but if you interrupt me in my duty, I will break the wand of peace, and declare myself deforc’d.”

“I am the devil cares,” said Hector, totally ignorant of the words of judicial action, “whether you declare yourself divorced or married?—and as to breaking your wand, or breaking the peace, or whatever it is, all I know is, that I will break your bones if you prevent the lad from harnessing the horses to obey his mistress’s orders.”

“I take it as to witness,” said the messenger, “that I showed him my blazon and explained my character.—He that will to Cupar mun to Cupar,” and he shed his epigraphic ring from one end of the stick to the other, and gave the apposite symbol of his having been so illegitimately introduced in the discharge of his duty.
Honest Hector, better accustomed to the artillery the field than to that of the law, saw this mystical remonstrance with great indifference; and with like unconcern beheld the messenger set down to write out an execution on the old man's house. He was too busy to join the well-meaning hot-headed Highlander in running the risk of a severe penalty, the Antiquary arriving puffing and blowing, with his handkerchief doubled under his hat, and his wig upon the top of his stick.

“What the deuce is the matter here?” he examined, hastily adjusting his head-gear; “I have no such orders here. What means that idle log-head knocked against one rock or other, and here—and you parted with your Bucephalus, and quartering with Sweepclean. A messenger, Hector, is worse than a fine, whether it be the phoca pêta or the phoca vitulina of your late conflict.”

D—n the pox, sir,” said Hector, “whether it be gone or the other—I say d—n them both particularity—I think you would not have me stand quietly and see a scoundrel like this, because he calls himself a king's messenger, forsooth. (I hope the has many better for his meanest errand)—call it a young lad of family and fashion like Miss Wardour.”

“Rightly argued, Hector,” said the Antiquary; “but a king, like other people, has now and then a shabby sort of a crowd that leaks in, and a few fellows he has to do them. But even supposing you unaccustomed the statutes of William the Lion, in which, as in quartio, versus quinto, this crime of defacement temerarily despoits Domino Regis, a contempt, to rt, of the king himself, in whose name all legal dinge issues, could you not have inferred, from the information I took so much pains to give you to, that the man himself, I mean the mouth found, his hands were clenched; Don't mention his name, sir,” he vociferated, “unless you would see me go mad in your presence! That I should have been such a miserable dol—such an infatuated idiot—such a beast endowed with thire a beast's stupidity, to be led and driven and spur-galled by such a rascal, and under such ridiculous pretences—Mr. Oldbuck, I could tear myself when I think of it.”

“I only meant to say,” answered the Antiquary; “that this fellow is like to meet his reward; and I cannot but think we shall frighten something out of him that man who has the face to attack me has some unlawful correspondence on the other side of the water.”

“Has he—he has he—he has he, indeed?—then d— the household-goods, horses, and so forth—I will go to prison a happy man, Mr. Oldbuck—I hope in Heaven there's a reasonable chance of his being hanged?”

“Why, pretty fair,” said Oldbuck, willing to encourage this diversion, in hopes it might mitigate the feelings which seemed likely to overset the poor man's understanding; and moreover his mind. Mr. Oldbuck had some unlawful correspondence on the other side of the water.”

Coach being overturned—as how could it go safe with such a Jonah?—he has had an inward turmoil, is carried into a cottage near Kittlebrigg, and, to prevent all possibility of escape, I have sent your friend, Sweepclean, to bring him back to Fairport. In another moment, or to act as his sick-nurse at Kittlebrigg, as is most fitting. And now, Sir Arthur, permit me to have some conversation with you on the present urgency of your affairs, that we may see what can be done for their extraction; and the Antiquary led the way into the library, followed by the unfortunate gentleman.

The hotel was shut up together for about two hours, when Miss Wardour interrupted them with her cloak on, as if prepared for a journey. Her countenance was very pale, yet expressive of the composure which characterized her disposition.

"The messenger is returned, Mr. Oldbuck."

"Returned?—What the devil! he has not let the fellow go?"

"No,—I understand he has carried him to confinement; and now he is returned to attend my father, and says he can wait no longer." A loud wrangling was now heard on the staircase, in which the voice of Hector predominated. "You an officer, sir, and these ragamuffins a party! a parcel of beggarly tailor fellows—tell yourselves off by nine, and we shall show you our effective strength."

The indignant voice of the aggrieved law was then heard indistinctly muttering a reply, to which Hector retorted—"Come, come, sir, this won't do; march your people, call those, out of this house direct, or I'll send you a bill to the right about presently."

"The devil take Hector," said the Antiquary, hastening to the scene of action; "his Highland blood is up again, and we shall have him fighting a duel with the bailiff!—Come, Mr. Sweepclean, you must give us a little time—I know you would not wish to disturb your family."

"By no means, sir," said the messenger, putting his hat off, which he had thrown on to testify defiance of Captain M'Intyre's threats; but your nephew, sir, holds very uncivil language, and I have borne too much of it already; and I am not justified in leaving my prisoner any longer after the instructions I received, unless I am to get payment of the sums contained in my diligence."

And he held out the caption, pointing with the awful truncheon which he held in his right hand, to the formidable line of figures jotted upon the back thereof.

If Hector, on the other hand, though silent from respect to his uncle, answered this gesture by shaking his clenched fist at the messenger with a frown of Highland wrath.

"Well, you be quiet," said Oldbuck, "and come with me into the room—the man is doing his miserable duty, and you will only make matters worse by opposing him. I fear, Sir Arthur, you must accompany this man to Fairport; there is no help for it in the first instance—I will accompany you to consult what farther can be done—My nephew will escort Miss Wardour to Monkbarns, which I hope she will make her residence until these unpleasant matters are settled."

"I go with my father," Mr. Oldbuck, said Miss Wardour firmly—"I have prepared his clothes and my own—I suppose we shall have the use of the carriage?"

"Any thing in reason, madam," said the messenger; "I have ordered it out, and it's at the door—I will get the box with the coachman—I have no desire to intrude—but two of the consummats must attend on horseback.

"I will attend too," said Hector, and he ran down to do so himself.

"We must go then," said the Antiquary.

"To jail," said the Baronet, sighing involuntarily; "And what of that? he resumed, in a tone affected—They can't get out of after all—Suppose a fit of the gout, and Knockwinnock would be the same—Ay, ay, Monkbarns, we'll call it a fit of the gout without the d—d pain."

But his eyes swelled with tears as he spoke, and his faltering accent marked how much this assumed gayety cost him. The Antiquary wrung his hand, and, like the Indian Baniacs, who drive the real terms of an important bargain by signs, while they are not conscious of the apparently frivolous hand of Sir Arthur, by its convulsive return of the grasp, expressed his sense of gratitude to his friend, and the real state of his internal agony. They stopped slowly down the road, that they might see some object seeming to the unfortunate father and daughter to assume a more prominent and distinct appearance than usual, as if to press themselves on their notice for the last time.

At the first landing-place, Sir Arthur made an agonized pause; and as he observed the Antiquary look at him anxiously, he said, with assumed dignity—"Yes, Mr. Oldbuck, the descendant of an ancient line—the representative of Richard Redhand and Gamelyn de Guardover, may be pardoned a sigh when he leaves the castle of his fathers thus poorly escorted. When I was sent to the Tower with my late father, in the year 1745, it was upon a charge becoming our birth—upon an accusation of high treason, Mr. Oldbuck—we were escorted from Highgate to a street of life-takers, and came out of the portly custody of state's warrant; and now, here I am, in my old age, dragged from my household by a miserable creature like this, (pointing to the messenger,) and for a paltry sum of money!—"At least," said Oldbuck, "you now have the company of a dutiful daughter, and a sincere friend, if you will permit me to say so, and that may be some consolation to you without the other. There can be no hanging, drawing, or quartering, on the present occasion.—But I hear that cheery boy as loud as ever. I hope to God he has got into no new broil—it was an accursed charge that brought him here at all."

In fact, a sudden clamour, in which the loud voice and some stilted accents of Emily were again pre-emminently distinguished, broke off this conversation. The cause we must refer to the next chapter.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Fortune, you say, flies from us—She but circles, Like the fleet seagull round the Fowler's skiff,— Lost in the mist one moment, and the next,
Brushing the white sail with her whitier wing,
As the wind rises, or subsides the sun—Experiences wait on fortune. And has her seat:

Old Play.

The shout of triumph in Hector's warlike tones was not easily distinguished from that of battle. But as he rushed up stairs with a packet in his hand, exclaming, "Long life to an old soldier! here comes Edie with the budget of good news," it was obvious that his present cause of clamour was of an agreeable nature. He delivered the letter to Oldbuck, shook Sir Arthur heartily by the hand, and wished Miss Wardour joy, with all the frankness of Highland congratulation. The messenger, who had a kind of instinctive terror for Captain M'Intyre, drew towards his prisoner, keeping an eye of caution on the soldier's motions.

"Don't suppose I shall trouble myself about you, you dirty fellow," said the soldier; "there's a rascals for the fright I have given you; and here comes an old forty-two man, who is a fitter match for you than I am."

"The messenger (one of those dog who are not to scornful to cut dirty puddings) caught in his hand the grumes which, instead of going to the house, came warily and carefully the turn which mutter were now to take. All voices meanwhile were loud in inquiries which none one was a hurry to answer.

"What is the matter, Captain M'Intyre?" said Sir Arthur.

"Ask old Edie," said Hector; "I only know all safe and well."

"Why, what, all, Edie?" said Miss Wardour to the mendicant.

"Your leadership maun ask Monkbarns, for he has gotten the yesteyday correspondance."

"God save the King!" exclaimed the Antiquary.

"What is the matter, Captain M'Intyre?" said Sir Arthur.

"Ask old Edie," said Hector; "I only know all safe and well."

"Why, what, all, Edie?" said Miss Wardour to the mendicant.

"Your leadership maun ask Monkbarns, for he has gotten the yesteyday correspondance."

"God save the King!" exclaimed the Antiquary.
the first glance of the contents of his packet, and, surprised at once out of decorum, philosophy, and phlegm, he at once hastened to the other end of the room, where he descended not again, being caught in its fall by a branch of the chandelier. He next, looking joyously round, laid a grasp on his wig, which he perhaps would not have lost, had he not seen the smile on Caxton's face, and he stopped his hand, exclaiming, "Lordsake! he's gaun gye—mind Caxton's no here to repair the damage."

Every person not assailed the Antiquary, clamouring for his caustic, and before he got his well-known general transport, when, somewhat ashamed of his rapture, he fairly turned tail, like a fox at the cry of a pack of hounds, and ascending the stairs by two steps at a time, gained the first-floor landing, where, standing, he addressed the astonished audience as follows:—

"My good friends, forte lingues—To give you information, I must first, according to logicians, be possessed of it myself; and, therefore, with your leaves, I will retire into the library to examine these papers—Sir Arthur and Miss Wardour will have the good fortune to step into the parlour—Mr. Sweeteplan, secede pauuper, or, in your own language, grant us a superfluous of diligence for five minutes—Hector, draw off your forces, and make your bear-garden flourish elsewhere—and, finally, all of good cheer till my return, shall be my last sentence."

The contents of the packet were indeed so little expected, that the Antiquary might be pardoned, first his exclamation, and then his desire to communicate the intelligence they conveyed, until it was arranged and digested in his own mind.

Within the envelope was a letter addressed to Jonathan Oldbuck, Ess, of Monkbarns, of the following particulars:

"Dear Sir,—To you, as my father's proved and valued friend, I venture to address myself, being detained here by military duty of a very pressing nature. You must, by this time, be aware, through the entangled state of our affairs; and I know it will give you great pleasure to learn, that I am as fortunately as unexpectedly placed in a situation where I may be of advantage to extricate them. I understand Sir Arthur is threatened with severe measures by persons who acted formerly as his agents; and, by advice of a creditable man of business here, I have procured the enclosed writing, which I understand will stop their proceedings, until their claim shall be legally discussed, and brought down to its proper amount. I also enclose a sum of money, the inconsiderable endowment which I am forced to apply to them according to your discretion. You will be surprised I give you this hint in such a manner, but, I believe, this unexpected measure has been the occasion of these distresses. And as I owe the means of relieving Sir Arthur to the generosity of a matchless friend, it is my duty to take the most certain measures for the supplies being devoted to the purpose for which they were destined, and I know your wisdom and kindness will see that it is done. My friend, as he claims an interest in your regard, will give some view of his own in the enclosed letter. The state of the post-office at Fairport being rather notorious, I must send this letter to Tannoburgh; but the old man Ochtillo, whom particular circumstances have already placed in the interest, has information when the packet is likely to reach that place, and will take care to forward it. I expect to have soon an opportunity to apologize in person for the trouble I give, and am in honour to be your very faithful servant—REGINALD GAMILTON, Esq, of Monkbarns, Edinburgh, 6th August, 1792."

The Antiquary hastily broke the seal of the enclosure, whilst I gave great surprise and pleasure. When he had in some measure recovered himself after such unexpected tidings, he inspected the other papers carefully, which all related to this packet. He went into the cabinet, and wrote a short acknowledgment to be dispatched by that day's post, for he was extremely methodical in the money matters;—and, lastly, fraught with all the importance of a letter sent to Sir Arthur, he descended to the parlour.

"Sweeteplan," said he, calling his late visitor who stood respectfully at the door, "you must sweep yourself clean out of Knockwinkock Castle with all your followings, tag-rag and bob-tail. See to this paper, man!"

"A sias on a bill o' suspension," said the messenger, with a disappointed look; "I thought it would be a queer thing if ultimate disgrace was to be on against us."

"Sir Arthur, Well, I'm going my ways with my party,—And who's to pay my charges?"

"They who employed them," replied Oldbuck, "as I thought full well do not know. But here comes another: express: this is a day of news, I think."

This was Mr. Maites's letter on his march from Fairport, with a letter for Sir Arthur, another to the messenger, both of which, he said, he was directed to forward instantly. The messenger opened his, observing, that Greenhorn and Gridirden were good enough men for his expenses, and here was a letter from them desiring him to stop the diligence. Accordingly, he immediately left the apartment, and staying no longer than to gather his posse together, he did them in the phrase of Hector, who watched his departure as a real, vast and magnificent rout, the retreat of a repulsed beggar, evacuate Flanders.

Sir Arthur's letter was from Mr. Greenhorn, and was a curiosity to me. We give it, with the worthy Baronet's comments.

"Sir,—Oh! I am dear sir no longer; folks are only dear to Messrs. Greenhorn and Gridirden when they are in adversity. Sir, I am much concerned to learn, that, after my return from the country, where I was on particular business, [a bet on the sweepstakes, I suppose,] that my partner had the propriety, in my absence, to undertake the consequences. Goldie-inns in preference to yours, and had written to you in an unbecoming manner. I beg to make my humble apology, as well as Mr. Gridirden's—come, I see he can do as well as himself; and, at particular trust it is impossible you can think me forgetful of, or ungrateful for, the constant patronage which my family [his family! curse me for a puppy!] have uniformly experienced from that of Knockwinkock. I am sorry to find, from an interview I had this day with Mr. Wardour, that he is much irritated, and, I must own, with apparent reason. But, in order to remove this remonstrance as far as in me lies, I am, on the occasion of these distresses, and the same cause, to undertake the consequences of your blackmailer. I have only to add, that Mr. Gridirden is of opinion, that, if restored to your confidence, he could point out circumstances connected with Messrs. Goldie-inns and my present claim to you, to which I have only to add, that Mr. Gridirden is of opinion, that, if restored to your confidence, he could point out circumstances connected with Messrs. Goldie-inns and my present claim to your attention. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, GILBERT GREENHORN."

"Well said, Mr. Gilbert Greenhorn," said Monkbarns; "I see now there is some use in having two attorneys in one firm. Their movements resemble those of the man and woman in a Dutch baby-house."

"Well, in that you are right. The gentleman-partner to fawn like a spaniel; when it is foul, forth bolts the operative brother to pin like a bull-dog.—Well, I thank God, that my man of business still wears his regular apron. But, in the Old Town, is as much afraid of myself as I am myself, plays at golf of a Saturday, goes to the kirk of a Sunday, and, in respect he has no partner, hath only the inconvenience of being only to apologize for himself."

"There are some writers in your belief," said Hector: "I should like to hear any one say that my cousin, Donald McIntyre, Strathbran's weaver, (the other six are in the army,) is no honest man's fellow."

"No doubt, no doubt, Hector, all the M. INTYREK.
against each other in respectability. But never mind.
Sir Arthur—these are such sieges and such relics as our time can only unite in—and our age be not less worth commemorating in a glass of this excellent wine. Upon my credit, it is Burgundy, I think.
"Were there any thing better in the cellar," said Miss Wardour, "I should be too little to judge you after your friendly exertions.
"Say you so?" said the Antiquary—"why, then, a ep of thanks to you, my fair enemy, and soon may you be beloved as last hope to be, and your time of capitulation in the chapel of Saint Winton."

Miss Wardour blushed, Hector coloured, and then grew pale.

Sir Arthur answered, "My daughter is much obliged to you, Monkbarns; but unless you'll accept of her yourself, I really do not know where a poor knight's daughter is to seek for an alliance in these mercenary times."

"Me, mean ye, Sir Arthur?—No, not I; I will claim the privilege of the duello, and, as being unable to encounter my fair enemy myself, I will appear by my champion—But of this matter hereafter. What do you find in the papers there, Hector, that you hold your head down over them as if your nose were bleeding?"

"Nothing particular, sir; but only that, as my arm is now almost quite well, I think I shall relieve you of my company in a day or two, and go to Edinburgh. I see Major Neville is arrived there. I should like to meet him and Sir Arthur."

"Major whom?" said his uncle.

"Major Neville, sir," answered the young soldier.
And who the devil is Major Neville?" demanded
the Antiquary.

"O, Sir Oldbuck," said Sir Arthur, "you must remember his name frequently in the newspapers—a very distinguished young officer indeed. But I am too busy to look into that matter now. Take Monk-barns to see him, for my son writes that the Major is come to him with Knockwinnock, and I need not say how happy I shall be to make the young gentlemen acquainted—unless, indeed, they are known to each other already."

"No, not personally," answered Hector, "but I have had occasion to hear a good deal of him, and we have several mutual friends—your son being one of them. But I must go to Edinburgh; for I see my uncle is beginning to grow tired of me, and I am afraid."

"That you will grow tired of him?" interrupted Oldbuck, "I fear that's past praying for. But you have forgotten that the ecstatic twelfth of August approaches, and that you are engaged to meet one of Lord G—"'

"Bah!" said Sir Arthur, "let the peace be perpetuated in arms—so let us eat and drink in peace, and be joyful, Sir Knight."

A table was quickly covered in the parlour, where the party sat joyously down to some refreshment. At the request of Oldbuck, Edie Ochiltree was permitted to sit by the sideboard in a great leathern chair, which was placed in some measure behind a screen.

"I accede to this the more readily," said Sir Arthur, "because I remember in my father's days that chair was occupied by Ailisich Gourray, who, for sought I, was the last privileged fool, or jesters maintained by any family of distinction in Scotland.

"Awed, Sir Arthur," replied the beggar, who never hesitated an instant between his friend and his jest, "mony a wise man sits in a fule's soaly, and mony a fule in a wise man's, especialy in families o' distinction."

Miss Wardour, fearing the effect of this speech however worthy of Ailisich Gourray, or any other person called the last, now made her father, becom-tened to inquire whether ale or beef should not be distributed to the servants and people, whom the news had assembled around the Castle.

"Dear lady, miss," said Oldbuck, "when was it never otherwise in our families when a siege was been raised?"

Ay, a sort of laid by Stocker Sweepclane the ballad raised by Edie Ochiltree of the garbhat per noble fructum," said Oldbuck, "and well pitted which dragged that vehicle, hoc erat in vitio—These are the qualities that would subdue you, especially if she had a taste for natural history, and loved a specimen of a proverb car, a pretty warden," said Monk-barns; "and what's my wig to do all the while?"

"I asked! Caxon that very question," answered Ochiltree, "and he said he could look in like morning, and take a trot about from 10 to his bed, for there's another man to watch in the day-time, and Caxon says he'll frizz your honour's wig as well sleeping as waking."

"That newswear gave a sudden turn to the conversation, which ran upon national defence, and the duty of fighting for the land we live in, until it was time to part. The Antiquary and his nephew resumed their walk, which took a trot from Knocknookock with the warmest expressions of mutual regard, and an agreement to meet again as soon as possible.

"CHAP. XLIV.

Hector," said his uncle to Captain M'Intyre, in the course of their walk homeward, "I am sometimes inclined to suspect that, in one respect, you are a fool."

"If you only think me so in one respect, sir, I am sure you do me more grace than I expected or deserve."

"I mean in one particular, par excellence," answered the Antiquary, "I have sometimes thought that you have cast your eyes upon Miss Wardour."

"Well, sir," said M'Intyre, with much composure.

"Well, sir," echoed his uncle, "once deuce take the fellow—how is it you can consider the most reasonable thing in the world, that he, a captain in the army, and nothing at all besides, should marry the daughter of a baronet."

"I presume to think, sir," said the young Highlander, "there would be no derogation on Miss Wardour's part in point of family."

"O, heaven forbid we should come on that topic—no, certainly not. No, not any more on the table-land of gentility, and qualified to look down on every roturier in Scotland."

"And in point of fortune we are pretty even, since none of us have got any," continued Hector.

"There may be an error, but I cannot plead guilty to presumption."

"But here lies the error, then, if you call it so," responded M'Intyre; "she won't have you, Hector."

"Indeed, sir?"

"It is very sure, Hector; and to make it double sure, I must inform you that she likes another man."

She misunderstood some words I once said to her, and I have since been able to guess at the interpretation she put on them. At the time, I was unable to account for her hesitation and blushing; but, my poor Hector, I have understood them as a death-signal to your hopes and pretensions. So I advise you to beat your retreat, and draw off your forces as well as you can, for the fort is too well garrisoned for you to storm it."

"I have no occasion to beat any retreat, uncle," said Hector, holding himself very upright, and marching with a sort of dogged and offended solemnity;

"No man needs to retreat that has never advanced."

There are women in Scotland besides Miss Wardour, of as good family—"

"And better taste," said his uncle, "doubtless the better taste of Hector, and though I cannot say but that she is one of the most accomplished as well as sensitible girls I have seen, yet I doubt much of her merit would be cast away on you. A shaggy figure, now, with a red nose, and a mouth, and a pair of eyes that are as blue; who would wear a riding habit of the regimental complexion, drive a gig one day, and the next review the regiment on the gray trotting pony

Old Play.

"Any body, I suppose, may think as they please on such subjects," said Hector.

"Not according to the old school," said Oldbuck; "but, as I hear, the practice of the modern seems in this case the most prudent, though, I think, scarcely the most interesting. But tell me your ideas now on this prevailing subject of an invasion.—The French. They come."

Hector, swallowing his mortification, which he was peculiarly anxious to conceal from his uncle's sentimental observation, readily entered into a conversation which was to turn the Antiquary's attention away from Miss Wardour and the seal. When they reached Monkbarns, the communicating to the lady the events which had taken place at the Castle, with the counter information of how long dinimer had waited before the womankind had ventured to eat it in the Antiquary's absence, averted those delicate topics of discussion.

The next morning the Antiquary arose early, and, as Caxon had not yet made his appearance, he began mentally to feel the absence of the petty news and small talk, of which the ex-persuader was a faithful reporter, and which habit had made more necessary to the Antiquary as his occasional pinch of snuff, in which he held, or affected to hold, both to be of the same intrinsic value. The feeling of vacuity peculiar in such a situation, was alleviated by the appearance of old Ochiltree, sauntering beside the clipped yew and holly hedges, with the air of a person quito at home. Indeed, so familiar had he been of late that even his tread did not look at all like his.

"They are my house now, in great danger, Mon-barns—I just came free Fairport to bring us the event, and then I'll step away back again—the Search has just come into the bay, and they say she's been chased by a French fleet."

"The Search?" said Oldbuck, reflecting a moment.

"Oh!"

"Ay, ay. Captain Taffril's gun-boat, the Search."

"What is my relation to Search No. II?" said Old-buck, catching at the light which the name of the vessel seemed to throw on the mysterious chest of

The mendicant, like a man detected in a frolic, put his bonnet before his face, yet could not help laughing heartily. "Did the devil in you, Monkbarns, for amongst odds and events meet—What thought ye wad have had that and that together?—Old, I am clean catch'd now."
and then, when that German deevil was glowing at the lid o' the kist, (they liked mutton weel that day,) when the yowe was done, I'll carry some Scottish deevil put it into my head to play him yonither cantrip—Now, ye see, if I had said mair or less to Balie Littlejohn, I belief till hae come out wi' a' this nonsense, but Mr. Lovel being a man to think, when I began to have it brought to light—see I thought I would stand to any thing rather than that.

"I must say he has chosen his confidant well," said Oldbuck.

"I'll say this for myself, Monkbarne," answered the mendicant, "that I am the fittest man in the hail country to trust wi' all, for I neither want it nor use it; I have but to have it.

"But the lad hadna muckle choice in the matter, for he thought he was leaving the country for ever (I trust he's mistaken in that thought,) and the night was spent in their learned, by a strange chance, Sir Arthur's air distress, and Lovel was obliged to be on board as the day dawned. But five nights afterwards the baird stood into the bay, and I met the boat by appointment, and we buried the treasure where ye found it.

"This was a very romantic, foolish exploit," said Oldbuck—"why not trust, or any other friend?" asked his source of information, replied Oldbuck, "was the woman, and if he may be called a woman, who had time had to take counsel?—or how could he ask it of you, by any body?"

"You are right—but what if Dousterwivals had come before you?"

"There was little fear o' his coming there without Sir Arthur—he had got a saurghl the night before, and never intended to look near the place again, unless he had been brought into it again, day or night. The kent na the first pose was o' his ain hind, and how could he expect a second? He just havered on about it to make the mair o' Sir Arthur."

"Then how?" asked Oldbuck, "should Sir Arthur have come there unless the German had brought him?"

"I can't say," reply Edie dryly, "I had a story about Maiticott was he'd brought him forty miles, or you other. Besides, it was to be thought he would be for visiting the place he fond the first siller in—he kent na the secret o' that job. In short, the siller being in this shape, Sir Arthur in utter difficulties, and Lovel determined he should never ken the hand that helped him,—for that was what he insisted maist upon,—we couldn't think o' a better way to fix the baird's gate, and in summer and winter it e'er sae lang. And if by any queer mischance Dousterwivial got his claws o' he was trouble, he informed me or the Sheriff on the baird story."

"Well, notwithstanding all these wise precautions, I think your contrivance succeeded better than such a clumsy one deserved, Edie. But how the deuce came Lovel by such a mass of silver ingots?"

"That's just what I canna tell ye—but they were put on board wi' his things at Fairport, it's like, and we stowed them into ane o' the ammunition-boxes o' the baird, bith for concealment and convenience of carriage."

"I heard," said Oldbuck, his recollection recurring to the earlier part of his acquaintance with Love; and this young fellow, who was putting hundreds on so strange a hazard, I must be recommending a subscription to him, and paying his bill at the Ferry! I dare say he'll pay any person's bill again, that's certain.—And you kept up a constant correspondence with Lovel, I suppose?"

"Just got at scrip or a pen free him, to say there was, as yesterday fell, be a packet at Tamnonburgh, wi' letters o' great consequence to the Knockinnock folk; for they jeolosed the opening of our hail country that night. But that's as true, I hear Mrs. Maiticott is to be office for fowk after other folk's business and neglecting her ain."

"And what do you expect, now, Edie, for being the advance, and messenger, and guard, and confidential person in all these matters?"

"Deil hae do I expect—excepting that a' the gentlemen will come to the gaberlunzie's burial; and maybe we'll carry your clothes ye did pur Stennie Mucklebackie's. What troubles you about me? I was ganging about at any rate—O but I was blythe when I got out of prison, though, for I, thought, you know what if that ye early letter should come when I am closed up here like an oyster, and a' should gang wrang for want o' it, and whiles I thought I maun make a clean breast and tell you a' about it; but then I couldna feel do that without contravening Mr. Lovel's positive orders and I reckoned he had to see somebody at Edinburgh afore he could do what he wussed to do for Sir Arthur and his family."

"Well, and to your public news, Edie—So they are still coming, are they?"

"Troth, they say sae, sir; and there's come down strict orders for the forces and volunteers to be alert; and there's a clever young officer to come here forthwith, to look at our means o' defence—I saw the Bailie'slass cleaning his belts and white breeks—I gae her a hand, for ye maun think she wasnae ower clever in it, and see I gat a' the news for my pains."

"And what think you, as an old soldier?"

"Troth, as I daurn o'er, they come seen sae spiky as they speak o', they'll hae odds aganst them there's many yauld chields among thee volunteers; and I maunna say muckle about them that's no soe well and no soe able, because they're something that gait myself—but we're do our best."

"What! so your martial spirit is rising again, Edie?"

"Even in our ashes gow their wounded fires!"

"I would not have thought you, Edie, had so much to fight for?"

"Me no muckle to fight for, sir?—isna thee the country to fight for, and the burinsides that I gang dandering beside, and the heerths o' the gudewives that gie me my bit bread, and the bits o' weans that come toddling to play wi' me when I come about a landward town? Deil!" he continued, grasping his pikestaff with great emphasis, "an I had as gude pith as I ha'e gude-will, and a gude cause, I should gie some o' them a day's kemping."

"Bravo, brave, Edie! The country's in little aitie danger, when the beggar's as ready to fight for his dish as the laird for his land."

"Their fierce conversation reverted to the particulars of the night passed by the mendicant and Lovel in the ruins of St. Ruth; by the details of which the Antiquary was highly amused."

"I wouldna give a guinea, (if I had seen the scoundrelly German under the agonies of those tears, it is part of his own quackery to inspire into others; and trembling alternately for the fury of his patron, and the apparition of some hobgoblin."

"Troth," said the beggar, "there was time for him to be cowed; for ye wad hae thought the very spirit of Hall-in-Harness had taken possession o' the body o' Sir Arthur.—But what will come o' the land-louper?"

"I have had a letter this morning, from which I understand he has acquited you of the charge, and he brought against you, and offers to make such discoveries as will render the settlement of Sir Arthur's affairs a more easy task than we apprehended."

"So! writes the thieve! and, for God's sake, that man has given some private information of importance to government, in consideration of which, I understand he will be sent back to play the knave in his own country."

"And a' the bonny engines, and wheels, and the covered, and sheepwars, doun at Glenwirshines yonder, what's to come o' them?" said Edie.

"I hope the men, before they dispersed, will meet a bonfire of their gaurns as an army destroy their artillery when forced to raise a siege. And as for the holes, Edie, I abandon them as traps, for the benefit of the next wise man who may choose to drop the substance to snatch at a shadow."
Our Antiquary, his head wrapped warm in two double night-caps, was quietly enjoying his repose, when it was suddenly broken by the screams of his sister, his niece, and his mid-servant.

"What the devil is the matter?" said he, starting up in his bed,—"womankind in my room at this hour of night!—are ye all mad?"

The evening of the 19th, at 6 o'clock, the person who kept watch on the commanding station of Home Castle, being deceived by some accidental fire in the county of Northumber-land, which he took for the approaching and formidable enemy, immediately took up the county with which his orders were to communicate, lighted up his own beacon, and then immediately proceeded through all the valleys on the English Border. If the beacon at Drinkildon was lighted, the alarm would have run northward, and raised all the watch; but the water in the basin of that beet-ant point judiciously considered that there had been an actual or threatened descent of barbarians; and that it would have come along the coast, and not from the interior of the country.

Through the Border counties the alarm spread with rapidity, and on no occasion when that country was the scene of poisoning the companies at Dalkeith. The author was very much disordered. In Berwickshire, Roxburghshire, and Selkirkshire, the volunteers and militia got under arms with a degree of readiness and alacrity, which, considering the distance individuals from each other, had something in it very surprising; they poured to the alarm-posts on the wc-cot, in a state so well armed and so completely supplied, with baggage, provisions, &c., as was accounted by the best military judges to render them fit for instant and effectual service.

There were some particulars in the general alarm which were curious and interesting, as the description of Lieutenant Fishing in the most remote parts of the district, the few miles, and thirty miles from the place where they mustered they were nevertheless in a state of readiness, and in order as if they had been that, which was their alarm-post about one o'clock on the day succeeding the first signal, with men and horses in excellent order, then through the roads to the great state, and many of the troopers must have ridden forty or fifty miles without drawing a rein. Two men of the post, who were observed to be absent from their homes, and in Edinburgh on private business. The lately married wife of one of these gentlemen, and the widowed mother of the other, sent the army uniform, and chargers of the two troopers, that they might join their companies at Dalkeith. The author was very much surprised by the answer made to him by the last-mentioned lady, when he said his some compliment on the readiness which she showed in equipping her son; with the means of meeting dan-

The watch who kept his watch on the hill, and towards Birnam, probably conceived himself among when he first beheld the fated grove put into motion for its march to Dunblane. Even old Cæsar in the heat, he qualified his lights upon the approaching marriage of his Pipes, and the dignity of being father-in-law to tenant Taffi, with an occasional peep towards his eyes, and then, finding that they were not a little surprised by observing a light in that direction. He rubbed his eyes, looked again, adjusted his observation by a cross-staff which had been so as to bear upon the point. And behold, the increased, like a comet to the eye of the astronomer; "with fear of change perplexing nations.

The Lord preserve us! said Caxton, what is to one now? But there will be wiser heads than to look to that, said Ise el'f fire the beacon.

He lighted the beacon accordingly, which threw the sky a long waving train of light, startling eyes from their nests, and reflecting in it the strange eddies of the sea. The brother lars of Caxton being equally diligent, caught and said his signals. The lights glanced on headlands, caps and inland hills, and the whole district was noted by the signal of invasion.

Almost every individual was enrolled either in a or by civil capacity, for the purpose of contributing to a long suspended threats of invasion, which were echoed every quarter. Beacons were erected along the coast, and round about every point where his peculiar duty called him, and men of description fit to serve held themselves in readiness on shortest summons. During this agitating period, and en
The ANTIQUARY.

"The beacon, uncle!" said Miss M'Intyre.

"The French coming to murder us!" screamed Miss Griekla.

"The beacon, the beacon!—the French, the French!—and we must be up and warn them to fight!" cried the two handmaids, like the chorus of an opera.

"The French?" said Oldbuck, starting up,—"get out of the room, womankind that you are, till I get my men, my horses, my servants." His face looked as wild as a hare.

"Whilk o’ them, Monkbarns?" cried his sister, offering a Roman falchion of brass with the one hand, with the other an Andrea Ferrara without a hand.

"The langest, the largest," cried Jenny Rintherout, dragging in a two-handed sword of the twelfth century.

"Womankind," said Oldbuck, in great agitation, "be composed, and do not give way to vain terror.

"Are you sure they are come?"

"Sure!—sure!" exclaimed Jenny, "—oover sure!—a’ the sea fencebils, and the land fencebils, and the volunteers and yoonman, are on fit, and driving to Fairport as hard as horse and man can gang—and said Mucklebackit’s gane wi’ the lave—muckle good heid did ho—Hoch!—sure!—he’ll be miss’d the morn who wad ha’ served king and country weel!"

"Give me," said Oldbuck, "the sword which my father wore in the year forty-five—it hath no belt or buckle, but his own experience shall be the sheath of it."

"So saying, he thrust the weapon through the cover of his breeches pocket. At this moment Hector entered, who had been to a neighbouring height to ascertain whether the alarm was actual.

"Where are your arms, nephew?" exclaimed Oldbuck—"where is your double-barrelled gun, that was never out of your hand when there was no occasion for such a weapon?"

"Pooh! pooh! sir," said Hector, "who ever took a fowling-piece on action? I have got my uniform on, you see—I hope I shall be of more use if they will give me a sword instead of a gun, then I shall be as useful as ten double-barrelled guns. And you, sir, must get to Fairport, to give directions for the quartering and maintaining the men and horses, and preventing confusion."

"You are right, Hector. I believe I shall do as much with my head as my hand too—but here comes Sir Arthur Wardour, who, between ourselves, is not fit to accomplish much either one way or other."

Sir Arthur was probably of a different opinion; for, dressed in his lieutenancy uniform, he was also on the point to Fairport, and called in his way to take Mr. Oldbuck into his train. He was not from his original opinion of his sagacity much confirmed by late events. And in spite of all the entreaties of the womankind that he should stay to garrison Monkbarns, Mr. Oldbuck, with his nephew, instantly accepted Sir Arthur's offer.

Those who have witnessed such a scene can alone conceive the state of bustle in Fairport. The windows were glancing with a hundred lights, which, appearing and disappearing rapidly, indicated the confusion within doors. The women of lower rank assembled and clamoured in the market-place. The yoonman, pouring from their different glens, galloped through the streets, some individually, some in parties of five or six, as they had met on the road. The drum was beating, the volunteer bands, not being to arms, were blended with the voice of the officers, the sound of the bugles, and the tolling of the bells from the steeple. The ships in the harbour were lit up, and looked like thousands of little lights, and added to the bustle, by landing men and guns, destined to assist in the defence of the place. This part of the preparations was superintended by Taffin with much activity. Two or three of the vessels were already hauled up to the land, and stood out to sea, in order to discover the supposed enemy.

Such was the scene of general confusion, when Sir Arthur Wardour entered Fairport, and bade his men make haste to put the town-house into the principal square, where it was safe. The town-house was situated. It was lighted up, and the magistracy, with many of the neighbouring gentlemen, were assembled. And here, as upon other occasions of the like kind in Scotland, it was remarkable how the good sense and firmness of the people supplied almost all the deficiencies of experience.

The magistrates were beseamed by the quarter-masters of the different corps, and it was at length that Sir Arthur bade them put forward.

"Let us," said Bailie Littlejohn, "take the houses into our warehouses, and the men into our parlours—share our supper with the one, and our strong wine with the other, and thereby assert the rights and duties of free and paternal government, and now is the time to show we know its value."

A loud and cheerful acquiescence was given by all present. The substance of the wealthy, with persons of those of all ranks, were unanimously devoted to the defence of the country.

Captain M'Intyre acted on this occasion as military adviser and ad-de-camp to the principal magistrate, and displayed a degree of presence of mind, and knowledge of his profession, totally unexpected by his uncle, who, recollecting his usual inattention and impetuosity, gazed at him with astonishment from time to time, as he remarked the calm and steady manner in which he explained the various measures of precaution that his experience suggested, and directed the various corps in good order, considering the irregular materials of which they were composed, in great force of numbers, and high confidence and spirits. And, in many of the circumstances of the struggle, we cannot balance all other claims to consequences, that old Edie, instead of being left, like Diogenes at Smoke, to roll his tub when all around were prepared for defence, was rendered responsible for the serving out of the ammunition, which was executed with much discretion.

Two things were still anxiously expected—the presence of the Glenellan volunteers, who, in consideration of the importance of that family, had been formed into a separate corps, and the arrival of the other corps before announced, to whom the measurement of the quarters on the town was entrusted by the commander-in-chief, and whose commission would enable him to take upon himself the full disposal of his military force.

At length the bugles of the Glenellan Yeomanry were heard, and the Earl himself, to the surprise of all who knew his habits and state of health, appeared at their head in uniform. They formed a very large and solid column, which drove out of the Earl's Lowland tenants, and were followed by a regiment of five hundred men, completely equipped in Highland dress, drawn down from the upland glens, with their pipes playing in the van. The clean and serviceable appearance of this band of feudal dependants called forth the admiration of Sir Arthur M'Intyre; but his brother was still more struck by the manner in which, upon the crisis, the ancient military spirit of his house seemed to animate and invigorate the decayed frame of the Earl, their leader. He claimed, and obtained for himself and his followers, the post most likely to be of danger, displayed great acclivity in making the necessary dispositions, and showed equal acumen in discussing their propriety. Morning broke in the military councils of Fairport, while all concerned were still eagerly engaged in taking precautions for their defence.

At length a cry among the people announced "There's the brave Major Neville come at last, another officer;" and their post-chaise and horse dived into the square, amidst the huzzas of the volunteers. The Earl, the admiral, the assessors of the lieutenancy, hastened to the door of their town-house to receive him; but what was the surprise of all present, but most especially that of the Antiquary, a small military cap disclosing the name and features of the pacific Lovel! A warm embrace and a hearty shake of the hand, were necessary to assure Sir Arthur that the Earl was no less surprised to recognize his Captain Wardour, in Lovel's, or rather Major Neville's company. The first words of the young official were a positive assurance to the Antiquary, being

In the days when the world was young, and the days of the great war were ancient, there lived a man named Oldbuck. He was a man of great learning and a lover of antique things. He had a large collection of old books and manuscripts, and he spent much of his time dedicated to the study of ancient history.

But Oldbuck was not just a scholar. He was also a man of action. He was a brave explorer, who had ventured into many parts of the world in search of knowledge. He had discovered many secrets that had been hidden for centuries, and he was famous for his bravery and his courage.

Yet, despite his many accomplishments, Oldbuck was a humble man. He never boasted of his achievements, and he was always willing to help others. He was a true gentleman, and he was loved and respected by all who knew him.

One day, Oldbuck received a letter from a friend. The letter contained a strange tale, and it caught Oldbuck's attention immediately. He decided to investigate the matter, and he set out on a journey to solve the mystery.

As he traveled, Oldbuck encountered many obstacles and challenges. He faced dangers and overcome them with his wit and courage. He met many interesting people along the way, and he learned much from them.

Finally, Oldbuck arrived at the location where the mystery was said to be. He was greeted by a group of people who were eagerly waiting for him. They told him of the strange things that had happened, and they asked him to help them.

Oldbuck listened carefully to their story, and he began to understand the situation. He knew that he had to act quickly, and he set to work immediately.

After much effort, Oldbuck was able to solve the mystery. He uncovered the truth, and he was able to bring peace to the people who had been suffering.

Oldbuck returned home a hero, and he was celebrated for his bravery. He continued to travel and to explore, always seeking knowledge and adventure. He was a true gentleman, and he will always be remembered for his courage and his generosity.
"And Edie Ochiltree here—you see I know the whole story. But how came you by the treasure?"

"It was a quantity of plate which had belonged to my uncle, and was left in the custody of a person at Fairport. Some time before his death he had sent orders that it should be melted down. He perhaps did not wish me to see the Glenallan arms upon it!"

"Well, Major Neville, or—let me say—Lovel, being the name in which I rather delight, you must, I believe, exchange both of your alias's for the style and title of the Honourable William Geraldin, commonly called Lord Geraldin."

The Antiquary then went through the strange and melancholy circumstances concerning his mother's death.

"I have no doubt," he said, "that your uncle wished the report to be believed, that the child of this unhappy marriage was no more—perhaps he might himself have an eye to the inheritance of his brother—he was then a gay wild young man—But of all intentions against your person, however much the evil consciousness of Elspeth might lead her to suspect him from the agitation in which he appeared, Terese's story and your own fully acquit him. And, now, my dear sir, let me have the pleasure of introducing a son to a father."

We will not attempt to describe such a meeting. The proofs on all sides were found to be complete, for Mr. Neville had left a distinct account of the whole transaction with his confidential steward in a sealed packet, which was not to be opened until the death of the old Countess; his motive for preserving secrecy so long appearing to have been an apprehension of the effect which the discovery, fraught with so much disgrace, must necessarily produce upon her haughty and violent temper.

In the evening of that day, the yeomanry and volunteers of Glenallan drank prosperity to their young master. In a month afterwards, Lord Geraldin was married to Miss Wardour, the Antiquary making the lady a present of the wedding ring, a snare circle of antique chasing, bearing the motto of Aldobrand Oldenbock, Kunst macht gunst.

Old Edie, the most important man that ever was a blue-gown; bowls away easily from one fresh house to another, and boasts that he never tires unless on a sunny day. Latterly, indeed, he has given some symptoms of becoming stationary, being frequently found in the corner of a snug cottage between Monkbar and Knockwinnoch, to which Caxton retreated upon his daughter's marriage, in order to be in the neighbourhood of the three archial wigs, which he continues to keep in repose, though only for amusement. Edie has been heard to say, "This is a high-born place, and it's a comfort he has a corner to sit in in a bad day." It is thought, as he grows stiffer in the joints, he will finally settle there.

The bounty of such wealthy patrons as Lord and Lady Geraldin flowed copiously upon Mr. Hadrew and upon the Mucklebackits. By the former it was well employed, by the latter wasted. They continue, however, to receive it, but under the administration of Edie Ochiltree; and they do not accept it without grumbling at the channel through which it is conveyed.

Hector is rising rapidly in the army, and has been more than once mentioned in the Gazette, and receives proportionately high in his uncle's favour. And what scarcely pleases the young soldier less, he has also shot two seals, and thus put an end to the Antiquary's perpetual harping upon the story of the place. People talk of a marriage between Miss M'Intyre and Captain Wardour; but this was confirmation.

The Antiquary is a frequent visitor at Knockwinnoch and Glenallan-house, ostensibly for the sake of completing two essays, one on the mail-shuttle of the Great Earl, and the other on the left-hand granite of Hell-in-harness. He regularly inquires whether Lord Geraldin has commenced the Caledonian, and shakes his head at the answers he receives. But attendant, however, he has completed his two pieces which, we believe, will be at the service of any one who chooses to make them public, without risk of expense to the Antiquary.

END OF THE ANTIQUARY.
For why? Because the good old rule Sufficeth them; the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.

INTRODUCTION.

The author projected this further encroachment on the field of an ideal public, he was at some loss for a title; and, in vain, he sought an appropriate name of some propriety which it included. This cannot be attributed to the distinction of his youth, though that of a gentleman, had it nothing of eminence, and gain wealth from the transactions of his either, though he lived a busy, pre-est, and enterprising life. He was no favorite with the public, no less distinguished. He owed his name in a great degree to his paternity, to the memory of his father, and and such pranks in the beginning of the 19th century, as are ascribed to Robin Hood in the middle ages, and that of the University. Thus a character like his, blending the tunes, the public policy, and unequaled license of an Indian, was flourishing in Scotland during the August of Queen Anne and George l. And it is true, that would have been considerably surprized if they had that there existed in the same island with them a per son of Rob Roy's peculiar habits and professions. It is in this contrast between the civilized and cultivated mode of the one side of the Highland line, and the wild and adventures which were habitually undertaken, and d by one who dwell on the opposite side of that ideal which created the interest attached to his name.

INTRODUCTION.

The title of Rob Roy was suggested by the name of MacGregor, as used by Scott of Atholl about 1767. Hence their original surname is Mac-Alpine, and usually called the Clan Alpine. An individual tribe of them return the same name. They are accounted one of the most ancient clans in the Highlands, and it is certain they were a people of original Celtic descent, and occupied at one period very extensive possessions in Perthshire, Kinclaven, shire, which they in a great extent protected and defended by the authority of the Red Farmers. The Earl of Argyll and the Earl of Breadalbane, in the meanwhile, managed to bring the lands occupied by the MacGregors enclosed in several charters which they easily obtained from the Crown, and thus constituted a legal right in their own favour, without, any previous claim or occupation of their own subjects, by war and murder, or by any other means which they may impose, those of their most uncivilized neighbors. A Sir Dun Can Campbell of Lochow, known in the Highlands by the name of Donnell Bhean na Carrachaidhe, that is, Black Duncan with the Cowl, he being his pleasure to wear such a head-gear, is said to have been very successful in those acts of spoliation upon the clan MacGregor.

The devoted keep, ever finding themselves intuitively driven from their possessions, defended themselves by force, and oc-riually gained advantages, which they used cruelly enough.
This conduct, though natural, considering the country and time, was unjustly represented at the capital as arising from an interchange and inordinate cruelty, which nothing, it was said, could reasonably, save cutting off the tribe of MacGregur rout and branch.
In an act of Privy Council at Stirling, 25th September, 1583, in the reign of Queen Mary, commissary is granted to the most powerful nobles, and chiefs of the place, to pursue the clan Gregor with fire and sword. A similar warrant in 1642, not only grants the like powers to Sir John Campbell of Glenochy, the descendant of Duncan with the Cowl, but discharges the liege of revenue to assist any of the clan Gregor, or afford them, under any colour whatever, meat, drink, or clothes.

An act by which the clan Gregor committed in 1586, by the murder of John Bruce of Drummond-vrouch, a follower of the lord John of Glenchrist, is otherwise given, with all its horrid circumstances. The clan swore upon the sacred head of the murdered man, that they would make common cause in waving the death. This led to an act of the Privy Council, directing another crusade against the "wicked clan Gregor, or long continuing in blood, slaughter, theft, and robbery," in which insults of fire and sword are denounced against them for the space of three years. The reader will find this narrative fully illustrated in the Introduction to the Legend of MacGregor, in the present edition of these Novels.

Other occasions frequently occurred, in which the Mac-Gregors suffered, but commerce to their hands, that they had often experienced severity, but never oppression. Though they were

INTRODUCTION TO ROY.

To inspire general confidence, and raise him in the estimation of the country in which he resided.

His importance was increased by the death of his father, in consequence of his appointment as Vice-Marshal of the household to his elder brother, Prince Charles. In 1712, he was created a Knight of the Garter, and in 1714 he was appointed Governor of Cork. In 1715, he was made a baronet, and in 1720 he was created a Viscount.

It was at this time that Rob Roy acquired an interest in the Church of Scotland, and in the cause of the Covenant. He was a strong supporter of the cause of the Covenant, and was one of the leading spirits in the Scottish Kirk. He was a member of the Presbytery of Perth, and was one of the leading spirits in the Kirk of Scotland.

Unfortunately, that species of commerce was and is liable to sudden fluctuations; and Rob Roy was by a sudden depression of markets, and a friendly visit from a kinsman, the bare want of provision for himself and his family, the property of his father, and the money provided for his consumption by his mother, was utterly exhausted.

The Duke of Montrose, who conceived himself out of danger, was not sorry to get rid of the expenses of the camp, and the court and furniture of the house.

It is said that this alliance of the law, as it is called in Scotland, is a mere fancy, and that the Duke of Montrose, who had no better than his own word to depend on, was induced to agree to the proposal of Rob Roy, in order to get rid of the expense of the camp.

In the meantime, Rob Roy had contrived to throw off the mask which he had worn, and to assume the character of a man of honor and integrity.

The Duke of Argyll was also one of Rob Roy's protectors, and was his chief supporter. He was a man of great ability, and was well versed in the art of war.

INTRODUCTION TO ROY BOW.
INTRODUCTION TO ROB ROY.

The low-country men succeeded in getting possession of the bridge, and he tried to draw down a close, and, as a Bryan says, "went upon his way and was seen no more."

We have already stated that Rob Roy's conduct during the injunction over the MacGregors was the subject of severe blame. His personal and political influence was not to be reckoned with, and he was regarded as a great force by the Highlanders. He was, however, a considerable obstacle to the government of the country, and his influence was felt in the north, where he was known as the "King of the Border." His power was based upon his wealth and his ability to command troops.

But while in the city of Aberdeen, Rob Roy met a delegation of the MacGregors, who came with an offer of peace. The terms of the peace were agreed to, and Rob Roy was appointed as their representative in the negotiations.

The terms of the peace were:
1. The MacGregors would surrender their arms and lay down their swords.

INRODUCTION TO ROB ROY.

In their correspondence by Roman Catholic priests, or nominating clergymen, and who are not masters of any property, may easily be formed into any mold, and so there is nothing to lose, and so can case be used to attempt any thing. Nothing can make their condition worse; conclusions and troubles do commonly. The advice that is by those by better it.

As the practice of contracting for black-mail was an obvious encouragement to rape, and a great obstacle to the course of justice, it was, by the statute 1547, cap. 21, declared a capital punishment, and by some lords it was held that it was out of sort of tax. But the necessity of the case prevented the execution of this severe law, and any attempt to carry it into operation on submitting to a certain unlawful imposition rather than put the risk of utter misfortune, which would have been impossible to prevent those who have lost a very large sum of money by robbery, from compounding with the fellows for the restoration of a part of the loss

At what rate Rob Roy levied black-mail, I never heard stated; but the rate was generally one in six, which he agreed with various landholders of estates in the counties of Perth, Stirling, and Lanarkshire, to recover cattle stolen from them, or to pay the value within a month of the loss being informed, if such information were made to him with sufficient dispatch, in consideration of a sum on each in the value of one, or one head of black cattle, or of sheep exceeding the number of six, fell under the agreement.

Rob Roy's profite upon such contracts brought him in a considerable revenue in money or cattle, of which he made a prod-genious use; but, as usual, he never let his gain be known. The minister of the parish of Balmagh, whose name was Robinson, was at one time threatening to pursue the parsis of the extent of his power for an augmentation of his income. Rob Roy, who was familiar with the minister's necessities, consented to allow him the sum necessary to assure him that he would do well to abstain from this project, as the people of the village were on the point of breaking out in open revolt. To make him seek his indemnification, MacGregor presented him every year with a row and a fat sheep, and no undertaker who had to deal with the minister was said to have affected the reverend gentleman's confidence.

The following account of the appearance of Rob Roy, upon an application to him from one of his contractors, is in so thing very interesting to me, as told by an old countryman in person on the spot. 'In the late tax,' said the Lemon, who was present, 'I could not pick out Stirling, as was expected, but it was certainly without the shires, and was on the road from Edinburgh to Roxburgh. He was a man of sufficient force, and of manner which the narrator accompanied his recollections, it may have been that even a little more assumed fleeing with fear, as was expected, were so many

INTRODUCTION TO ROB ROY.

As Rob Roy advanced in years he became more habituated to his habits, and learned to feel no protection whatever. Rob Roy observing this, directed one of his followers to afford the old man a present of a short dram; for the 'rallying song' he may have said the freebooter, 'keep himself warm by walking about and watching the cattle.' His informant heard the words, and, as the wind grew more and more cutting, it seemed to freeze the very blood with the cold. The weather at this time was wretched, as it was at w-Duke's house, and he said, but never could forget the cold of that night; in so much that, in the bitterness of his heart, he cursed the 'rallying song' as being a lie. At length, the sense of cold and weariness became so intolerable, that he resorted to the cottage of an old woman, and sheltered himself there.

With that purpose, he concluded himself down behind one of the most bulky of the Highlanders, who acted as lieutenant to the party. He had observed the leader of the man a large person, he covered a share of his plaid, and by imperceptibly lifting his head, and gathering his shoulders together, he communicated his presence, as if to a congregation in some pious asylum, and slept sound till day break, when he awoke, and was terribly afraid on observing that his nocturnal operations had astonished the diminutive wassel's neck and shoulders, which, lacking the plaid which he should have profaned, he poured out his feelings, as he has said, 'I am a poor fellow.' Not to increase his sensations, he added: 'Aye, teetles, yet there is a hearth.

The lad rose in great dread of a beating, at least, when it should be found how luxuriously he had been accommodated at the expense of a principal division of the party. Good Mr. Lieutenant, however, got up and shook himself, rubbing off the hearth fruit with the back of his hand; and, as if to increase his disgust, they drove on the cattle, which were restored to their owners, and they were not likely to be thought a tale, yet it contains materials both for the poet and artist.

It was perhaps about the same time that, by a rapid march through the middle of Rob Roy's own territory, the Duke of Atholl actually surprised Rob Roy, and made a request to the Duke's followers, named James Stewart, and made fast to him by a horse-girl. The man who had him thus in charge was greater in the business of law. There is no information of the man, now deceased, who lately kept the inn in the vicinity of Loch Katrine, and who has the paradox of a name, for he was seen within three years. From him I learned the story many years before he was a publican, or a guide, or mortar-fowler. It was over the same territory. At this time they were passing on to judge his prisoner, so long sought after in vain, in some place of service, there were no men to whom he was more subject, for which reason, MacGregor took an opportunity to consult Stewart, by all the ties of old acquaintance and good-neighbourhood, to give him some advice, and such as he adjusted, which Stewart was moved with compassion, perhaps with fear. He slipped the gaps. In this case, there was a horse-girl to whose attention the Duke's croupe, divided, swam, and escaped, very much as described in the story. When James Stewart came on shore, the Duke hastily demanded where his prisoner was, and so, as no distinct answer was returned, instantly suspected Stewart's connivance at the escape of the outlaw, and drawing a stroke pistol from his belt, struck him down with a blow on the head, from the effects of which, his descendant said, he never completely recovered.

In the success of his repeated escapes from the pursuit of his person, which was not without usual terminations. He wrote a mock challenge to the Duke, which he circumscribed about in a bottle. The reader will find this document in the Appendix. It is written in a good hand, and not particularly deficient in grammar or spelling, though the reader may understand that it was a piece of humour—a quip, in short.—on the part of the Duke to curry favour, acknowledged such a retort in reality. This letter was written in the year 1701.

In the following year Rob Roy composed another quip, very little, but his own reputation, as it were, as it contained praise of King George, but for his liability to be thrown into jail for a civil debt, at the instance of the Duke of Montrose. Being thus defamed from taking the right side, he acknowledged he embraced the wrong one, that he were an upright subject, and the rebels soldiers, it were worse than to be in such a stirring world, than to embrace the worst side, were it as black as a coal. He would not stand neutral in such a debate, Rob seems to lay down as an undeniable principle, that the Princes having been forced into an unnatural rebellion against King George, he pleads that he not only avoided acting offensively against his King, but he was ready, nay, sent to what he considered as a world, which he could collect from time to time; for they have sent to many who have gone to the left.

What influence this plea had on General Wade we have no knowledge.

Rob Roy appears to have continued to live very much as usual, his fame, in the meanwhile, passed beyond the narrow limits of his country to which he so much belonged. He appeared in London during his lifetime, under the title of the Highland Chief, in a catch-spelling publication, as frontispiece to a parcel of a species of songs, which stood at the foot in length, and his acquaintance was greatly magnified as his personal appearance. This Song, though with little accuracy; but the greater part of the pamphlet is entirely fictitious. Its greatness so exorbitant.

"Such an allusion is ascribed to the robber, Donald Waverley, p. ix.

Waverley states, that Appin himself was Rob Roy on this occasion. My recollection, from the account of a friend, was as stored in the text. You have no information on so distant a point, as it is such a thing as very well to be as great a thing as ever was.
INTRODUCTION TO ROB ROY.

The spirit of chivalry was at that time so strong—which must be added the wish to assure the adherence of stout, a'espèce, and, as the Scottish phrase goes, the representative of the noble family of Perth condescended to act openly as patron of the MacGregors, and appeared as such in the eyes of the people. The pattern was followed by the late Robert Macintosh, Esq. advocate. The circumstances may be found in the life of Charles MacGregor, treasurer of the MacGregor country, and, notwithstanding his outlawry, a learned and gentleman of some property. His wife died a few years after.

The inscription of 1745 soon afterwards called the MacGregors to arms. Robert MacGregor, the chief of the MacGregors, was not only esteemed as a gentleman of the Mc-

In some visions of letters of James it appears, that his birth was written on the occasion of this, by not being a law, renewed the army with six companies, and was present at the battle of Culloden. After that defeat the clan MacGregor kept together in a body, and did not dispense till they had turned into their own country. They brought James Roy with them in a litter, and, with great honor, was permitted to reside in the MacGregor country along with his brothers.

James MacGregor Drummond was attainted for high treason with persons of more importance. But it appears he had been allowed to some communion with the government. In that case quoted, he mentions having obtained a pass from the Lord John Clerk in 1725, with which he was admitted into the military. The circumstance is obscurely stated in one of the letters already quoted, but may perhaps, joined to subsequent events, authorize the supposition that the universal father, could look at both sides of the cords. As the confusion of the country subsided, the MacGregors, like fuxes which had baffled the hounds, drew back to their old haunts, and lived unmolested. But an outrage too strong, in the sons of Robert Roy were conscious of being at length on the family the full vengeance of the law.

James Roy was a married man, and had fourteen children. But his brother, Robert Oig, was now a widow; and it was, received, if possible, that he should make his fortune by carrying off and marrying, by some whom, as we were informed, no friendly nonsense could exceed the am.

The inscription of a military force. An account of his birth was obtained from a Highland regiment lying in Inverness, and there he was known as an officer, and close to the court. We need not refer to the raps of the Sabines, or to a simple multiplication in the Book of the City of Rome. These are facts, and of course the chivalrous violence have been committed upon a large scale. Indeed,

The MacGregors, who probably never thought of any serious opposition, received their money and went to America, where, having, must have sought to introduce them from their younger sons a new system, which they prospered.

dark, when Rob proposed to halt for the night upon a wide meadow, since he saw nothing but a cold north-west wind, with forest and wing, was whistling to the tune of the Pipers of Strath-Dean. This turned out to be a very bad night, and the dew froze his health comfortably enough, but the Lowlanders had no protection whatever. Rob Roy observed the gathering dawn, and his constant lowliness made a tale of two of his pld: ‘for the callant boy’s ma’, said the freebooler, ‘keep himself warm by a fire, and let him freeze. A fire is the only thing a man can do to the heart, if he is not a companion of the dead, and he must have his blood in his veins. He had been exposed to weather all his life, and he said, but never should he cool the fire of that night; and as the frost was now as hard as iron, he made a great effort to make the bright moon go on giving him no heat with so much light. At length he was able to do this, and he took an interest in the party. He gave them a character, that he resolved to desert his watch to seek some rest and shelter. With that purpose, he coach himself dawn behind one of the men, and in a bare moment of his life, he was a companion to the party. Not satisfied with having secured the shelter of the man’s life, he determined to make his the man’s bread. To Rob Roy, he drew a circle of his own, and led him on the road. The above can hardly be termed a tale, but it remains the most material for the poet and artist.

If I am right, he had a fine mind for me in the Blue Bunchadoon, and bath in the head of a host of his own to make. He had in the Black Bunchadoon, and he made his manner strange. He was mounted behind one of the Duke’s followers, named James Stewart, and made fast to him by a horse’s hair, and a rope, so that when they saw his granduncle, the intelligent man of the same name, new dreams. He was not the same, for the sake of his own, and he Leck Kattron, and acted as a guide to visiters through that beautiful scenery. From him I learned the story a few years before he was either a pilot or a spy, or a spy, and a spy to the Eternity. If at all evening, (to resume the story,) and the Duke was pressing on to London. He was captured, and was given the command of his own, and much more as described in the tale. And when James Stewart came out, the Duke, hastily demanded his prisoner was, and give no distinct answer was returned, instantly suspected Stewart’s constancy at the escape of the outlaw; and drawing a steel pistol from his belt, struck him down with a blow on the head, from the effects of which, his descendant said, he never completely recovered.

Rob’s first of his several escapes from the pursuit of his powerful enemy, Rob Roy at length became wanted and face, and his friends were much the favourite of the Scottish people, very little to his own reputation, as in therin confesses having played a part during the civil war of 1715. It is addressed to General Wad, at that time engaged in disarming the Highland clans, and making military roads through the country. The letter is a singular composition. It sets out the writer’s real and un-figured desire to have offered his service to King George, but for his liability to be thrown into jail for a civil debt, at the instance of the Duke of Montrose. Being thus disburdened from the right side, he acknowledged he embraced the wrong one side, and was at the same time, a man of the old school, and the rebels soldiers, it was once shame to be idle in a situation so face to have acknowledged him as a rebel, and he could not make it impossible. He of his being naturally in such a state, Rob Roy understood the propriety of the case.

At the same time, while he acknowledged he had been forced into an unnatural rebellion against King George, he pleaded the excusable plea of thinking it would have been a great advantage to him, had he not been a rebel. Having accepted Major’s forces on all occasions, but, on the contrary, sent to what intelligence he could collect from time to time; in the truth of which he refers to his Grace the Duke of Argyll.—What influence this plea had on General Wad we have no means of knowing.

Rob Roy has appeared to have continued to live very much as usual. His manners, his habits, his dress, all leaving but little to the imagination, the country in which he resided. A pretended history of him appeared in London during his lifetime, under the title of the Highland Chief; but it is not known whether it was from the catch-key of the Duke of Argyll, bearing in front of the author a title of honor, with a board of heart in length, and a board in breadth, and such other parts as his appearance. Some few of the best known anecdotes of the hero are told, though with little accuracy; but the greater part of the story is fictitious. It is written in a style of fiction, which is very common in our literature. No one but a native of the Highlands can take any interest in it now, so distant is it, that it is possible it may be useless. In truth, it was written under few duties, but very well written, and has an excellent entertainment.

INTRODUCTION TO ROB ROY.

is the highest degree unsympathetic to him; and his late expedition to London had been attended with many suspicious circumstances, among which was the fact that he had not kept his purpose secret from his chief, Bolaide. His intercourse with Lord Bolaide had been so secret that it was probable, like Don Bernard de Castel Blazo, in Gil Blas, little disposed to like those who kept company with Alphonse. Sir Donald, of London, and still less disposed to lend an information against James Drummond before the High Court of Dundee, finding himself to be in a manner, the utter distress of this man, whose faults may have scavenged from a wild disposition, would be to have been on the turner, will not be pursued without some pity. In his last letter to Bolaide, dated Paris, 21st September, 1754, he describes his state of insurrection as absolute, and expresses himself as willing to exercise his talents in breaking or breeding horses, or as a hunter or foaler, if only he could procure himself in such an inferior capacity till something better should occur. An Englishman may and shall ever continue, with the pretence, in the which poor starving exile asks the loan of the patron's bagpipe that he might play over some of the melancholy tunes of his own land. But the effect of his remarks was a great degree, from association, and sounds which mutilate the ear of man. in the nerves of a London parson, who has wandered over his lofty mountain, wild lake, and the deeds of his fathers' tales. To prove MacGregor's claim to our reader's confidence, we here give the following part of the last letter:

"By all appearance I am born to suffer crosses, and it seems they are not at an end. I am in no wise an exile of my own country, and placed pretty near two circumstances. A remarkable Highland story must breathe, and the effect of it,中有Ill, of Glencoe, he is still under the mind, and not the unordered but his own stature. The injured person of MacGregor, a natural of Arisaig, and no member of any family of note in society, to the murder, and condemned and executed upon very little more than the evidence of an accused person having assisted a nephew of his own, Alistair MacGregor. Alistair MacGregor was secreted to troop Stewart to exeat, and bring him over to Britain to a certain Dennis. This was done, and he was, as we have never been near at hand; lastly, Oig was now in custody at Edinburgh, and James and Edwart MacGregor be the object of this service by which he might be

The joint force of these motives may, in James's case of his confederates, and play some certain part in such an enterprise, although the end necessarily be just, then it was not by means of MacGregor as a licentiate to return to the Crown, he was definitely asked to bring to Allan Bristow nothing with that young gentleman. MacGregor, suspected James's intentions towards him. He did not possess a thorough knowledge of the part played by the Porteous portmanteau of some clothes and four snuff-boxes. A cringe, it may be observed, could scarce have been made, the part had been living on a feeling of intimacy, and come to other bagpipe.

ough James Drummond had thus missed his blow in the end of Allan Bristow, he used his licence to make a trip to London, and had an interview, as he avered, with Lord Bolaide. His Lordship, and the Under Secretary, put passing questions to him; and, as he says, offered him a lib which would bring him bread, in the Government a. This office was advantageous as to emolument; but opinion of James Drummond, his secret income, it would be said, and he has accused no person of being a traitor to his country. If such a tempting offer and sturdy roa had been similar to that which had been published in some of espionage on the Jacobites, which the Government known. The reason is well known. James Drummond, as he has said, had shown no great misery of feeling. MacGregor was so far accommodating as to inti his secret to the Government, to which he had been introduced, and directed to quit England. As he was in this condition, he seems to have been altogether. He was seized with fever and gravel, ill con in body, and weakened and dispelled in mind, Allan Bristow, was seized with a fit of fever. The condition is of the ancient Pestilence standing upon his reputation.

as a man likely in such a matter to keep his James Drummond MacGregor and he, like Katherina and Pe the beginning of the French Revolution. About 1789, a friend also elapsed since the poor woman died, which is always a strong circumstance in favour of the accused; for there is a sort of perspective in guilt, and crimes of an old date seem less odious than those of recent occurrence. But notwithstanding these considerations, the jury, in Robert's case, did not express any solicitude to save his life, as they had done that of James.
They found him guilty of being at and part in the forcible abduction of Jean Rigg from her own dwelling.
Rob Roy was condemned to death, and executed on 16th February, 1566. At the scene of execution he behaved with great docility; and professing himself a Catholic, implored all his misfortunes to his everlasting from the true church two or three years before. He confessed the violent methods he had used to gain Mrs. Rigg, or Wright, and hoped his fate would stop further proceedings against his brother James.*

The newspapers observe that his body, after hanging the usual time, was delivered to his friends to be carried to the Highlands. To this the recollection of a venerable friend, a cousin, taken from us in the fulness of years, then a schoolboy at Linlithgow, enables the author to add, that a much larger body of MacGregors than had cared to advance to Edinburgh received the corpse at that place with the coronach, and other wild emblems of Highland mourning, and so escorted it to the quarry. Thus, we may conclude this long account of Rob Roy and his family, with the classic phrase,

"ITC. CONCLAMATUM EST."

I have only to add, that I have selected the above from any anecdotes of Rob Roy, which were, and may still be, found among the mountains where he flourished; but I am far from warming their exact authenticity. Clanachan particulars are very apt to guide the tongue and pen as well as the public clariators, and the features of an anecdote are wonderfully enlarged or exaggerated, as the story is told by a MacGregor to Campbell.

ADVERTISEMENT FOR APPREHENSION OF ROB ROY.

(From the Edinburgh Evening Courant, June 15 to June 21, A.D. 1712. No. 1656.)

"That Robert Campbell, commonly known by the name of Rob Roy MacGregor, being lately intercepted by several noblemen and gentlemen with considerable sums for buying cows for them in the Highlands, has treacherously gone off with the money, to the value of 1000l. sterling, which he carries along with him. All Magistrates and Officers of his Majesty's forces are directed to arise upon the said Rob Roy, and the money which he carries with him, until the persons concerned in the money be heard against him; and that notice be given, when he is apprehended, to the people of the Exchange Coffee-house at Edinburgh, and the keeper of the Coffee-house at Glasgow, which persons are still continued in possession, shall be very reasonably rewarded for their pains."

It is unfortunate that this Hus and Cry, which is afterwards repeated as a charge on the reputation of Rob Roy's person, which, of course, we must suppose to have been pretty generally known. As the last account of Rob Roy's person concerned had supposed him to be in possession of the money.

LETTERS FROM AND TO THE DUKES OF MONTROSE, RESPECTING ROB ROY and MR. GRAHAM OF KILLIEARN.

The Duke of Montrose to —

"Glasgow, the 4th November, 1716.

"My Lord,—I was surprised last night with the account of a very remarkable instance of the insolence of that very notorious rogue Rob Roy, whom your lordship has often heard named. The honour of his Majesty's government being concerned in it, I thought it my duty to acquaint your lordship of the particulars by an express."

"Mr. Graham of Killearn (whom I have occasion to mention frequently to you, for the good service he did last winter during the rebellion) having the charge of his Majesty's forces in the West, went to Montrose, which is a part of it, on Monday last, to bring in his rents, it being usual for him to be there for two or three nights together at this time of the year, in a country house, for the convenience of meeting the tenants, upon that occasion he was at Blair Atholl. Rob Roy, with a party of those ruffians whom he has always kept about him since the late rebellion, surrounded the house where Mr. Graham was with some of his men, and others of his party came and summoned to present their guns in att the windows of the room where he was, and burned the house itself at the same time with others entered at the door, with cocked pistols, and made Mr. Graham prisoner, carrying him away to the hills with the money he had got, his books and papers, and his tenants' bonds for their fines, amounting to above a thousand pounds sterling, whereof one half had been paid last year, and the other was to have been paid now; and at the same time had the insolence to cause him to write a letter to me (the copy of which is enclosed) offering me terms of a treaty.

"That your Lordship may have the better view of the matter, it is proper to inform you that the low has now, of a long time, put himself at the head of the Clan MacGregor, a race of people who, in former times, have distinguished themselves beyond others, by robberies, depredations, and murders, and have been the constant harbingers and entertainers of vagabonds and loose people. From the time of the Revolution he has taken every opportunity to appear against the government, and to make a stir rather as a robber than as a recreant, and to serve to those whom he pretended to appear for, and has really done more mischief to the country than all the other Highlanders put together.

"Some three or four years before the last rebellion broke out, he was given over with one of his adherents, his ordinary residence, and removed some twelve or sixteen miles farther into the Highlands, putting himself under the protection of the Earl of Breadalbin. When my Lordship saw him in the Highlands, he ordered his house sit this place to be burnt, which your Lordship sees he has done."

"This obliges him to return to the same country he went from, and in the same manner, where he took up his residence anew amongst his own friends and relations; but it does not appear to whom this letter was addressed. Certainty, from the date and the person designated for the same, his high rank and affairs—perhaps the King's Advocate for the time."

well judging that it was possible to surprise him, he, with above forty-five of his followers, went to Inverary, and made a sham surrender of the castle of Coll, Campbell of Coal. Campbell of Coal, one of the Independent Companies, retreating homewards with his men, each of them having the Coll's protection. This happened upon the attempt of an army to be formed against him, not long after he appeared with his men twice in arms, in opposition to the King's troops; and one of those times caused them, restored a prisoner from them; and this while sent abroad his party through the country, pioneering the country people, and amongst the rest some of my tenants.

"Being informed of these disorders after I came to Scotland, I applied to Lieut. Genl. Carpenter, who ordered three parties from Glasgow, Stirling, and Finlarig, to march in the night by different routes, in order to surprise him and his men in their houses, which would have had its effect certainly if the great rains that happened to fall that very night had not retarded the march of the troops, so as some of the parties came too late to the stations that they were ordered for. All that could be done upon the occasion was to burn a country house, where Rob Roy then resided, after some of his men had taken refuge upon the King's troops, by which a grenadier was killed.

"Mr. Graham of Killearn, as my deputy sheriff is that country, went along with the party that marched from Stirling; and, doubting of the success of the march, he sends me these lines, which give me some treatment from that barbarous people on that account. Besides, that he is my relation, and that they know how active he has been in the service of the government, he is not sure that it does not put me under very great concern for the gentleman, while, at the same time, I can force no manner of way to relieve him, other than to leave him to chance and his own management.

"I had my thoughts before of proposing to government the building of barracks, as the only expedient for stopping these rebels, and securing the peace of the country; and in that view I spoke to General Carpenter, who has some of them in his hands; and I am persuaded that it will be the true method for restraining them effectually; but, in the meantime, it will be necessary to leave him to the command of the troops in whose hands I intend to write to the General.

"I am sensible I have trespassed your Lordship's with a very long letter, which I should be ashamed of, were I myself singly concerned; but where the honour of the King's Government is touched, I need make no apology, and shall only beg leave to add, that I am, with great respect, and truth,

"My Lord, yt. Lords, most humble and obedient servant,

"MONTROSE."

COPY OF GRAHAME OF KILLIEARN'S LETTER ENCLOSED IN THE PRECEDING.

"Craggaich, Nov. 18th, 1716.

"May it please your Grace,—I am obliged to give you my Grace the trouble of this, by Robert Roy's commandings, being so unfortunate at present to be a roofless person. In the way and manner I was apprehended, to the bearer, and shall only, in short, acquaint your Grace with the demands, which are, that your Grace shall grant me a pardon, to present myself, and give him the sum of 4000 marks for his loss and damages sustained by me in his service, besides my chinsellions; and that your Grace shall give your word not to trouble or prosecute him afterwards; till which time he carries me, all the money I received this day, my books and bonds for his fine, excepted, and money paid me, and with assurances of hard usage, if any party are sent after him. The sume I received this day, conform to the nearest computation I can make before several of the gentlemen, is £222. 12s. 6d. Scots, of which I gave them notes. I shall wait your Grace's return, and ever am,

THE DUCHESS OF MONTROSE TO

"Glasgow, 28th Nov. 1716.

"Sir,—Having acquainted you by my last, of the 21st instant, of what had happened to my friend Mr. Graham of Killearn, I am very glad now to tell you, that last night I was very agreably surprised with Mr. Graham's coming here himself, and giving me the first account I had had of him from the time of his being carried away. It seems Rob Roy, when he came to consider a little better of it, found that he could not mend his case by any manner of way. He, therefore, not only exposed him still more to the justice of the government; and therefore the less he consented to commit him on Sunday evening last, having kept him from the Monday night before, under a very necessary and reasonable restraint, being obliged to change continually from place to place, to give him this small comfort by giving him some money, but also some bonds, but kept the money.

"I am, with great truth, Sir, your most humble servant,

"MONTROSE."
APPENDIX TO INTRODUCTION.

No. III.

CHALLENGE OF ROB ROY.

"In charity to your Grace's courage and conduct, please know, the one of your Grace's men so much to himself, in appointing your place and choice of arms, that at once you may extirpate your infidel enemy, or put a period to your person a manly life in falling gloriously by his hands. That imperceptible criticks or flatterers may not brand me for simulating a man's heart's parts of a most dastardly soul, it much know that I admit of the two great supporters of his character and the captain of his bands to join with you in the combat. In the name of God, your Grace would brave the inclemency all court for multitudes to hunt me like a fox, under profuse that I was not to be found above the ground. This saveth your Grace and the troops any further to search; that is, if your ambition of glory press you to embrace this unequal venture offered of Rob's head. But if your Grace's pravity, prudence, and cowardice, forbids hazarding this comestly expedient, then let your design of peace restore what you have robbed from me by the tyranny of your present situation, otherwise your overthrow as a man is determined; and advertise your friends never more to look for the frequent civility paid you, of sending them home without their arms only. Even their former cravings were purchase that favour; so your Grace by this means has peace in your offer. If the sound of war be frightful, and chase where you will, your good fortune will follow you."

This singular philanthomast is inscribed in a letter to a friend of Roy Roy, probably a retainer of the Duke of Argyle in Islay, which is in these words:—

Sir,—Receive the enclosed paper as you are taking your bottle; and be assured and content you are not worse than I saw you, only or we had before about the Spaniards is like to continue. If I get any account about them I'll be sure to let you hear of it, and I will not write more till I have more account.

I am, Sir, your affectionate (counsellor), and most humble servant,

"ROB ROY."
CHAPTER I.

"Hom me have I sinn'd, that this affliction Should light so heavy on me? I have no more soone;
And this no more from me. Mrs. Mary and I Hang o'er his head that thus transform'd then—Travel \ I'll send my home to travel next."

MONSIEUR VOMAR.

"You have requested me, my dear friend, to bestow some of that leisure with which Providence has bestowed the decline of my life, in registering the happiest and most interesting events of my career. The recollection of those adventures, as you pleased to term them, has indeed left upon my mind a chequered and varied feeling of pleasure and pain, mingled with a sense of responsibility. That portion of the human race which has lived an early career through much risk and labor, that the ease with which he has blessed my long and peaceful life, might seem so far from understanding or appreciating the true and proper value of life. Nevertheless, it is possible for me to doubt, that you have often affirmed, that the incidents enriched me among a people singularly primitive their government and manners, have something in common with the events of a more refined society. Still, however, you must remember, that the tale by one friend, and listened to by another, loses its value when committed to paper; and that the narratives to which you have been attuned as heard from the voice of him to whom they came, will appear less deserving of attention when rushed into the inclusion of your studies. But your youthful and robust constitution promise longer life than will, in all human probability, be the lot of our friend. Throw, then, these sheets into some book of your own, and we shall return to our separate paths, each from the society by an event which may occur at any moment, and which must happen the course of a few—a very few years. When are parted in the world, in this grave and certain the truth; you will, I am well aware, cherish more than it serves the memory of your departed friend, and will in those details which I am now to commit to per for their melancholy but not obliterate rec others. Nothing can be more distressing to confidences of their own exterior features. I put into their hands a few lines of my earliest likeness, and of my failings, with the safety of the night, that the follies and headstrong insolence of my youth will meet the same kind consideration and forgiveness which have so often attended the tale of a man of matured age. I have advantage, among the many, of addressing Memoirs (if my tale these sheets a name so posing) to a dear and intimate friend, is, that I myself speak of my own actions, and with which I must needs have attained a from what I have to say of greater interest. Why must I be most of all to you, because and have ink, paper, and before me. At the same time, I dare not pro pose that I may not abuse the opportunity so tempt-ding to me, to treat of myself and my own conzine, even though I speak of circumstances as strong as I would to myself. The seductive love of ative, when we ourselves are the heroes of the which we tell, often disregards the attention to time and patience of the audience, and the only that you will remind of the singular instance eviscera the form of that rare and original edition of Sully's smooshy, which you (with the fond vanity of a book-collector) insist upon preferring to that which is re duced to the useful and ordinary form of Memoirs out of which I think I must be as solitary and narrative is the more far greater the man as the author was accessible to the foible of self-importance. If I recollect rightly that venerable peer and great statesman had appointed no fewer than twenty men to his bowels, to draw up the events of his life, under the title of Memoria of the Sage and Royal Affairs of State, Domenical, and Military, transacted by Henry V. and so forth, etc., their compilation, reduced the Memoirs containing all the remarkable events of their master's life into a narrative, addressed to himself in propria persona.
Of which must have been many of his twelve indebtedness and, though whimsical pleasure, of having the events of his life told over to him by his secretaries, being himself the auditor, as he was also the hero, and probably the author, of the whole book. It must have been a great sight to have seen the ex-minister, as the Duke of York, in the act of describing such were your grace's sentiments upon this important point—such were your secret counsels to the king on that other emergency,"—circumstances, all of which must have been made by the window, in hearer than to themselves, and most of which could only be derived from his own special communication.
My situation is not so very critical as that of the great Sully, and yet there would be some whimsical in Frank Osbaldstone giving Will Tresham a formal account of his birth, education, and connections in the world. I will, therefore, write with the spirit of P. P., and work for our Parteth, as I best may, and endeavour to tell you nothing that is familiar to you already. Some things, however, I must recall to your memory, because, though formerly well known to you, they may have been forgotten through lapse of time, and they afford the groundwork of my destiny.

You must remember my father well; for as your own was a member of the mercantile house, you knew him from infancy. Yet you hardly saw him in his best days, before age and infirmity had quenched his ardent spirit of enterprise and speculation. He would have been a poor man, indeed, but perhaps as happy, had he devoted to the extension of science those active energies, and acute powers of observation, for which commercial pursuits found occupation. Yet, in spirit of that age and the fortune of the na-country, there is something captivating to the ad-vourer, even independent of the hope of gain.
Who embarks on that fickle sea, requires to possess the skill of the pilot and the fortune of the na-gator, and after all may be wrecked and lost, unless the gales of fortune breathe in his favour. This mixture of necessary attention and inevitable hazard,— the frequent and awful uncertainty whether prudence shall prevail, or whether fortune will put the business as well as for the feelings of the mind, and trade has all the fascination of gambling without its moral guilt.
Early in the history of our house, when (for the sake of my narrative) I was a youth of some twenty years old, I was summoned suddenly from Bourdeux to attend my father on business of importance. I shall never forget our trim.
interview. You recollect the brief, abrupt and somewhat stern mode in which he was wont to communicate his pleasure to those around him. Methinks I see him now, in my mind's eye, in his full and upright figure—the step, quick and determined—the eye, which shot so keen and so penetrating a glance—the features on which care had already planted wrinkles. He was a workman and his language was a wasted word in vain, expressed in a voice which had sometimes an occasional harshness, far from the intonation of the speaker.

Within a few days from my post-horse, I hastened to my father's apartment. He was traversing it with an air of composed and steady deliberation, which even my arrival, although an only son unseen for years, was unable to rouse. I thrust myself into the niche. He was a kind, though not a fond father, and the tear twinkled in his dark eye, but it was only for a moment.

Doubourg writes to me that he is satisfied with you, Frank.

"I am happy, sir."

"But I have less reason to be so," he added, sitting down at his bureau.

"Profits are small.

"Sorry and happy, Frank, are words that, on most occasions, signify little or nothing—Here is your last letter.

It took it out from a number of others tied up in a parcel of red tape, and curiously labelled and filed. There lay my poor epistle, written on the subject of the nearest to my heart at the time, and couched in words which I had thought would brook no alteration; but, if not, I was to learn, the mixture of hurt vanity, and wounded feeling, with which I regarded my remonstrance, to the penning of which there had gone, I promise you, some trouble, as I would not be seen to dictate letters of advice, or credit, and all the commonplace lumber, as I then thought them, of a merchant's correspondence. Surely, thought I, a letter of such importance (I dared not say, even to myself, so well written) deserved a separate place, as well as more anxious consideration, than those on the ordinary business of the counting-house.

But my father did not observe my dissatisfaction, and would not have minded it if he had. He proceeded, with the letter in his hand. "This, Frank, is yours of the 21st ultimo, in which you advise me, (reading from the letter,) that in the most important business, when a man is to commit a large sum of money for life, you trust my paternal goodness will hold you entitled to at least a negative voice; that you have insuperable—ay, insuperable is the word—I wish, by the way, you would write a more distinct current, to draw a score through the top of your t's, and open the loops of your I's—insuperable objections to the arrangements which I have proposed to you. There is much more to the same effect, occupying the four good pages of paper, which a little attention to perspicuity and distinctness of expression might have comprised within as many lines. For, after all, Frank, it amounts but to this, that you will not do as I would have you."

"That I cannot, sir, in the present instance, not the least."

"Well, it is very little with me, young man," said my father, whose inflexibility always possessed the air of the most perfect calmness and self-possession. "Can not be a more civil phrase than will not. But the expressions are synonymous where there is no moral impossibility. But I am not a friend to doing business hastily; we will talk this matter over after dinner—Owen!"

Owen was not in the because the silver locks which you were used to venerate, for he was then little more than fifty; but he had the same, or an exactly similar uniform suit of light brown clothes, the same pair of silver buckles, the same plated carmine ruffles, drawn down over his knuckles in the parlour, but mended from life, what would become of the world of schemes which he had formed, unless his son were moulded into a commercial Hercules, fit to sustain the weight when relinquished by the falling Atlas? and what of all the rest of myself, a stranger to business of this description, he found himself at once involved in the labyrinth of mercantile concerns, without the clue of knowledge necessary for his guidance? For all these reasons, avowed and secret, my father was determined I should embrace his profession; and when he was determined, his resolution of no man was more immovable. Indeed, I implored and beseeched him to consider something of his own pertinacity, I had formed a determination precisely contrary.

It may, I hope, be some palliative for the resistance for which I was placed, and ample maintenance in the meanwhile, it never occurred to me that it might be necessary, in order to secure these blessings, to submit to labour and limitations unpleasant to my nature. In the summer following, as a trial for my engaging in business, a desire that I should hold to those heaps of wealth which he had himself acquired; and imagining myself the best judge of his judgments as to my own happiness, I endeavoured to convince him that I should improve that happiness by augmenting a fortune which I believed was already sufficient, and more than sufficient, for every use, comfort, and elegant enjoyment.

I am compelled to repeat, that my time at Bourdeaux had not been spent as my father had proposed to himself. What he considered as the chief end of my residence in that city, I had postponed for every other, and (worse than that) I had neglected it altogether. Dubourg, a favoured and beneficed correspondent of our mercantile house, was too much of a shrewd politician to make such request as the firm did, to the firm. If he, child, as excite the displeasure of both; and, he might also, as you will presently hear, have views of selfish advantage in suffering me to neglect the purposes for which I was placed, under his charge.

My conduct was regulated by the bounds of decency and good order, and thus far he had no evil report to make, supposing him so disposed; but, perhaps, the real purpose only in his father's provision was to oblige me to go. I was of the opinion, had I been in the habit of induling worse feelings than those of indolence and avarice to mercantile business. As it was, while I gave a decent appearance of honesty and probity to which he was accustomed, he was by no means envious of the hours which I devoted to other and more classical amusements, nor did he ever find fault with me for mirth and jest, as the case required. Therefore, by way of amusement or消遣, (supposing his refusals to have been), and Monsieur Dubourg able to have pronounced his name, or Savary, or any other writer on commercial economy. He had picked up some where a convenient expression, with which he had turned off every letter to his correspondent. "I was all," he said, "that a father could wish."

My father never quarrelled with a phrase; however provoking it might be assumed to him distinct and expressive; and Addison himself could not have found expressions so satisfactory to him as, "Yours received, and duly honoured the bills enclosed as per margin."

Knowing, therefore, very well what he desired me to be, Mr. Osbaldstone made no doubt, from the frequent repetition of Dubourg's favourite phrase, that I was not lost, when he beheld me. After an evil hour, he received my letter, containing my elegant and detailed apology for declining a place in the firm, and a desk and stool in the corner of the dressing-chamber, furnishing in height those of Owen, and the clerks, and only inferior to the tripod of my father himself. All was wrong from that moment. Dubourg's reports became as suspicious as if his bill had been noted for disease. I was summoned home in all haste, and received in the manner I have already communicated to you.

CHAPTER II.

I begin shrewdly to suspect the young man of a terrify tact—inity: with some degree of illness, if not of the hope of him in a state of cure. Actus est of him for a commonwealth's man, if he go't so in thine sense.

Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair.

My father had, generally speaking, his temper under complete self-command, and his anger rarely indicated itself by words, except in a sort of dry testy manner, to show that I was as wholly in discomfiture and disrepute, threats, or expressions of loud resentment. All was arranged with him on system, and it was his practice to do "the needful" on every occasion, without wasting time. My father, as a bitter smile that he listened to my impatient answers concerning the state of commerce in France, and unmercifully permitted me to involve myself deeper and deeper in the mysteries of age, tardy and tret; nor can I charge my memory with his having looked positively angry, until he found me unable to explain the exact effect which the depreciation of the house of France had been put on the negotiation of bills of exchange. "The trade is wretched; and, of a sudden occurrence in my time," said my father, (who nevertheless had seen the Revolution,) "and he knows no more of it than that"

"Mr. Francis," suggested Owen, in his timid and conciliatory manner, "cannot have forgotten, that by an arrêt of the King of France, dated Ist May, 1790, it was provided that the porteur, within ten days after due, must make demand." Mr. Francis," said my father, interrupting him, "will, I dare say, recollect for the moment any thing you are so kind as hint to him. But, body o' me! do you know how Dubourg could permit him, as he did? why, Owen, what sort of a youth is Clement Dubourg, his nephew there, in the office, the black-haired lad?"

"One of the cleverest clerks, sir, in the house; a prodigious man for the time; he studied with a post-commerce; for the gain and civility of the young Frenchman had won his heart."

"Ay, ay, I suppose he knows something of the nature of exchange. Dubourg was determined I should have one youngster at least about my hand who understood business; but I see his drift, and he shall find that I do so when he looks at the balance-sheet. Owen, let Claude think of his time up to next quarter-day, and let him ship himself back to Bourdeaux in his father's ship, which is clearing out yonder."

"Dismiss Clement Dubourg, sir!" said Owen, with a faltering voice. "Yes, sir, dismiss him instantly; it is enough to have a stupid Englishman in the counting-house to make blunders, without keeping a sharp Frenchman there."

I had lived long enough in the territories of the Grand Monarque to contract a hearty aversion to arbitrary exaction of authority, even if it had not been instilled into me with my earliest brooding; and I could not refrain from interposing to prevent an innocent and meritorious young man from paying the penalty of having acquired that proficency which my father had desired for me.

"The pardon, sir," when Mr. Osbaldstone had done speaking, "but I think it but just, that if I have been negligent of my studies, I should pay the forfeit myself. I have no reason to charge Monsieur Dubourg with having neglected to give me opportunities of improvement, however little I may have profited by them; and, with respect to Monsieur Clement Dubourg,"

"With respect to him, and to you, I shall take the measures which I see needful," replied my father; "but it is fair in you, Frank, to take your own blame on your own shoulders—very fair, that cannot be denied. I cannot consent to Owen, for having merely accorded Frank the means of useful knowledge, without either assisting, that he took advantage of them, or reporting to us if he did not. You see, Owen, he has bestowed more of equity becoming a British merchant.”
"Mr. Francis," said the head clerk, with his usual formal inclination of the head, and a slight elevation of the right hand, which he had acquired by a habit of sticking his pen behind his ear before he spoke—

"Mr. Francis seems to understand the fundamental principle of all moral accounting, the great ethic rule of Libor. Let A be 5, B be 10, then A + B = 15; the product will give the rule of conduct required."

My father smiled at this reduction of the golden rule to a mathematical, but I proceeded.

"All this signifies nothing, Frank; you have been throwing away your time like a boy, and in future you must learn to live like a man. I shall put you under Owen's care for a few months, to recover the lost ground."

I was about to reply, but Owen looked at me with such a supplicatory and warning gesture, that I was involuntarily silent.

"What!" continued my father, "resume the subject of mine of the 1st ultim, to which you sent me an answer which was unadvised and unsatisfactory. So now, fill your glass, and push the bottle to Owen."

"Want of courage—of audacity, if you will—was never my failing. I answered firmly, "I was sorry that my letter was unsatisfactory, unadvised it was not, and the proposition altogether made me instant and anxious attention, and it was with no small pain that I found myself obliged to decline it."

"My friend bent his keen eye for a moment on me, and instantly withdrew it. As he made no answer, I thought myself obliged to proceed, though with some hesitation, and he only interrupted me by saying—"

"It is impossible, sir, for me to have higher respect for any character than I have for the commercial, even were it not yours."

"I am disposed to think so."

"It connects nation with nation, relieves the wants, and contributes to the wealth of all; and is at the general commonwealth of the civilized world what the daily intercourse of ordinary life is to private society, or air and food are to our bodies."

"Well, sir?"

"And yet, sir, I find myself compelled to persist in declining to adopt a character which I am so ill qualified to undertake."

"I will take care that you acquire the qualifications necessary. You are no longer the guest and pupil of Dubourg."

"It is my dear sir, it is no defect of teaching which I plead, but my own inability to profit by instruction.""

"Nonsense! have you kept your journal in the terms I desired it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Be pleased to bring it here."

The volume thus required was a sort of commonplace book, kept by my father's recommendation, in which I had been directed to enter notes of the miscellaneous information which I had acquired in the course of my studies. Foreseeing that he would demand inspection of this record, I had been attentive to inscribe such particulars of information as would most likely be pleased with, but too often the pen had discharged the task without much correspondence with the mind. And it had also happened, that I had lost the reconcileable notes I had written into my hank, I had occasionally jotted down memoranda which had little regard to traffic. I now put it into my father's hand, devoutly hoping he might light on nothing that would increase his displeasure against me.

"Owen's face, which had looked something blank when the question was put, cleared up at my ready answer, and wore a smile of hope, when I brought from my apartment, and placed before my father, a commonplace-looking volume, rather broadened as I opened it, I had long, having brazen clasp and a binding of rough call. This looked business-like, and was encouraging to my benevolent well-wisher. But he actually read some part of the contents, muttering his critical remarks as he went on.

"Brandice—Barbola and barricantes, allonsmessia. — At Nantiz—Vailes to the barque at Cognae and Rielles. — At Bourence—Very right. Frank—Duties on tonnage and custom-houses in Saxby's Tables. That's not well; you should have transcribed the passage; it fixes the thing in the memory. Report to me. One has an impression. Oversea Cocktes—Limes—Ingham—Gentish—Stock-fish. Titting—Cropping—Lub-fish. You should have noted that they are all, nevertheless, to be mentioned as titles. — How many inches long is a tiling?"

"Owen, seeing me at fault, hazarded a whisper, of which I fortunately caught the import."

"Eighteen inches, sir. — And a yard is twenty-four—very right. It is important to remember this, on account of the Portuguese trade. — But what have we here? — Bourdon founded in the year—Castle of the Trompette—Pucell. — Well. — In the year this is a kind of waste-book, Owen, in which all the transactions of the day, emptions, orders, payments, receipts, acceptances, drafts, commissions, and advice, are with all miscellaneous."

"That they may be regularly transferred to the day-book and ledger," answered Owen; "I am glad Mr. Francis is so methodical."

I perceived that he was so fast into favour, that I began to fear the consequence would be my father's more obstinate perseverance in his resolution that I must become a merchant; and, as I was determined on the contrary, I began to wish the nearest friend Mr. Owen's phrases, been so methodical. But I had no reason for apprehension on that score; for a blotted piece of paper dropped out of the book, and being the last written by my father, he had, from Owen, on the propriety of securing loose memoranda with a little paste, by exclaiming, "To the memory of Edward the Black Prince—What's all this?"

"If it be Heaven, Frank, you are a greater blockhead than I supposed you!"

"My father, you must recollect, as a man of business, looked upon the labour of poets with contempt; and as a religious man, and of the dissenting persuasion, he considered all such pursuits as equally moral and profane. Before you condemn him, you must recall to remember how too many of the poets in the end of the seventeenth century had led their lives and employed their talents. And being that my father belonged, felt, or perhaps affected, a pantomatic aversion to the lighter exertions of literature. So that many causes contributed to augment the unpleasant labour occasioned by the demand of this unfortunate copy of verses. As for poor Owen, could the bob-wig which he then wore have uncurled itself, and stood on end with horror, I am convinced the most idle labour of the framers of pleasure as he heard my father run over some part of the contents, muttering his critical remarks as he went on.

"Q for the voice of that wild horn, On Fontarabia echoes borne, And England's distant cliffs ring out, That told imperial Charlemagne, How Paynim sons of swaythy Spain, Had wrought his champion's fall!"

"Fontarabia echoes!" continued my father, interrupting himself; "the Fontarabian Fair would have been more to the purpose. — Paynim?—What's Paynim?—Could you not say Pagan as well, and write English, at least, if you must needs write some?"

"And over earth and ocean sounding, And England's distant cliffs ring out, Such are the notes should say How Britain's hope, and France's fear, The sons of Christendom are here! In Bourbon's dying lay!"

"Pollite, by the way, is always well with a fear, with more sullen indifference than respect, with what is your own:
"Yes, Frank, what I have is my own, if labour in getting, and care in amending, can make a right o' property; and no drone shall feed on my honeycomb.
Think on it well; what I have thinned is re-flection, and what I resolve upon I will execute."
"Honoured sir,—dear sir," exclaimed Owen, tears rushing into his eyes, "you are not wont to be in such a hurry in transacting the business of importance.
Let Mr. Francis run up the balance before you shut the account; he loves you, I am sure; and when he puts down his filial obedience to the per contra, I am sure his objections will disappear.
"Do you think I will ask him twice," said my father sternly, "to be my friend, my assistant, and my favourite?—to be a partner of my cares and of my fortune?—Owen, I thought you had known better.
He looked at me as if he meant to add something more, but turned instantly away, and left the room abruptly. I was, I own, affected by this view of the cause, which had not occurred to me; and my father would probably have had little reason to complain of his, had he commenced the discussion with this argement.
But it was too late. I had much of his own obdurence of resolution, and Heaven had decreed that my sin should be my punishment, though not to the extent which my transgression merited. Owen, when we were left alone, continued to look at me with sadness, which tears from his moist eyes overflowed onto my garment, and made me, too, feel the weight of thoughts, which I could not discover, before attempting the task of intercession, upon what point my obstinacy was most as-sailable. At length he began, with broken, and disconcerted accents,—"O God! Mr. Francis!—Good Heavens, sir!—My stars, Mr. Osbaldestone!—that I should ever have seen this day—and you so young gentleman, sir,—For the love of Heaven! look at both sides of the account! Think what it would be to lose—a noble fortune, sir—one of the finest houses in The City, even under the old firm of Tresham and Trent, and now Osbaldestone and Tresham—You might roll in gold, Mr. Francis!—And, my dear young Mr. Frank, if there was any particular thing in the business of the house which you disliked, I would" (sinking his voice to a whisper) "put it in order for you termly, or weekly, or daily, if you will.
—Do, my dear Mr. Francis, think of the honour due to your father, that your days may be long in the land.
"I am much obliged to you, Mr. Owen," said I,— "very much obliged indeed; but my father is not judge how to bestow his money. He talks of one of my cousins—let him dispose of his wealth as he pleases. I will never sell my liberty for gold."
"Gold, sir?—I wish you would balance the sheet of profits at last term,—it was in five figures—five figures to each partner's sum total, Mr. Frank!—And all this is to go to a Papist, and a north-country booby, and a disaffected person besides.—It will break my heart, Mr. Francis, that have been toiling more as a dog than a man, and all for love of the firm.—Think how it will sound, Osbaldestone, Tresham, and Osbaldstone—or, perhaps, who knows,—again lowering his voice,) Osbaldestone, Osbaldestone, and Tresham, for our Mr. Osbaldestone can buy them all out.
"But, Mr. Owen, my cousin's name being also Osbaldestone, the name of the company will sound every bit as well in your ears.
"O fie, upon you, Mr. Francis, when you know how well I love you—Your cousin indeed!—a Papist, no doubt, like his father, and a disaffected person to the Pope!—Poor Mr. Francis!—"Poor Mr. Francis!
"There are many very good men Catholics, Mr.
Owen," rejoined I.
As Owen was about to answer with unusual animation, my father re-entered the apartment.
"You were right," he said, "Owen, and I was wrong; we will take more time to think. There matter is that young man. Young man, you have an answer on this important subject this month-I bowed in silence, sufficiently glad of a respite, and trusting it might indicate some relaxation in father's determination.
The time of probation passed slowly, unmarked by any accident whatever. I went and came, and disposed of my time as I pleased, without question or discussion. Forty days, the exact length of my father's stay, elapsed, and I rarely saw him, save at meal-times, when he studiously avoided a discussion which you might well suppose I was in no hurry to press onward. Our conversation was of a general kind, and I am almost certain that we discussed the weather, and the prices of provisions in our neighborhood, and how the world had gone wrong since I was a child, and in all probability, had gained my parents. As it was, I stood fast, and, as respectfully as I could, declined the proposal he made to me. Perhaps—for who can judge of their own heart?—I felt it unmanly to yield on the first summons, and expected further solicitation, as at least a pretext for changing my mind. If so, I was disappointed; for my father turned coolly to Owen, and only said, "There is an alert, Frank."

—Well, Frank, (addressing me) you are nearly of age, and as well qualified to judge of what will constitute your own happiness as you ever are to be; and therefore I maintain, and I hope I shall be permitted to give in to your plans, any more than you are compelled to submit to mine. I ask you to have a plan in which I may be interested. Yea, I am now on the threshold of that walk on my own arm, and yet walk your own way? What can hardly be, Mr. Frank;—however, I suppose you mean to obey my directions, as far as they do not cross your own home?"

I was about to speak—"Silence, if you please," he continued. "Supposing this to be the case, you will instantly set out for the North of England, to pay your uncle a visit, and see the state of his family; for we have chosen from a thousand such that you are to meet."

I believe) one who, I understand, is most worthy to fill the place I intended for you in the counting-house. But some further arrangements may be necessary, and for these you are present to be interested. You shall have further instructions at Osbaldstone Hall, where you will please to remain until you hear from me. Everything will be ready for your departure tomorrow morning."

With these words my father left the apartment. "Do you mean all this, Mr. Owen?" I said to my sympathetic friend, whose countenance wore a cast of the deepest reflection. "You have ruined yourself, Mr. Frank, that's all; when your father talks in that quiet determined manner, there will be no more change in him than is a fitted accoutrement."

And so it proved; for the next morning, at five o'clock, I found myself on the road to York, mounted on a reasonably good horse, and with fifty guineas in my pocket; traveling, as it would seem, not by the purpose of assisting in the adoption of a successor to myself in my father's house and favor, and for which I knew, eventually in his fortune also.

I HAVE tagged with rhyme and blank verse the subdivisions of this important narrative, in order to reduce your continued attention by powers of composition of stronger attraction than my own. The preceding lines refer to an unfortunate navigator, who, by his rash attempts to display himself, was unable to manage, and thrust it off into the full tide of a navigable river. No school-boy, who, in the midst of the tide, had his ship on his hands, could have executed a similar rash attempt. I feel myself not in a strong current, in a situation more awkward than mine, when I found myself dividing, without a compase, on the ocean of human life. There had been such unexpected ease in the manner in which my father alighted, usually esteemed the strongest—was the occasion of a sincere expression of surprise on the part as a sort of outcast from his family, that it strangely lessened the confidence in my own personal accomplishments, which had hitherto sustained me. Prey on prey, the news of the departure of my father, his son, had not a more awkward sense of his degradation. We are apt, in our engrossing emotions, to consider all those accessories which are drawn around us by prosperity, as pertaining and belonging to our own persons, that the discovery of our unimportance, when left to our own proper resources, becomes insupportably mortifying. As the hum of London died away, the thought of her presence was more than once sounded to my ears the admonitory "Turn again," first heard by her future Lord Mayor; and when I looked back from Highgate on her dusky train of line. I felt as if I were leaving behind me comfort, opulence, the charms of society, and all the pleasures of cultivated life.

But the die was cast. It was, indeed, by no means possible to foretell the final influence which my father's wishes would have reinstated me in the situation which I had lost. On the contrary, firm and strong of purpose as he himself was, he might rather conceivably have sunk with the latter and compulsory sequience in his desire that I should engage in commerce. My constitutional obstinacy came also to my aid, and pride whipped harder against me than ever. A few miles from London had blown away resolutions formed during a month's serious deliberation. Hope, too, that never forsakes the young and hardy, lent him heart and soul. I believe, we should not be in serious in the sentence of futility, which he had so unhappily pronounced. It must be but a trial of my disposition, which, endured with patience and fortitude, my part, would raise me in the estimation, and lead me to an important modification of the point in dispute between us. I even settled in my own mind how far I would concede to him, and on what articles of our supposed treaty I would make a firm stand; and that week, according to my computation, that I was to be reinstated in my full rights of filiation, paying the easy penalty of some considerable expenses to stone for my past rebellion. To this I should not be able to adjust myself. For the moment, I experienced that feeling of independence which the youthful bosom receives with a thrilling mixture of pleasure and apprehension. My purse, though no means large, satisfied me, and I was able to supply all the wants and wishes of a traveller. I had been accustomed, while at Bourdeaux, to act as my own valet; my horse was fresh, young, and active, and the road was a most melancholy reflections with which my journey commenced.

I should have been glad to have journeyed upon a line of road better calculated to afford reasonable objects of curiosity, or a more interesting country, to the traveller. But the north road was then, and perhaps still is, singularly deficient in these respects; nor do I believe you can travel so far through Britain in any other direction without meeting more of what is worthy to engage the attention. My mental ruminations, notwithstanding my assumed confidence, were not always of an unchequed nature. The Muse too,—the very coquette who had led me into this wilderness,—like others of her sex, deserted me in my utmost need; and I should have been relieved to have her, rather than a melancholy state of delusion, had it not been for the occasional conversations of strangers who chanced to pass the same way. But the characters whom I met with were of a uniform and undistinguished class. Clerks of public houses, shopkeepers, returning from a distant market; clerks of traders, travelling to collect what was due to their masters in perishable goods; and even clerks of the navies, going down into the country upon the recruiting service; were, at this period, the persons by whom the turnpike and tappers were kept in exercise. Our speech, therefore, was of tithes and creeds, of hovey and grain, of commodities wet and dry, and the solvency of the retail dealers, occasionally varied by the description of a season, or the position of a gentleman. The narrator only gave me at second hand. Robbers, a fertile and alarming theme, filled up every vacancy; and the names of the Golden Farmer, the Flying Hight, the Black Tommy, and the Navigator, were familiar in our mouths as household words. At such tales, like children closing their circle round the fire when the ghost story draws to its climax, the riders drew near to each other, looked before and behind them, examined the priming of their pistols, and vowed to stand by each other in case of danger: an engagement which, like other offensive and defensive alliances, is understood and carried into practice when there was an appearance of actual peril.

Of all the fellows whom I ever saw haunted by terrors of this nature, one poor man, with whom I travelled, was the most the subject of my amusement. He had upon his pillion a very small, but apparently a very weighty portmanteau, about the safety of which he seemed particularly solicitous; never trusting it out of his own hands, and uncertain of receiving the official seal of the waiters and hostlers, who offered their services to carry it into the house. With the same precaution he laboured to conceal, not only the figure and the costume of a mount, but the place of destination, but even the direction of each day's route. Nothing embarrassed him more than to be asked by any one, whether he was travelling upwards or downwards, or whether he was going for or returning. His place of rest for the night he scrutinized with the most anxious care, alike avoiding solitude, and what he considered as bad neighborhood; and at Grantham, he was in a state of suspense as to the advice of his landlord, whether he should not change to the next room to a thick-set boarding fellow, in a black wig, and a tarnished gold-laced waistcoat. With all these cares on his mind, my fellow traveller, to judge by his presentiment of the future, the man who might have set danger at defiance with such an appearance as this was most men. He was strong and well-built; and, judging from his gold laced hat and cockade, seemed to have served in the army, or, at least, to belong to the military profession in one capacity or another. His conversation also, though always sufficiently vulgar, was that of a man of sense, when the terrible bugbear which haunted his imagination for a moment ceased to terrify him. I have seen him frequently, and association recalled them. An open heath, a close plantation, were alike subjects of apprehension; and the whirl of a sheep-dog and a wild mare into the eye was not sufficient to allay his terror. Even the sight of a gillet, if it assured him that one robber was safely disposed of by justice, never failed to remind him how many remained still uncaught. Perhaps true, that the fellow's company, had I not been still more tired of my own thoughts. Some of the marvellous stories, however, which he related, had in themselves a cast of interest; and another whimiscal point of his peculiarities afforded me the occasional opportunity of amusing myself at his expense. Among his tales, several of the unfortunate travellers who fell among thieves, incurred that calamity from associating themselves on the road with a well-dressed and entertaining stranger, in whose company they trusted to find protection as well as amusement; who cheered their journey with talk and song, protected them against the evils of overcharges and false reckonings, until at length, under pretext of showing a near path over a desolate common, he seduced his unsuspecting victims from the public road into some dismal glen, where, suddenly blowing his whistle, he assembled his comrades from their lurking-places and displayed himself in his true colours, the captain, namely, of the band of robbers. For my part, I was glad the fellows had forfitted their purses, and perhaps their lives.

Towards the conclusion of such a tale, and when my companion had wrought himself into a fever of apprehension to a height of terror, I often observed that he usually eyed me with a glance of doubt and suspicion, as if the possibility occurred to him that I might, at that very moment, be in conn company with a character as dangerous as that which his tale described. And ever and anon, when such suggestions pressed themselves on the mind of this incorruptible, he would make me to drive to the opposite side of the high-road, looked before, behind, and around him, examined his arms, and seemed to prepare himself for flight or defence, as circumstances might indicate that.

This suspicion implied on such occasions seemed to me only momentary, and too ludicrous to be offensive. There was, in fact, no particular reflection on my dress or address, although I was thus now taken for a robber. A man in those days might have all the external appearance of a gentleman, and yet turn out to be a highwayman. For the division of labour in every department not having then taken place so fully as since that period, the profession of the polite and accomplished adventurer, who nicked you out of your money at White's, or bowled you out of it at Marybone, was often united with that of the professional ruffian, who, on Bagatello Heath, or Finchley Common, commanded his brother beast to stand and deliver. There was also a touch of coarseness and hardness about the manners of the times, which had nothing in their manner or deportment that was chivalrous. It seems to me, on recollection, as if desperate men had less reluctance then, than now, to embrace the most desperate means of retrieving their fortunes; and that the very men who were indoctrinated in the Art of War were the most ready to turn their training to the service of the highway, to which the name of Anthonopoles and W-Wood mourned over the execution of two men, guillotined in person, and of undisputed courage and honour, who were hanged without mercy at Oxford, were no more fastidious than was the common and general contributions on the highway. We were still further removed from the days of "the mad Prince and Poes." And yet, from the number of unenclosed and waste lands in the vicinity, and the metropolis, and from the less populous state of remote districts, both were frequented by that species of mounted highwaymen, that may possibly become one day unknown, who track their victims, with a firmness like courtesy; and, like Giblet in the Beaums Stratagem, pinched themselves on being the best behaved men on the road, and on conducting themselves with all appropriate celerity in the execution of their vocation. A young man, therefore, in my circumstances, was not entitled to be highly indignant at the mistake which confounded him with this worshipful class of desperadoes.

Neither was I offended. On the contrary, I found amusement in alternately exciting, and falling to sleep, the suspicions of my timorous companion, and my purpose was only to puzzle a brain which nature and apprehension had combined to render none of the clearest. When my free conversation had lulled him into complete security, it required only a passing word concerning the direction of his journey, or the nature of the business which occasioned it, to put his suspicions once more in arms. For example, a conversation on the comparative strength and activity of our horses took such a turn as follows:

"O, sir," said my companion, "for the gallop, I grant you; but allow me to say, your horse (although he is a very handsome gelding—that must be owned) has none but one born to be a good roadster. The right 'O, sir," (striking his Bucophalus with his spur), "the trot is the true pace for a hackney; and, were we near town, I should like to try that daisy-cutter of yours upon a piece of level road (barring causer) for a quart of claret at the next inn."

"Content, sir," replied I; "and here is a stretch of ground very favourable."

"That's clear," answered my friend with hesitation; "I make it a rule of travelling never to blow my horse between stages; one never knows what occasion he may have to put him to his mettle; and besides, sir, you must allow me, I mean to keep with even weight; you ride four stone lighter than I."

"Very well; but I am content to carry weight. Pray what may that portmanteau of yours weigh?"

"It weighs about ten pounds,

"O very little as a feather—just a few shires and stock.

"I should think it heavier, from its appearance I'll hold you the quart of claret it makes the odds between our weight."

"You're mistaken, sir; I assure you—quite mistaken," replied my friend, edging off to the side of the road, as was his wont on these alarming occasions.

"Well, I'm willing to venture the wine; or, I will bet you ten pieces to five, that I can pour your portteauc on my cravat, and out-trot you into the bar gain."

This proposal raised my friend's alarm to the utmost:

The Scot is poor, cries early English pride. True is the charge; not by themselves denied. An old man, in strictness none. Who wince to come and mount their fortunes here?

There was, in the days of which I write, an old-fashioned custom on the English road, which I suspect is now obsolete, or practised only by the vulgar. Journeys of length being made on horseback; and, of course, by brief stages, it was usual always to make a halt on the road in some tavern; where the rider might attend divine service, and his horse have the benefit of the day of rest, the institution of which is as humane to our brute labourers as profitable to ourselves. I have been present on such occasions, and a remnant of old English hospitality, was, that the landlord of a principal inn made his character of publican on the seventh day, and invited the guests who chanced to be within his walls to take part of his family bread and pudding. This invitation was usually complied with by all whose distinguished rank did not induce them to think compliance a derogation; and the proposal of a bottle of ale, for dinner, to drink the landlord's health, was the only recompense ever offered or accepted.

I was born a citizen of the world, and my inclination led me into all scenes where my loose and carefree mode of life might be enlarged: I had, besides, no pretensions to sequester myself on the score of superior dignity, and therefore seldom failed to accept of the Sunday's hospitality of mine host, whether at the Garter, Lion, or Bear. The honest publican, dilated into additional consequence by a sense of his own importance, while presiding among the guests on whom it was his ordinary duty to attend, would himself an entertaining spectacle; and around his genial orbit, other pliants of inferior consequence performed their revolutions. The wits and humorists, among whom he distributed his saucy stories, the apocryphal, the attorney, the apothecary, the surgeon, and the curate himself, did not disdain to partake of this hebdomadal festivity. The honest publican, dilated into additional consequence by a sense of his own importance, while presiding among the guests on whom it was his ordinary duty to attend, would himself an entertaining spectacle; and around his genial orbit, other pliants of inferior consequence performed their revolutions. The wits and humorists, among whom he distributed his saucy stories, the apocryphal, the attorney, the apothecary, the surgeon, and the curate himself, did not disdain to partake of this hebdomadal festivity. The guests, assembled from different quarters and nations, and conversing in their mother tongue, language, manners, and sentiments, a curious con-desired to possess a knowledge of mankind in its varieties.

It was on such a day, and such an occasion, that people were gathered and I was about to grace the board of the ruddy-faced host of the Black Bear, in the town of Darlington, and Bishoprick of Durham, when our landlord informed us, with a sort of air of gravity, that there was a Scotch gentleman to dine with us.

"A gentleman?—what sort of a gentleman?" said my companion, somewhat hastily, his mind, I suppose, fixated on gentlemen of the pad, as they were termed.

"Why, a Scotch sort of a gentleman as I said before," returned mine host; "they are all gentle, ye understand, back; and this is a decent hallaon—a canny North Briton as e'er crossed Berwick bridge—I trow he's a dealer in cattle.

"Does he have his company, by all means," answered my companion; and then, turning to me, he gave vent to the tenor of his own reflections. "I respect the Scotch, sir; I love and honour the nation for their sense of morality. Men talk of their vituperation; but commonplace, thou and clad in raggs, as the poet saith. I have been credibly assured, sir, by men on whom I can de-pend, that there was never known such a thing in Scotland as a cotter."...

"That's because they have nothing to lose," said mine host, with the chuckle of a self-appraising wit.

"No, no, landlord," answered a strong deep voice behind me; and a new Visitor, a gentleman of appearance and manners, who have that sent down beneath the Tweed, have taken up the trade of thievery over the bar of the native profession."...

"Well said, Mr. Campbell!" answered the landlord; "I did nat think thout had been sae near us, mon. But thou kens I'm an outspoken Yorkshire tyke—And how go markets in the south?"

And found Mr. Campbell; "wise folks buy and sell, and fools are bought and sold."

"But wise men and fools both eat their dinner," answered our jolly entertainer; "and here a cours—

"As prime a buttsbuck of beef as e'er hungry mon stuck fork in!"

So saying, he eagerly whetted his knife, assumed the seat of the first, merchant on Charing, and to have cost him a dollar if I can't speak it. Yet, from an early period, they had occupied and interested my imagination. My father, as is well known to you, was of an ancient family in Northumberland, and had for many years past been a leader in the affairs of the nation, not very many miles distant. The quarrel betwixt him and his relatives was such, that he scarcely ever mentioned the race from which he sprung, and held as the most contemptible species of vanity, the weakness which is commonly termed family pride. His ambition was only to be distinguished by the existence of those whom he considered the wisest, wot, in some degree at least, counteracted by a being whose power would never have supposed of importance adequate to influence them in any way. His daughter and Northumberland man, attached to him from his infancy, was the only person connected with his native province for whom he retained any regard; and when fortune dowered

those who entertained such prejudices, I must remark, that the Scotch of that period were guilty of similar injustice to the English, whom they branded universally as a race of purse-proud arrogant episcopacy. Such seeds of national dislike remained between the two countries, the natural consequences of their exclusion and rival state. They have recently been fanned into a flame, which, I sincerely hope, is now extinguished in its own ashes.

There was an occasion of disquiet, that I contemplated the first Scotchman I chanced to meet in society. There was much about him that coincided with my previous conceptions. He had the habit and athletic form, said to be peculiar to his race, and possessed the nervousness and slow pedantic mode of expression, arising from a desire to avoid peculiarities of idiom or dialect. I could also observe the caution and shrewdness of his character, and the answers which he returned. But I was not prepared for the air of easy self-possession and superiority, with which he seemed to predominate over the rest of the company. I judged he was a lawyer, as it were, by accident. His dress was as coarse as it could be, being still decent; and, at a time when great expense was lavished upon the wardrobe, even of the lowest wealth. He was not the common, dandified, affected, and indolent indicator of mediocrity of circumstances, if not poverty. His conversation intimated, that he was engaged in the court-trade, a very dignified professional pursuit; and, that indeed, he seemed to treat as a matter of course, to treat the rest of the company with the cool and descending politeness, which implies a real, or imagined, superiority over those to whom we are inferior. When I expressed any opinion on any point, it was with that easy tone of confidence used by those superior to their society in rank or information, as if what he said could not be doubted.

Mr. Campbell, who was a Scotchman of great importance and reputation—seven highwaymen had defeated with his single arm, that beat him as he came from Whiston-Tyris—had given orders for fulfilling the conditions on which his pretensions were to depend, he failed not to acquaint them, "that, for as peaceable a gentleman as Mr. Campbell is, a Scotchman, he would be great enough to raise seven—seven highwaymen in a few days, for his pretension—seven highwaymen, had defeated him with his single arm, that beat him as he came from Whiston-Tyris."

"Thou art deceived, friend Jonathan," said Campbell, interrupting him; "they were but barely two, and two cowardly looks as man could wish to meet withal."

"And did you, sir, really," said my fellow-traveller, edging his chair (I should have said his portmanteau) nearer to Mr. Campbell, "really and actually beat two highwaymen yourself alone?"

"In troth did I, sir," replied Campbell; "and I think it is something to be sung about."

"Upon my word, sir," replied my acquaintance, "I should be happy to have the pleasure of your company on my journey—I go northward, sir."

This passage was pleasant for me, a Scotchman, concerning the route he proposed to himself, the first I had heard my companion bestow upon any one, failed to excite the corresponding confidence of the Scotchman.

"We can't travel together, sir," I replied.

"You, sir, doubtless, are well mounted, and I, for the present, travel on foot, or on a Highland shawl, that does not help me much faster forward."

"I say, called for a reckoning for the wine, and throwing down the price of the additional bottle which he had himself introduced, rose as if to take leave of us. My companion made a sign to me, and taking him by the arm, drew him aside near the window. I could not help overhearing his press something— I supposed his company upon the journey, which Mr. Campbell seemed to decline, I will pay your charges, sir," said the traveller, in a tone, as if he thought the argument should bear down all opposition.

"It is quite impossible," said Campbell, somewhat contemptuously; "I have business at Rothbury."

"But I am sure, sir, I have the courage to believe it," I replied, "that better than strongly opposed the cause of high church and the Stewart line. The excisemen, as in duty bound, and the attorney, who looked to some petty office under the crown, together with my fellow-traveller, who seemed to enter keenly into the contest, staunchly supported the cause of King George and the Protestant succession. Dire was the screaming—deep the ed him, and, coming up to me as the company were dispersing, observed, "Your friend, sir, is too communicative, considering the nature of his trust."

I apologise, replied I, although looking towards the traveller, "is no friend of mine, but an acquaintance whom I picked up on the road. I know neither his name nor business, and you seem to be deeper in this confidence than I can be; to the moment very accessible to impressions of this nature, I expected with some eagerness the appearance of the huntsmen.

The fox, winded and nearly spent, first made his appearance from the coppice which clothed the right-hand side of the valley. His drooping brush, his soiled appearance, and jaded trot, proclaimed his fate impending; and the carrion crow, which hovered over him, already considered poor Reynard as soon to be his prey. He crossed the stream which divides the little valley, and was dragging himself up a ravine on the steep ascent of its wild banks, with his headmost hounds, followed by the rest of the pack in full cry, burst from the coppice, followed by the huntsman, and three or four riders. The dogs pursued the fox in the manner already stipulated, the hunters followed with reckless haste, regardless of the broken and difficult nature of the ground. They were tall, stout young men, well mounted, and dressed in green, the colour of autumn, and a particular sort of gait, dressed under the auspices of old Sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone. My cousins thought I, as they swept past me. The next reflection was, what is my reception likely to be as among these rustics, members of the Pack of Nimrod? and how improbable is it, that knowing little or nothing of rural sports, shall find myself at ease, or happy, in my uncle's family. A vision that passed through my mind, omitting these three huntsmen, as it were, was that of the broad fields and open country, the wide prospects and clumps of wood which I had traversed in my solitary walk.

It was a young lady, the loveliness of whose very striking features was enhanced by the animation of the chase and the glow of the exercise, mounted on a beautiful grey hunter, and with a beautiful grey hunter, and with a

CHAPTER V.

How melts my beating heart, as I behold
The bright eye闪光, the warm cheek's glow,
Such beauty, such grace, such beauty and grace,

I thought of my friends, of the journey I was about to undertake, and the excitement of the day. The weather was fine, the country beautiful, the scenery inspiring the loves of nature. No longer interrupted by the babble of my companion, I could now remark the difference which the country exhibited in the through which I had hitherto travelled. The streets were more properly preserved than the name, for, instead of slumbering stagnant among reeds and willows, they crawled along beneath the shade of native copsewood; were now hurried down delectively, and now purlled more leisurely, but still in active motion, through little lonely valleys, which opening on the road from time to time, seemed to invite the traveller to explore their recesses. The Chewits rose in the middle of the road, in maintaining the pastoral habit, with the sublime variety of rock and cliff which characterises mountains of the primary class, but huge, round-headed, and clothed with a dark robe of russet, gaining by the aspect and appearance, influence upon the imagination, as a desert district possessing a character of its own.

I parted from my father, which I was now I approached the old mansion, to give my uncle the title of a man of large property. This he employed (as I was given to understand by some inquiries which I made on the road) in maintaining the pastoral hospitality of a northern square of the period, which he deemed essential to his family dignity.

From the summit of an eminence the road had already found a direct route of Osbaldistone Hall, a large and antiquated edifice, peeping out from a Druidical grove of high oaks; and I was directing my course towards it, as straightforwardly as speedily as the windings of a very indifferently road would permit. My horse was, tired as he was, pricked up his ears at the enlivening notes of a pack of hounds in full cry, cheered by the occasional burst of a French horn, which in those days was the constant accompaniment to the chase. I made no doubt that the pack was my uncle's, and drew up my horse with the purpose of suffering the hunters to pass without notice, aware that a hunting-hound on the scent of a certain fox may chance to a keen sportsman, and determined, when they had passed on, to proceed to the mansion-house at my own pace, and there to await the return of the pristors from his sport. I paused, therefore, on a rising ground, and, not unmoved by the sense of in terest which that species of sylvan sport is so much impled by me, the only thing which I was to observe (at the moment very accessible to impressions of this nature,) I expected with some eagerness the appearance of the huntsmen.
ROB ROY.

[CHAP. V.

Inquiry of you, whether in the course of your travels in these parts, you have heard any thing of a friend of ours, Mr. Francis Osbaldistone, who has been for some time absent at Osbaldistone Hall?"

I was too happy to acknowledge myself to be the party inquired after, and to express my thanks, for the kind inquiries into the young lady.

"In this respect," she replied, "as my kinsman's politeness seems to be still unknown, you will permit me (though I suppose it is highly improper) to ask a question or two of you. You are a young Squire Thorncliff Osbaldistone, your cousin, and Die Vernon, who has also the honour to be your accomplished cousin's poor kinwoman."

"I confess to be a subject of boldness, satire, and simplicity in the manner in which Miss Vernon pronounced these words. My knowledge of life was insufficient to enable me to take up a corresponding tone as I expressed my gratitude to her for her condescension, and my extreme pleasure at having met with them. To say the truth, the compliment was so expressed that the lady might easily appropriate the greater share of it, for Thorncliff seemed an arrant country bumpkin, awkward, shy, and somewhat sulky withal. He shook hands with me, however, and then intimated his intention of leaving me alone, and, as he was for the present rising from his seat, he made me the opportunity of coming up to the hounds, a purpose which he rather communicated by way of information to Miss Vernon than by way of apology to me.

"The same," he said, the young lady, following him with eyes in which disdained was admirably painted—"the prince of grooms and cock-fighters, and blackguard horse-courser. But there is not one of them to match another. Have you read Markham?" said Miss Vernon.

"Read whom, ma'am?—I do not even remember the author's name."

"One of us on what a star you are waxed wicked!" replied the young lady. "A poor forlorn and ignorant stranger, unacquainted with the very Aecoran of the savage tribe whom you are come to reside among—Needless to say that Markham, the most celestial author on farrierery! I then see you are equally a stranger to the more modern names of Gibson and Bartlett."

"I am, indeed, Miss Vernon.""

"And do you not blush to own it?" said Miss Vernon. "Why, we must forswear your alliance. Then, suppose you, can neither give a ball, nor a masque, nor a masquerade."

"I confess I trust all these matters to an ostler or to my groom!"

"Incredible carelessness!—And you cannot shoe a horse. You shod one tail; or worm a dog, or crop his ears, or cut his dewclaw?"

"I can do that?" said the young lady, putting her horse to a cantor.

There was a sort of rude overgrown fence crossed, the path before us, with a gate, composed of pieces of wood, as large, it seemed, as Osbaldistone Hall. I must forward to open it, when Miss Vernon cleared the obstruction at a flying leap. I was bound, in point of honour to follow, and was in a moment again at her heels.

"There are hopes of you yet," she said. "I was afraid you had been a very degenerate Osbaldistone. But what on earth brings you to Cub-Castle?—for so it is called, you must know."

"I felt I was by this time on a very intimate footing with thy beautiful appurtenance, and therefore replied in

"a confidential undertone,—" Indeed, my dear Miss Vernon, I might have considered it as a sacrifice to be a temporary resident of Osbaldistone Hall, the inmates being such as you describe them; but I am convinced there is one exception that will make amends for all deficiencies.

"O, you Rashleigh!" said Miss Vernon.

"Indeed, I do not; I was thinking—forgive me—of some person much nearer me."

"I suppose it would be proper not to understand your civility?—But that is not my way—I don't make a curtesy for it, because I am sitting on horseback. But, seriously, I deserve your exception, for I am the only conversable being about the Hall, except the old priest and Rashleigh, and simplicity, and, if nature has given him a mouthful of common sense, and the priest has added a bushel of learning—he is what we call a very clever man in this country, where clever men are scarce. Brod to the church, but in no hurry to take orders."

"To the Catholic Church?"

"The Catholic Church, what else?" said the young lady. "But I forgot, they told me you are a heretic. Is that true, Mr. Osbaldistone?"

"I must not deny the charge."

"And you have been abroad, and in Catholic countries?"

"For nearly four years."

"You have seen convents?"

"Often, I have not seen much in them which recommended the Catholic religion."

"Are not the inhabitants happy?"

"Some are unquestionably so, whom either a profound sense of devotion, or an escape from perils and sufferings and misfortunes of the world, or a natural apathy of temper, has led into retirement. Those who have, like myself, adopted a life of exclusion from sudden and overstrained enthusiasm, or in hasty remembrance of some disappointment or mortification, are very miserable. The quickness of sensation soon returns, and, like the wilder animals in a menagerie, they are restless under confinement, while others muse or fatten in cells of no larger dimensions than theirs."

"And what?" continued Miss Vernon, "becomes of those whom are condemned to a convent by the will of others? What do they resemble in being and what do they resemble in being? if they are born to enjoy life, and feel its blessings?"

"They are like imprisoned singing-birds," replied I, "condemned to wear out their song, which they might enjoy, but which they must wear in the exercises of accomplishments, which would have adorned society, had they been left at large."

"I shall be," returned Miss Vernon—that is said she, correcting herself—"I should be rather like the wild hawk, who, barred the free exercise of his roar through heaven, will dash himself to pieces against the bars of his cage. But to return to Rashleigh," said she, in a more lively tone, "you will think him the pleasantest man you ever saw in your life, Mr. Osbaldistone, that is, for a week at least. If he could find out a blind mistress, ne'er whom would be so secure as that one; but the thing is, that enchanting the ear. But here we are in the court of the old hall, which looks as wild and odd as any of its inmates. There is no great toilette kept so any of them. Rashleigh, you must know, but I must give up these things, they are so unpleasantly warm, and the hat hurts my forehead too," continued the lively girl, taking it off, and shaking down a profusion of wild roses, which, like a little blush, separated with her white slender fingers, in order to clear them away from her beautiful face and piercing hazel eyes. If there was any coquetry in the action, she was well disguised of ours. You might have said away I suppose, if you would?"
ight not to understand in what sense it was meant," said Miss Vernon; "but you will see a better apology for a little negligence, when you meet the Orus, who will be more huge and tumultuous, and who will not be so well improved. But, as I said before, the old dinner will cling, or rather clank, in a few minutes—it seemed of its own accord on the day of the landing. Keene, in admiration of her beauty, and assiduous with the overabundance of her manners, which marked the more extraordinary, at a time when the state of politeness, flowing from the court of the grand Monarque Louis XIV., prescribed to the fair a more unusual severity of decorum. I was left awkward enough stationed in the centre of the court of the old hall, mounted on one horse and holding another in my hand. The building afforded little interest to a stranger, if I had been disposed to consider it attentively; the lar, of the quadrangle were of various architecture, in the width of the arches, and the height, grotesque turrets, and massive architraves, resembling the inside of a convent, or one of the older and less lendid colleges of Oxford. I called for a domestic, it was not unoccupied, but totally unoccupied; which was the more provoking, as I could perceive it was a object of curiosity to several servants, both male and female, from different parts of the building, who peeped at our horses and within the chamber as rabbis in a warren, before I could make a direct appeal the attention of any individual. The return of the men and hounds relieved me from my embarrassment, for the dog, I believe, was no chanced to guide me to the presence of Sir Hildebrand. His service he performed with much grace and tact well, as a people who is compelled to act as guide a hostile patrol; and in the same manner I was obliged to guard against his deserting me in the labyrinth low vaulted passages which conducted to "Stun all," as he called it, where I was to be introduced the gracious presence of my uncle. We did, however, at length reach a long vaulted room, floored with stone, where a range of oaken tables, was of various device and construction, nets, fishing rods, otter-spears, hunting-poles, with many other angular devices and engines for taking or killing time. A few old pictures, dimmed with smoke, and ancient prints, in the period by the unknown artists, repre denying knights and ladies, honoured, decorated, and mourned in their day; thoserowning fearfully from the bushed of wig and of beard; and these looking slightly with all their might at the roses which they brandished in their hands. I had just time to give a glance at these matters, then about twelve blue-coat servants burst into a loud roar, which is the young gentleman of the day, and will not be removed. They engaged in directing his comrade than in discharging as own duty. Some brought blocks and billets to fire, which roared, blazed, and ascended, half in smoke and half in flames; and a strong tower high enough to accommodate a stone-seat within a ample vault, and which was fronted, by way of many windows, with a huge piece of heavy architecture, where the monarchs of heraldry, embodied by the art of some Northumbrian chisel, grained and ramped in red freestone, now jardned by the smoke of centuries. Others of these old-fashioned serving-men were scarce a measure too belated, and the noise of the fare; others brought in cups, flagons, bottles, yea barrels of liquor. All tripped, kicked, plunged, shouldered, and jostled, doing as little service with as much effect. At length, while the dinner was, after various efforts, in the act of being arranged upon the board, "the clamour much of men and dogs," the cracking of whips, calculated for the intimidation of the latter, as loud and harsh as the bub among the servants rather increased than diminished as this crisis approached,—some called to make haste,—others to take time,—some exosted to stand out of the way, and make room for Sir Hildebrand and the young ariote,—some to close round the table, and be in the way,—some bawled to open, some to shut a pair of folding-doors, which divided the hall from a sort of gallery, as I afterwards learned, to withdrawing-room, fitted up with black wainscot. Opened the doors were at length, and in rushing curts and men,—eight dogs, the domestic chaplain, the village doctor, my six cousins, and my uncle.

CHAPTER VI.
The rude hall rocks—they come, they come, The din of voices makes the dome In stalk the various forms, and, great In varying motion, varying vast.

All march with haughty step—aloud prouly shake the great.

If Sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone was in no hurry to greet his nephew, of whose arrival he must have been a thousand times in his mind and mouth, for he sent on a message saying that they were to agree in excuse. "Had seen thee sooner, lad," he exclaimed, after a rough shake of the hand, and a hearty welcome to Osbaldistone Hall, "but had to see the hounds kennelled first. Thou art welcome to the Hall, lad—here is thy cousin Petrie, thy cousin Thornie, and thy cousin John—thy cousin Dick, your cousin Wilfred, and—stay, where's Ralheley—here's Ralheley—take thy long body aside, Thornie, and let's see thy brother a bit—your cousin Raileley. So, thy father has thought on the old Hall, and old Sir Hildebrand at last—better late than never— Though I have a mind to be muddy about it. Where's my little Die?—ay, here she comes—this is my niece Die, my wife's brother's daughter—the prettiest girl in our dales, be the other who she may—and so now let's to the business.

To gain some idea of the person who held this language, you must suppose, my dear Tresham, a man aged about sixty, in a hunting suit which had once been richly laced, but whose splendour had been tarnished by many a November and December storm. Sir Hildebrand, notwithstanding the abruptness of his present manner, had, at one period of his life, known courts and camps; had held a commission in the army which encamped on Hounslow Heath previous to the Revolution, and, recommended perhaps by his religion, he was knighted about the same period by the unknown artists James and John. But the Knight's dreams of further preferment, if he ever entertained any, had died away at the crisis which drove his patron from the throne, and since that period he had spent a sequestered life upon his native domains. Notwithstanding his rusticity, he ever, Sir Hildebrand retained much of the exterior of a gentleman, and appeared among his sons as the true olden remains of a great and good man, neither enjoyed in directing his companions than in discharging as own duty. Some brought blocks and billets to fire, which roared, blazed, and ascended, half in smoke and half in flames; and a strong tower high enough to accommodate a stone-seat within an ample vault, and which was fronted, by way of many windows, with a huge piece of heavy architecture, where the monarchs of heraldry, embodied by the grace and manner, which, in the polished world, sometimes supply mental deficiency. Their most valuable moral quality seemed to be the good-humour and courtesy which was expressed in their heavy features, and their only pretence to accomplishment was their dexterity in field sports, for which alone they lived. The strong Gysar, and the strong Clancharles, and the son and heir of any personal, by the strong Pervical, the strong Thorncliff, the strong John, Richard, and Wilfred Osbaldestone, were by outward appearance.

But if I confine myself to a uniformity so uncommon in her productions, Dame Nature had rendered Rashleigh Osbaldestone a striking contrast in person and manner, and, as I afterwards learned, in character and talents under any personal deformity. He was not to most men whom I had hitherto met with. When Percie, Thornie, and Co. had respectively nodded, grinned, and presented their shoulder, rather than their face, he was their father named them to their new kinsman, Rashleigh stepped forward, and welcomed me to Osbaldestone Hall, with the air and manner of a man of the world. His appearance was not intimidating. He was of low stature, whereas all his limbs seemed to be that of Angelic, and, while they were handomely formed, Rashleigh, though strong in person, was buck-necked and cross-made, and, from some early injury in his youth, had an indescribable gait, so unlike any other man that his absolute halt, that many alleged that it formed the obstacle to his taking orders; the church of Rome, as is well known, admitting none to the clerical profession who have an uncorrigible deformity. Others, however, ascribed this unsightly defect to a mere awkward habit, and contended, that it did not amount to a personal disqualification from holy orders. Rashleigh was high-spirited, as, having looked upon, we in vain wish to banish from our memory, to which they recur as objects of painful curiosity, although we dwell upon them with a feeling of disgust, was not quite actual plainness of his face, taken separately from the meaning, which made this strong impression. His features were, indeed, irregular, but they were by no means vulgar; and his keen dark eyes, and shaggy eyebrows, redeemed his face from the charge of commonplace ugliness. But there was in these eyes an expression of art and design, and, on provocation, a ferocity tempered by caution, which nature had made obvious to the most ordinary physiognomist, perhaps with the same intention that she has given the rattle to the poisonous snake. As to compensate him for the defect of exterior, such as Rashleigh Osbaldestone was possessed of a voice the most soft, mellow, and rich in its tones, that I ever heard, and was at no loss for language of every sort suited to so fine an instrument. His voice was so harmonious, that it was hardly ended, ere I internally agreed with Miss Vernon, that my new kinsman would make an instant conquest of a mistress whose ears alone were to judge his cause. He was about to place himself beside me at dinner, but Miss Vernon, who, as the only female in the family, arranged all such matters according to her own pleasure, contrived that I should sit betwixt Thorncliffe and herself; and it can scarce be doubted that the sensitive girl was more gratified with the company of a silken ball, and with embroidery. Your natural pace, as any of my five cousins might say, are far preferable to your complimentary anise. Endeavour to forget my unlucky star; call me Tom Vernon, if you have a mind, but speak to me as you would to a friend and companion; you have no idea how much I shall love you.

"That would be a bribe indeed," returned I."

"Again!" replied Miss Vernon, holding up her finger; "I told you I would not bear the shadow of compliment. And now, when you have pledged my uncle with me, I must blush at your freedom. If I am a brim, I will tell you what I think of you."

The bumping being pledged by me, as a dutiful nephew, and some other general intercourse of the table, having given me the means of learning to the conclusion, then, ere, I presume, of pretty nearly the same character."

"Yes, they form a happy compound of all, gamekeeper, bully, horse-jockey, and fool; but as they say there cannot be found two leaves on the same tree exactly alike, so these happy ingredients, being mingled in so various proportions, and the individual, make an agreeable variety for those who like to study character."

"Give me a sketch, if you please, Miss Vernon."" who sits on Miss Vernon's left, to the huge quantities of meat with which they heap their plates, made them serve as two occasional partitions separate and isolate the conversation I leave you to our late-a-late. "And now," said I, "give me leave to ask you frankly, Miss Vernon, what you suppose I am thinking of you?—I could tell you what I think, and that far from being hurt, you would like it."

"I do not want your assistance, I am conquer enough to tell your thoughts without it. You need not open the casement of your bosom; I see through it."

"But you, in this exquisite landscape, to look half-romp; desirous of attracting attention by the freedom of her manners and loudness of her conversation, because she is ignorant of what the Spectator teaches, to ask me a question of your own, or declare to me what you think you have some particular plan of storming you into admiration. I should be sorry to shock your self-opinion, but you were never more mistaken. All the confidence I have reposed in you, I would have given as readily to your father, if I thought he could have understood me. I am in this happy family as much secluded from intelligent listeners as Sancho in the 6th discourse. And when opportunity offers, I speak or die. I assure you I would not have you a word of all this curious intelligence, had I cared a pin who knew it, or knew it not."

"It is very cruel in you, Miss Vernon, to take away all the importance of the conversation from your communications, but I must receive them on your own terms. You have not included Mr. Rashleigh Osbaldistone in your domestic sketches."

"I am diminished by your familiarity in that remark, and hastily, in a much lower tone, "Not a word of Rashleigh! His ears are so acute when his selfishness is interested, that the sounds would reach him even through a casement, enshrined in his soul, stuffed as it is with beef, venison-paste, and pudding."

"Yes," I replied; "but peeping past the living screen which divides us, before I put the question, I perceive that Rashleigh's chair is empty—he has left the table."

"I would not have you to be too sure of that," Miss Vernon replied. "Take my advice, and when you speak of Rashleigh, get up to him at Osborne-hill, or otherwise some distance, and when you speak of Miss Vernon, do this through a side-door, leading I knew not whether, rather than endure any longer the sight of father and one practising the same degrading intemperance, and holding the same course and disgraceful connection. I was pursued, of course, as I had expected, to be reclaimed by force, as a deserter from the shrine of Bacchus. When I heard the whoop and hollo, and the tramp of the heavy boots of my pursuers on the winding stair which I was descending, I distinctly foresaw I should be overtaken unless I could get into the open air. I therefore threw open a casement in the staircase window, and most magnificently described the garden; and, as the height did not exceed six feet, I jumped out without hesitation, and soon found, behind, the 'hey whoop! stole away! stole away!' I jumped down one alley, was quite fast up another; and then, conceiving myself out of all danger of pursuit, I slackened my pace into a quiet stroll, enjoying the cool air which the heat of the air I had been in obtruded to swallow, as well as that of my rapid retreat, rendered doubly grateful. As I sauntered on, I found the gardener hard at his evening employment, and saluted him, as I passed to look at it which I had gone over."

"Gude e'en—gude e'n yve," answered the man, without looking up, and in a tone which at once indicated his northern extraction.

"Fine weather for your work, my friend."

"It's a no that muffles to be conoeved of,", answered the man, with that limited degree of praise which..."
gardeners and farmers usually beat on the very best weather. Then raising his head, as if to see what the weather would be. Having dressed his Scotch bonnet with an air of respect, he observed, "Eh, gude save us!—it's a sight for sair een, to see a gold-laced jaediecor in the Haid garden sae late at e'en."

"Aye, my jaediecor—that's a jacket like your ain, thon. They hae other things to do wi' them up yonder—umbuttunbing them to make room for the beef and bacon, the duchy-building, and the claret-wine, nay doubt—that's the ordinary for evening lecture on this auld the Border."

"There's no such plenty of good cheer in your country, my good friend," I replied, "as to tempt you to reckonings."

"Hout, sir, ye ken little about Scotland; it's no for want of gude viver—the best of fish, flesh, and fowl hae we, by syllas, inganas, turncoops, and other gardeners. But we hae mensy and discretion, and are moderate of our mouths; but here, free the kitchen to the hain, it's full and fetch mair, free the step end of the four-and-twenty till the tother. Even I think it proper to caution them that they hae the best o' sea-fish free Hartlepool and Sunderland by land carriage, forbye strouts, grises, salmon, and a' the lave o' it, and so make their very fastest a kind of blackman of nation; and then the auld men, women, masses and matins of the pair deceived souls—but I shouldn't speak about them, for your honour will be a Roman, I warrant, like the lave.

"The right hand of fellowship to your honour then," quoth the gardener, with as much alacrity as his language admitted of, "I may say that as I come to have a hand in the raising of your highness' morning, and, as I have to show that his good-will did not rest on words, he plucked forth a huge horn snuff-box, or mull, as he called it, and proffered me a pinch with a most friendly aspect.

Having accepted his courtesy, I asked him if he had been long a domestick at Osbaldstone Hall?

"I have been fighting with wild beasts at Ephebus," said he, looking towards the building, "for the best part of these four-and-twenty years, as sure as my name's Andrew Fairservice."

"But, my excellent friend Andrew Fairservice, if your religion and your temperance are so much of" fended by Roman ritual and hospitality, it seems to me that you must have been putting yourself to an unnecessary penance all this while, and that you might have found a service where they eat, and drink, and pasture free."

"I cannot say I have," replied Andrew; "but I should like to have you explain yourself," and therewith I slapped a crown-piece into Andrew's horn-hard hand. The touch of the silver made him grimace a last shiver, and he stuffed it back in his breeches pocket; and then, like a man who well understood that there was value to be returned, stood up, and rested his arms on his spade, with his features composed in the most important gravity, as for some serious communication.

"Ye maun ken, then, young gentleman, since it imports you to know, that Miss Vernon is—"

"Here, breaking off, he sucked in both his cheeks till his lantern jaws and long chin assumed the appearance of a pair of nut-crackers; winked hard once more, frowned, shook his head, and seemed to think his physiognomy had completed the information which his tongue could add to it."

"Poor old fellow!" said I, "so young, so beautiful, so early lost!"

"Trath, ye may say sae; she's in a manner lost, body and soul; forby a Papist, I guess, hath her forth—for his northern caution prevails, and he was again silent."

"For what; sir?" said I sternly, "I insist on knowing the plan of meaning all this."

"Oh, just for the bitterest Jacobite in the hall shire."

"Faw! a Jacobite—is in that all?"

Andrew looked at me with some astonishment, at hearing his information treated so lightly; and then muttering, "Aweel, it's the worst thing I ken about the lassie, however," he resumed his spade, like the King of the Vandsel, in Marmontel's late novel.

CHAPTER VII.

Bardinck. The sheriff, with a monstrous watch, is at the door.

I found out some difficulty the apartment which was destined for my accommodation; and, having secured myself the necessary good-will and attention from my uncle's domestics, by using the means they were most capable of comprehending, I secluded myself there for the remainder of the evening, considering how much the fair way in which I left my new relatives, as well as from the distant noise which continued to echo from the stone-hall,
MAP. VII.] ROB ROY.

"I doubt, lad," was his reply: "thou'rt a rank rider, I'm warrant thee—but take heed. Thy father sent thee here to me to be bitted, and I doubt I must ride thee on the curb, or we'll have some one to ride thee on the halt. But in all, I am very glad you saved me as one who was to make some stay with me, and his rude hospitality rendered him as indifferent as King Hal to the number of those who feel his cost. But it was plain my presence or absence could be of as little importance in his eyes as that one of his blue-coated serving-men. My cousins were mere cubs, in whose company I might, if I liked, indulge a little more than the manners and the accomplishments, I had acquired, but where I could attain no information beyond what regarded warning ages, rowelling horses, and following foxes. I could also do well enough. With these reflections I fixed on one. My father considered the life which was led at Osbaldiston Hall as the natural and inevitable pursuit of all country gentlemen, and he was satisfied with his son's rambles. But as the little rhymish knowing to which he knew I should be disinclined, I reconciled me, if possible, to take an active share in his own business. In the mean time, he would take Rashleigh to a Dram, in the hope of a share in it. And but Rashleigh, being such as was described by Miss Vernon, into my father's business—perhaps into his confidence—I subdued it by the reflection, that my father's course of life could not be imposed upon, or influenced by any one, and that all I knew to the young gentleman's reputation was through the medium of a singular and patty girl, whose communications were made with me inaudible fretfulness, which might warrant me in supposing her conclusions had been hastily or inconclusively formed. Then my mind naturally turned to Miss Vernon herself; her extreme beauty; her refined air; her very presence; her singular voice; her whole character; the mystery of her imagination, and her own spirit, for guidance and protection; and her whole character offering that variety and spirit which piqued our curiosity, and engages our attention in spite of ourselves. I had been thorough-going to consider the neighbourhood of this singular young lady, and the chance of our being thrown into very close and frequent intercourse, as adding to the danger, was a source of pain to my mind. And I could not, with the fullest exertion of my prudence, prevail upon myself to regard excessively his new and particular hazard to which I was to be exposed. I was still engaging myself to settle most difficulties of the kind—I would be very always, on my guard, consider Miss Vernon rather as a companion than an intimate; and all would be well. One word more. With these reflections I fell asleep. Miss Vernon, of course, forming the last subject of my contemplation. Whether I dreamed of her or not, I cannot satisfy you, for I was tired, and slept soundly. But she was the first person I thought of in the morning, when waked at dawn by the cheerful notes of the hunting-horn. To start up, and direct my horse to her was my first movement; and in a few minutes I was in the court-yard, where men, dogs, and horses, were in full preparation. My uncle, who, perhaps, was not entitled to expect a very alert sportsman in his nephew, bred as he had been in foreign parts, seemed rather surprised to see me, and I thought his morning salutation wanted something of the hearty and hospitable tone which distinguished his last cockney, but there, last, youth's eye—"he took to th'wells—of the old saying—"

'He that gallops his horse on Blackstone edge Must chance to catch a full.'"

I believe there are few young men, and those very few, who would not rather be taxed with some moral precepto than with want of knowledge a horsemanship. As I was by no means deficient either in skill or courage, I resorted my uncle's instructions, and assured him he would find me as up with the bounds.

3 B

"I know no such an thing then, Miss Die, for tho' the miller swore himself as black as night, that he stopt them at twelve o'clock, midnight was that.

"If I were to put you to a miller's word—and these earths, too, where we lost the fox three times this season, and you on your gray mare that can gallop there and back in ten minutes."

"Well, Miss Die, I'm go to Woolverton then, and if the earths are not stopt, I'll saddle Dick the miller's bones for him.

"Do, my dear Thornie; horsewip the rascal to purposes, via away, and about it.—Thornie went off at the gallop— or get horsewip yourself."
which will serve my purpose just as well. I must teach them all discipline and obedience to the word of command. I am raising a regiment, you must know. I am a first lieutenant, sergeant-major, Dickson my riding major, and Wilfred, with his deep d-dub tones, that speak but three syllables at a time, my kettle-drummer.

"And so—"

"Rashleigh shall be my scout-master."

"And will you find me employment for my, most lovely colonel?"

"You shall have the choice of being paymaster, or plummer-master, to the corps. But see how the dogs puzzle about there. Come, Mr. Frank, the scene's cold; they won't recover it there this while; follow me, I have a word to show you."

And, in fact, she cantered up to the top of a gentle hill, commanding an extensive prospect. Casting her eyes around, to see that no one was near, she drew up her horse beneath a few birch-trees, which screened us from the rest of the hunting-field. "Do you see yon peaked, brown, heathy hill, having something like a whitish speck upon the side?"

"There, that long ridge of broken moorish upland— I see it distinctly."

"That whitish speck is a rock called Hawkesmore-crag, and Hawkesmore-crag is in Scotland."

"Truly! I did not think we had been so near Scotland."

"It is so, I assure you, and your horse will carry you there in two hours."

"I am sure it gives him the trouble; why, the distance must be eighteen miles as the crow flies."

"You may have my mare, if you think her less blown—I say, that in two hours you may be in Scotland."

"And I say, that I have so little desire to be there, that if your horse's head were over the Border, I would not give his tail the trouble of following. What said I do in Scotland?"

"Prove for your safety, if I must speak plainly. Do you understand me now, Mr. Frank?"

"Not a whit; you are more and more ocular."

"Then, on my word, you either mistrust me most unjustly, and are a better disssembler than Rashleigh Osbaldstoke himself, or you know nothing of what is imputed to you; and then no wonder you stare at me in that grave manner, which I can scarce see without laughing.

"Upon my word of honour, Miss Vernon," said I, with an impatience feeling of her childish disposition to a manner, I have not the most distant conception of what you have said. I am happy to afford you the means of subject of amusement, but I am quite ignorant in that what constans.

"Not then, no sound jest after all," said the young lady, composing herself, "only one looks so very ridiculous when he is fairly perplexed; but the matter is serious enough. Do you know one Moray, or Morra, or some such name?"

"Not that I can at present recollect."

"Think a moment—Did you not lately travel with somebody of such a name?"

"The only man with whom I travelled for any length of time was a fellow whose soul seemed to lie in his pommel."

Then it was like the soul of the licentious Pedro Garzon, mingled with my lagging one in his lathen purée. That man has been robbed, and he has lodged an information against you, as connected with the violence done to him."

"I am Miss Vernon."

"I do not, I assure you—the thing is an absolute fact.

"And do you, said I with strong indignation, which did not attempt to squander; do you suppose me capable of meritng such a charge?"

"You would call me out for it I suppose, had I the advantage of being a man—You may do so as it is, if you like it— I can shoot flying, as well as leap a five-barred gate."

"And are colonel of a regiment of horse besides," replied I, reflecting how idle it was to be angry with her— But do express the present jest to me!"
sent, and were be here, there is no side he might take; the rest are all criminal one than another. I will go so not fear being able to serve you, rit condemned to drag an overladen, pring, strutting, and spluttering, to get the Justice put in motion, while, though the wheels groan, creak, and revolve slowly, the great and preponderating weight of the vehicle fairly frustrates the efforts of the williquadraped, and prevents its being brought into a state of actual progress. Nay more, the unfortuate pony, I understand, has been heard to complain, that this same car of justice—so laudable for its restraint in motion on some occasions, can on others run fast enough down hill of its own accord, dragging its reluctant self backwards along with it, when any thing can be done of service to the quondam friends. And then Mr. Jobson talks big about reporting his principal to the Secretary of the Home Department, if it were not for his par-icular regard and friendship for Mr. Inglewood and his family."

As Miss Vernon concluded this whimsical description, we found ourselves in front of Inglewood Place, a handsome, though old-fashioned building, which showed the consequence of the family.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Sir, answer the Lawyer, not to farther so.
You have as good and fair a battery.
As heart could wish, and never shame
The proudest man alive to claim."-

Our horses were taken by a servant in Sir Hilde-brand's livery, whom we found in the court-yard, and we entered the house. In the entrance-hall I was somewhat surprised, and my fair companion still more so, when we met Rashleigh Osbaldstone, who could not help showing equal wonder at our rencontre.
"Rashleigh," said Miss Vernon, without giving them time to ask any question, "you have heard of Mr. Francis Osbaldstone's affair, and you have been talking to the Justice about it?"

"Certainly," said Rashleigh, composedly, "it has been my business here. I have been endeavouring.
he said, with a bow to me, "to render my cousin what service I can. But I am sorry to meet him here."

"As a friend and relation, Mr. Osbaldstone, you ought to have been sorry to have met me any where else, at a time when the charge of my reputation forced me to be on this spot as soon as possible."

"True; but, judging from my father said, I should have supposed a short retreat into Scotland—and matters should be smoothed over in a quiet way."

I answered with warmth, "That I had no preda-cial measures to observe, and desired to have nothing smoothed over; on the contrary, I was come to inquire into a rascally calumny, which I was determined to probe to the bottom."

"Mr. Francis Osbaldstone is an innocent man, Rashleigh," said Miss Vernon, "and he demands an investigation of the charge against him, and I intend to support him in it."

"You do, my pretty cousin?—I should think, now, Mr. Francis Osbaldstone was likely to be as effectually, and rather more delicately, supported by my pre-ence than by yours."

"O certainly; but two heads are better than one, you know."

"Especially such a head as yours, my pretty De-advancing, and taking her hand with a familiar fondness, which made me think him fifty years older than nature had made him. But however, I was not able to relax his political creed, with enforcing the law against unausered of black-game, grouse, partridges, ally the expression of to it a cember. Her eyes and cheeks became more momen tiss, her colour mounted, she clenched her lips, and uplifted her foot, seemed to listen with a mixture of contempt and indig
the apologies, which, from the lack of civil behavio
ence, his composed and respectful smile, his body rather drawing back than advanced, and other signs of look and person, I concluded him to be pouring out at her feet. As length she flung away from him, with "I bid you good-night," and left her in an apart- ment, and was, for some time, I suppose, not in my power to speak I how she was, or what she was doing. "It is not in my power—there is no possibility of it."—Would you think it, Mr. Osbaldiston?" I said, addressing me. "You are not mad?" she said, interrupting me. "Would you think it?" I said, without attending to her hint—"Miss Vernon insists, not only that I know your innocence, (of which, indeed, it is impossible, anyone one to be more convinced,) but that she must also be acquainted with the real perpetrators of the outrage on this fellow—if, indeed, such an outrage has been committed. Is this reasonable, Mr. Osbal- diston?" "I will not allow any appeal to Mr. Osbaldiston, Rashleigh, said the young lady; "he does not know, as I do, the incredible extent and accuracy of your in- quiry. As I am a gentleman, you do me more honour than I deserve." "You are a tyrant, Diana," he answered, with a sort of sigh—a capricious tyrant, and rule your friends with a rod of iron. Still, however, it shall be as you desire. But if you go upstairs and see him here—you know you ought not—you must return with me." Then turning from Diana, who seemed to stand undecided, he came up to me in the most friendly manner and said, "You are wrong, and your interest in what regards you, Mr. Osbaldiston. If I leave you just at this moment, it is only to act for your advantage. But you must use your influence with your cousin to return; her presence cannot serve you, and must prejudice herself."

"I assure you, sir," I replied, "you cannot be more convinced of this than I; I have urged Miss Vernon's return as anxiously as she would permit me to do. I have not spoken on it," said Miss Vernon, after a pause, "and I will not go till I see you safe out of the hands of the Philistines. Cousin Rashleigh, I dare say, means well; but he and I know each other well. Rashleigh, I will go on;—I know," she added, in a more soothing tone, "my being here will give you more motive for speed and exertion."

"Stay, then, rash, obstinate girl," said Rashleigh, "you know not to whom you trust; and hastening out of the hall, we heard his horse's feet a minute afterwards in rapid motion.

"Thank Heaven, he is gone!" said Diana. "And now for the Justice of the Peace!"

"Had we not better call a servant?"

"O, by no means; I know the way to his den—we must burst on him suddenly—follow me." I did follow his accordingly, as he dropped up a few gloomy steps, traversed a twilight passage, and entered a sort of anteroom, hung round with old maps, architectural elevations, and genealogical trees. A pair of folding-doors opened from this into Mr. Ingle- wood's sitting apartment, from which was heard the fog-ey of an old ditty, chanted by a voice which had been in its day fit for a jolly bottle-song.

"Hey-day!" said Miss Vernon, "the genial Justice must have dined already—I did not think it had been so late."

It was even so. Mr. Inglewood's appetite having been sharpened by his official investigations, he had ante-dated his meridian repast, having dined at twelve instead of one o'clock, then got his full dinner hour in England. The various occurrences of the morn- ing occasioned our arriving some time after this, to the Justice the most important of the four-and-twenty hours he had then elected the day."

"Stay you here," said Diana; "I know the house, and I will call a servant; your sudden appearance might startle the old gentleman even to choking," and she escaped from me, leaving me unsure whether I ought to advance or retreat. It was im- possible for me not to hear some part of what passed within the apartment, and they expressed apologies for declining to sing, expressed in a deprec- ed croaking voice, the tones of which, I conceived, were not entirely new to me.

"Not sung, sir? by our Lady! but you see—What! you have cracked, my silver-mounted con- nut of sack, and tell me that you cannot sing!—sack will make a cat sing, and speak too; so with undress stave, or on, my dear, of my days, if you think you are to take up all my valuable time with your d-d declarations, and then tell me you cannot sing?"

"Your worship is perfectly in rule," said the voice, which, from its pert conceited air, seemed to have that of the clerk, "and the party must be un- formable; he hath canet written on his last coat."

"Up with it, then," said the Justice, "or, by Christopher, you shall crack the cocoa-nut in salt-and-water, according to the statute for such murderers as you are.

Thus exhorbitantly and threatened, my quondam low-traveller, for I could no longer doubt that he was the recusant in question, uplifted, with a voice as loud to that of a criminal singing his last psalm, scaffold, as my pensive and doleful state to the following:

"Good people all, I pray give ear,
A woful story you shall hear.
This is a tale of loves, and losings,
Bade a true man stand and deliver.

With his foodie doo doo foodie lee,
This knave, most worthy of a cord.
Being arm'd with pistol and with sword,
Twist Kensington and Bramford then bid boldly sit six honest men.

"Those honest men did at Bennet's date,
Having drank each man his pint of wine,
When his bold thief, with many cries,
Did say, You don't your lives or those

With his foodie doo, & c.

I question if the honest men, whose murder commemorated in this pathetick did, were mobbed at the appearance of the bold thief, than the ter- ter was at mine; for, tired of waiting for some to announce me, and finding my situation so ener rather awkward, I prevented myself to the energetic manner, and said, as it was his name, was uplifting the fifth stave of a doleful ballad. The high tone, with which it started, died away in a quaver of consternation, finding it was but one near one who was disposed to be less little suspicious than that of his madrigal, and he remained silent, with a gaping as if I had brought the Gorgon's head in hand.

The Justice, whose eyes had closed under the influence of the somniferous lullaby of the song ed up in his chair as it suddenly ceased, and with wonder at the unexpected addition to his company had received, while his organs of sight in abeyance. The clerk, as I conjectured him from his appearance, was also commoved; sitting opposite to Mr. Morris, that he was a terror communicat ed himself to him, though he not why.

I broke the silence of surprise occasioned the abrupt entrance.—"My name, Mr. Ingle- Francia Osbaldiston; I understand that some- drel has brought a complaint before you, me with being concerned in a loss which he, has much involved."

"Sir," said the Justice, somewhat peevishly, are matters I never enter upon after dinner a time for every thing, and a justice of peace as well as of the law, has much involved."

The goodly person of Mr. Inglewood, it seemed by no means to have suffered by the whether in the service of the law or of reis not concluded, sir," replied the magistrate; "requires digestion as well as food, and I protest we have been gratified by your visit. Unless I am at two hours of quiet leisure, intermingled with sea air, and a moderate circulation of the

"your honour will forgive me," said Mr. Jobson, and produced and arranged his writing implements, with what a liveliness and animation might be expected from this. "The charge here is that of a felony, and the gentleman for it, let us come to the point. These scattered wits had yet to be assembled—"I charge no-one with anything against the gentleman," was the reply. "I have only a word or two to say about the matter—Mr. Osbourne, you help yourself," he added.

"I am not in a position to say anything against the gentleman," was the reply. "I have only a word or two to say about the matter—Mr. Osbourne, you help yourself," he added.

The justice, starting up with an alacrity that had never before been shown, proceeded to the court, where the whole of the evidence had been given, and the case was brought to a close. The court was adjourned till the next day, and the case was left for the consideration of the jury. The trial was adjourned till the next day, and the case was left for the consideration of the jury. The trial was adjourned till the next day, and the case was left for the consideration of the jury.
against me, alleging, "that since I had confessedly, upon my own showing, assumed the bearing or deportation of a frank and open man, I had voluntarily subjected myself to the suspicions of which I complained, and brought myself within the compass of the act, having wilfully clothed my conduct with all the false and livid hue of base guilt."

I combated both his arguments and his jargon with much indignation and scorn, and observed, "that I should, if necessary, produce the bill of my relations, which my conscience would not permit him to presume without subjecting the magistrat[e] in a misdemeanor."

"Pardon me, my good sir,—pardon me," said the insatiable clerk, "this is a case in which neither bail nor imprisonment is liable to be committed on heavy grounds of suspicion, not being revivable under the statute of the 3d of King Edward, there being in that act an express exception of such as be charged of commandment, or force, or aid of felony done; and he hinted, that his worship would do well to remember that such were no way revivable by common writ, nor without writ."

At this period of the conversation a servant entered, and extended a letter to me, by reason I was no sooner run it hastily over, than he exclaimed, with the air of one who wished to appear much vexed at the interruption, and felt the consequence attached to a manner of speaking—"You see, sir, why, at this rate, I shall have neither time to attend to the public concerns nor my own—no rest—no quiet—I wish to Heaven another gentleman in our line would settle here!"

"God forbid!" said the Justice, in a tone of sotto-voice depression; "some of us have enough of the trade."

"This is a matter of life and death, if your worship pleases."

"In God's name, I hope no more justice business, I hope," said the alarmed magistrate.

"Humph," replied Mr. Johnson, very consequential; "old Gaifer Rutledge of Grime's-hill, is summoned for the next world; he has sent an express for Dr. Kill-down to put in bail,—another for me to arrange his worldly affairs."

"Away with you, then," said Mr. Inglewood hastily; "his may not be a revivable case under the statute, you know, or Mr. Justice Death may not like the doctor for a main person, or bailman."

"And yet," said Johnson, lingering as he moved towards the door, "if my presence here be necessary—I could make out the warrant for commitual in a moment and the constable and you have heard," he said, lowering his voice, "Mr. Rashleigh's opinion—the rest was lost in a whisper.

The Justice replied aloud, "I tell thee no, man, no—do not till thou return, man, but to the foamy river—Call upon the botte, Mr. Morris."

"Don't be cast down, Mr. Osbaldstone—And you, my case of the wilderness—one cup of claret to refresh the bloom of your cheeks.

Diana started as if from a noisette, in which she appeared to have been plunged while we held this discussion. "No, Justice, I should be afraid of transferring the bloom to a part of my face where it would show to advantage," she said. "But I will, if you will, give you a cool beverage; and, filling a glass with water, she drank it hastily, while her hurried maner belied her assumed gayety.

I was no leisure to make remarks upon her demeanour, however, being full of vexation at the interference of fresh obstacles to an instant examination of the disgraceful and impertinent charge which was brought against me. But there was no moving the Justice to take the matter up in absence of his jerk, an incident which gave him apparently as much pleasure as a holiday to a school-boy. He persisted in his efforts to compose a company of the individuals of which, whether considered with reference to each other, or to their respective situations, were by no means inclined to mirth. "Come, Master Morris, you're not the first man that's been robbed, I tell you, nor the first that's been cut to pieces."

And you, Mr. Frank Osbaldstone, are not the first—boy that has said stand to a true man.

There was Jack Winterfield, in my you the best company in the land—at horsey cock-fights and gaming tables. Jack—Push the bottle, Mr. Morris, it's yours. Many quart bumpers have I cracked, many a mery man with poor Jack—get ready we—always as honest a soul as God made, though we're snug among ourselves, Mr. C. if you will have my best advice, I would matter—the law's hard—very severe!—Jack Winterfield at York, desperate interest—all for easing a fat grasier of the price of a few beasts—Now nest Mr. Morris has been frightened, an I—n—it, man, let the poor fellow have a bateau, and end the frolic once."

Morris's eyes brightened up at this sug he began to hesitate for an assurance l food for no man's blood, when I cut the commotion—on the contrary, as a Mr. gestion as an insult, that went directly to guilt of the very crime which I had come with the expression of intention of disavow in this a severe profit. I closed the door, and leing the door, announced, "A strange wait upon your honour! and the party w described entered the room without further

CHAPTER IX.

One of the thieves came back again! I'll a he does not write now, so near the a And call in vain 'tis, till I see him offer it.

"A stranger!" echoed the Justice, business, I trust, for I'll be—"

His protestation was cut short by the a man himself. "My business is of a n aro and particular," said my acqu Campbell,—for it was he, the very S I had seen at Northallerton,—"and I your honour to give instant and heedful to it—I believe, Mr. Morris," he added, t on that part with a look of I almost ferocity—"I believe ye ken b I believe ye cannot have forgotten w our meeting on the road?" Morrie his companion became the bearer of a tooth chattered, and he gave visible sign of consternation. "Take heart of said Campbell, and dinna sit chatterin there like a pair of crows! I think na difficulty in your telling Mr. Justice, seen me of yore, and ken me to be a case, and a man of honour,—ye ken fu be some time resident in my vicinity, have the power, as I will possess the in do you as good a turn."

"Sir—sir—I believe you to be a man as you say, a man of fortune," Mr. he added, clearing his voice, "I really gentleman to be so."

And what are this gentleman's con me?" said the Justice, somewhat pe man introduces another, like the rhyme that Jack built, and I get company w peace or conversation?"

"Both shall be yours, sir," answere "in a brief period of time. I come to mind from a piece of troublesome duty, increment to it."

"Body of me! then you are welcome to England, and that's not saying get on, man, let's hear what you have once."

"I presume this gentleman," continued Briton, "told you there was a man w Campbell with him, when he had the lose his value!"
"He has not mentioned such a name, from beginning to end of the matter," said the Justice.

"I conceive—i conceive," replied Mr. Campbell;

"I am no witness, but what has been reported to me by another gentleman, who has been a stranger into collision with the judicial forms of the country; but as I understand my evidence is necessary to the compurgation of one honest gentleman and the domicil of another, that declined by me, but afterwards accepted, when I overtook you on the road near Oberry Alera, and was prevailed on by you to resign your intentions of proceeding to Rothberry; and, if by misfortune, to accompany you on your pro"...
somewhat dampened by reflection on what his clerk's view of the transaction might be at his return.

"But I'll all right," said Mr. Nash, "I've released all those d—d papers—I doubt I should not have destroyed them, after all—but, hang it, it is only paying his fees, and that will make all smooth—And now, Miss Vernon, you must not take a second hour. I have ordered all our affairs, and I suppose you are to be up and carried off by your cousin, and have old Cob a fiddler, and be as merry as the maids; and Frank Osbaldistone and I will have a carouse that will make us fit company for the hall at the Justice's.

"Thanks, most worshipful," returned Miss Vernon; "but, as matters stand, we must return instantly to Osbaldistone Hall, where they do not know what has become of us, and are in a state of anxiety on my cousin's account, which is just the same as if one of his own sons were concerned.

"I believe it truly," said the Justice; "for when his eldest son is out, he is a man of a solitary and desolate life, and I suppose the news of him has just reached him. I will pray hasten home, and relieve his paternal solicitude, since go you must. But, hark thee hither, heath-blossom, he said, pulling her towards him by the hand, and in a good-humoured tone of admonition, "You must let me just take a look at your pretty finger into her old rusted pie, all full of fragments of law gibberish—French and dog-Latin—And Die, my beauty, let young fellows shout each other down the street, and dance in the rooms, in case you should lose your own road, while you are pointing out theirs. My pretty Will o' the Wisp.

With this admonition, he saluted and dismissed Miss Vernon, and took an equally kind farewell of me.

"Thou seem's to be a good tight lad, Mr. Nash, and I remember thy father too—he was my play-fellow at school. Hark thee, lad, ride early at night, and don't be mad with carriage passengers, or chance the king's highway. I'm only one of the king's liege subjects not bound to understand joking, and I'm all cracking jokes on matters of felony. And here's a poem of Die Vernon too—in a manner alone and desolate, and unconnected on the face of this wide earth, and left to ride, and run, and scamper at her own silly pleasure. Thou must be careful of Die, or, equal, I will turn a young fellow into a rascal, and drive myself off. I don't think you own a good deal of trouble. And now, get ye both gone, and leave me to my pipe of tobacco, and my meditations; for what art I?

"The Indian leaf doth briefly burn;
No doth man's strength to weakness turn;
The fire of youth extinguishes quite,
Comes away like amber, dry and white.
Think of this as you take tobacco."

I was much pleased with the pleases of sense and feeling which escaped from the Justice through the vapours of sloth and self-indulgence, assured him of my respect for his admonitions, and took a friendly farewell of the honest magistrate and his hospitable mansion.

We found a repast prepared for us in the ante-room, which we partook of, and rejoined the same servant of Sir Hildebrand who had taken our horses at our entrance, and who had been directed, as he informed Miss Vernon, by Mr. Rashleigh, to wait and assist us. We conversed in way in which we were in silence, for, to say truth, my mind was too much bewildered with the events of the morning, to permit me to be the first to break it. At length Miss Vernon excused herself, and retired, and I was left entirely to the disposition of Mr. Rashleigh.

"Weil, Rashleigh is a man to be feared and wonder at, and all but loved; he does whatever he pleases, and takes all others his puppets—he has a player ready to perform any part which he imagines of a game of entertainment and readiness which supply expedients for every emergency.

"You thank then," said I, answering rather to her meaning, than to the express words she made use of. "that this Mr. Campbell, whose appearance was so opportune, and who so cleverly managed to engage me as a follower of a driven partridge, was an agent of Mr. Rashleigh Osbaldistone's?"

"I do give as much," replied Diana, "as shrewdly enough to deserve credit, that he would hardly have appeared so very much in the nick of time, if I had not happened to meet Rashleigh in the hall at the Justice's."

"In that case, my thanks are chiefly due to you, my fair preserver.

"To be sure they are," returned Diana, "and pray, suppose them paid, and accepted with a gracious smile, for I do not care to be troubled with hearing them in good earnest, and am much more likely to yawn than to believe becoming. In short, Mr. Frank, I wished to serve you, and I have fortunately been the but of my wit, which is only favourable to sat in return, and that is, that you will say no more about it. But who comes here to meet us, 'conspiring, fiery-red with haste'? It is the subordinate name of Mr. Rashleigh in the hands of Miss Vernon.

And Mr. Joseph Jobson it proved to be, in great haste, and, as it speedily appeared, in most extreme bad humour. He came up to us, and stopped his horse, as we were about to pass with a slight salutation.

"So, sir—so, Miss Vernon—aye—I see well enough how it is—hail put in during my absence, I suppose—So I should to know who does the recognise that's all. If his husband uses his leisure, without often, I advise him to get another clerk, that's all, for I shall certainly demit.

"Or suppose he get his present clerk stiched to his sleeve, Mr. Jobson," said Diana, "would not that do as well? And pray how does Farmer Rutledge, Mr. Jobson? I hope you found him able to sign, seal, and deliver."

This question seemed greatly to increase the wrath of the man of law. He looked at Miss Vernon with such an air of spite and resentment, as made me under a strong temptation to knock him off his horse with the butt of my whip, which I only suppressed in consideration of his insignificance.

"Farmer Rutledge, ma'am?" said the clerk, as soon as his indignation permitted him to articulate. "Farmer Rutledge, Sir, the first man of King William, ha' of glorious and immortal memory—our immortal deliverer from papists and pretenders, and wooden shoes and warming pans, Miss Vernon.

"Sad things, these wooden shoes and warming pans," returned Miss Vernon, "and said I came to hunt for a job, ma'am—which I have no more right to have said to you than any other gentleman of my profession, ma'am—especially as I am clerk to the peace, having and holding said office unless Trigismo Septimo Henriico Octavino et Primo Germanici, etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc., etc, clerk of peace to the county; and Gaffer Rutledge says you are a pettifogger; and in neither capacity am I entitled to be impertinent to a young lady of fashion.”

Miss Vernon laid her hand on my arm, and exclaimed, “Come, Mr. Osbaldestone, I will have no nonsense here. You are not a girl, and not a young fellow, and would be shut up in a nunnery, if I did half the things that I have a mind to; and that, if I had your happy prerogative of acting as your fancy dictates, I should make the world mad with imitating and applauding.”

“I can’t quite afford you the sympathy you expect upon this score,” I replied; “the misfortune is so general, that it belongs to one half of the species; and the other half—”

“Are so much better cared for, that they are jealous of your prerogatives,” interrupted Miss Vernon; “I forgot you were a party interested. Nay,” said she, as I was about to speak, “that soft spirit is intended to be the preface of a very pretty compliment respecting the peculiar advantages which Dr. Vernon’s friends and kin are anxious to enjoy, by being born one of their Holes; but spare me the utterance, my good friend, and let us try whether we shall agree better on the second count of my misfortune against fortune, as that quill-driving puppy would call it. I belong to and have need of sect and antiquated religion; and, instead of getting credit for my devotion, as is due to all good girls beside, my kind friend, Justice Ingleswood, may send me to the house of correction, mere avarice and pride to my ancestors, and say, as old Pembroke did to the Albees of Wilton, when he usurped their convenant and establishment. Go spin, you jade—Go spin.”

“Such is this world,” said Miss Vernon, “Com; sult some of our learned divines, or consult your own excellent understanding, Miss Vernon; and surely the particular in which our religious creed differs from that in which you live, is that you live—”

“Hush!” said Diana, placing her fore-finger on her mouth. “Hush! no more of that. Foresake the faith of my gallant fathers!—I would as soon, were I a man, forsake the name of Pembroke, without which I pressed hardest against it, and turn, like a hirling reccant, to join the victorious enemy.”

“If you are fretful and irritating, for all that. But I see, hand of heart as you are, my chance of beating him, or drawing out flax into marvelous corse thread, affects you as little as my condemnation to coil and pinners, instead of beaver and cockade; so that I need not trouble you with a sort of Protestant remonstrance for my Catholic errors, I suppose,” said Miss Vernon, laughing. “Well, I thank you for the information, Mr. Johnson, and will be more home as fast as I can, and be a better housekeeper, I am sure.”

“Good night, ma’am, and remember the law is not to divide its sentence with you.”

“And we rode in our separate ways.”

“There goes for a troublesome mischief-making tool,” said Miss Vernon, as she gave a glance after him; “it is hard that persons of birth and rank and estate should be so lightly off the official importance of such a paunchy pick-pock, or, rather, by cleaving together the whole world believed not much above a hundred years ago—for certainly our Catholic faith had been shaken, though I am sure it would worth while to waste any compassion upon me.”

“I was much tempted to have broken the rascal’s head,” I replied.

“You would have acted very like a nasty young man,” said Miss Vernon, “and yet, in my own hand been an ounce heavier than it is; I think I should have laid its weight upon him. Well, it does not signify complaining; but there are three things for which I should be willing to pay the cost of for I think it worth while to waste any compassion upon me.”

“And what are these three things, Miss Vernon, may I ask?”

“Let me promise you my deepest sympathy, if you tell you?”

“Certainly—can you doubt it?” I replied, closing my horse nearer to hers as I spoke with an expressive

VOL. II. 3 C
That is indeed a misfortune, Miss Vernon, which I do most sincerely compassionate, but which I should have anticipated. "O, Mr. Osbaldestone, if you but knew—if any one knew, what difficulty I sometimes find in hiding an aching heart with a smooth brow, you would indeed pity and sympathise with me. In my present condition, even thus far on my own situation; but you are a young man of sense and penetration—you cannot but long to ask me a hundred questions on the events of this day—on the share which Rashleigh has in your deliverance from this petty scrape—upon many other points which cannot but excite your attention—and I cannot bring myself to answer with the necessary frankness. I should do it awkwardly, and lose your good opinion, if I have any share of it, as well as my own. It is best to say at once, Ask me no questions, I have it not in my power to reply to them."

Miss Vernon spoke these words with a tone of feeling which could not but make a corresponding impression upon me. I assured her she had neither to fear my raging with impertinent questions, nor to misconstruing her declining to answer which might in themselves be reasonable, or at least natural.

"I am too much obliged," I said, "by the interest she had taken in my affairs, to misuse the opportunity her goodness had afforded me of pitying into hers—I only trusted and entreated, that if my services could at all be useful, I should command them, without doubt or hesitation."

"Thank you—thank you," she replied; "your voice does not ring the cuckoo chime of compliment, but speaks like that of one who knows what he pledges himself. If—but it is impossible—but yet, if an opportunity should occur, I will ask you if you remember this promise; and I assure you, I shall not be angry if you refuse, if you think it is enough that you are more in your intentions just now—much may occur to alter them ere I call upon you, should that instant ever come, to assist Die Vernon, as you have done those of your brother."

"And if I were Die Vernon's brother," said I, "there could not be less chance that I should refuse my assistance—And now I am afraid I must not ask whether Rashleigh was willingly accessory to my deliverance?"

"Not of me; but you may ask of himself, and depend upon it, he will say yes; for rather than any good action should walk through the world like an unappropositive adjective in an ill-arranged sentence, he is always willing to stand noun substantive to it himself."

"And I must not ask whether this Campbell be the party who eased Mr. Morris of his portmanteau, or whether the letter, which our friend the attorney received, was not a finesse to withdraw him from the scene of action, lest he should have marred the happy event of my deliverance? I and must not ask—"

"You must ask nothing of me," said Miss Vernon; "so it is quite in vain to go on perusing cases. You are to think just as well of me, as if I had answered all these queries, and twenty others besides, as glibly as Rashleigh could have done; and observe, whenever I touch your chin just so, it is a sign that I cannot speak the truth. You have anticipated me again."

I need not set down the correspondence with you, because you are to be my confidant and my counsellor, only you are to know nothing whatever of the rest."

"Nothing can be more reasonable," I replied, laughing; "and the extent of your confidence will, you may rely upon it, only be equalled by the sagacity of my counsellor."

This sort of conversation brought us in the highest good-nature with each other, to Osbaldestone Hall, where we found the family far advanced in the revels of the evening."

"Get some dinner for Mr. Osbaldestone and me in the library," said Miss Vernon to a servant—"I must have some compassion upon you," she added, turning to me, "and provide against your starving in the mansion of brutal abundance; otherwise I am not sure that I should show you my private haunts. This same library is my den—the only corner of the Hall-house where I am safe from the Ourang-Outang of my cousins. They never venture there, I suppose, for fear the folios should fall down and crack their skulls; for they are apt to affect their heads in many other way—So follow me."

And I followed through hall and bower, vaulted passage and winding stair, until we reached the room where she had ordered our refreshments.

CHAPTER X.

In the wide pile, by others headed not, Here is a sacred solitary spot. Whose gloomy aisles and bending shelves contain For moral hunger food, and cures for moral pain. As elsewhere.

This library at Osbaldestone Hall was a gloomy room, whose antique oaken shelves bent beneath the weight of the ponderous folios so far to the seventeenth century, from which, it was said, before it was broken, we have distilled matter for our quartos and octavos, and which, once more subjected to the alchemic, may, should our sons be yet more frivolous than ourselves, be once more reduced to phials and pamphlets. The collection was chiefly of the classics, as well foreign as ancient history, and, above all, divinity. It was in wretched order. The priests, who, in successive years, had acted as curates there, were, for many years, the only persons who entered its precincts, until Rashleigh's thirst for reading had led him to disturb the venerable spiders, who had ruffled the fronts of the presses with their webs. His destination for the church rendered his conduct less absurd in his father's eyes, than if any of his other descendants had betrayed so strange a propensity, and Sir George was a strict example to the lords of Osbaldestone Hall for learning, and for the volumes which record its treasures.

"You are an old man, and you will be consoled," I suppose?" said Diana, as I glanced my eye round the forlorn apartment; "but to me it seems like a little paradise, for I call it my own, and fear no intrusion. Rashleigh was joint proprietor with me, while we were friends."

"And are you no longer so?" was my natural question.

Her forefinger immediately touched her dimpled chin, with an arch look of prohibition.

"We are still alike," she continued, "bound, like other confederate powers, by circumstances of mutual interest; but I am afraid, as will happen in other cases, the treaty of alliance has survived the unchangeable dispositions in which it had its origin. At any rate, we live less together; and when he comes through that door there, I vanish through this door here; and so, you see, one may make two or two be one too many for this apartment, as large as it seems. Rashleigh, whose occasions frequently call him elsewhere, has generously made a cession of his rights in my favour; so that I now endeavour to prosecute alone the studies in which he used formerly to be my guide."

"And what are those studies, if I may presume to ask?"

"Indeed you may, without the least fear of seeing my fore-finger raised to my chin. Science and history are my principal favours; but I also study poetry and the classics."

"And the classics? Do you read them in the original?"

"Unquestionably; Rashleigh, who is no contemptible scholar, taught me Greek and Latin, as well as..."
most of the languages of modern Europe. I assure you, there has been some pains taken in my education, although I can neither sew a tucker, nor work cross-stitch, nor make a pudding, nor, as the vicar's fat wife, with as much truth as elegance, good-will, and affection, pleased to do my best for the behoof, do any other useful thing in the versal world.

"And was this selection of studies Rashleigh's choice, or your own, Miss Vernon?" I asked.

"As to whether he was desirous to answer my question,—" it's not worth while lifting my finger about, after all,—why, partly his, and partly mine. As I learned out of doors to ride a horse, and bridle and unbridle, and take a touch of neatness, and to clear a five-barred gate, and fire a gun without winking, and all other of those masculine accomplishments, that my brute cousins run mad after, I wanted, like my rational cousin, to read Greek and Latin within doors, and make my complete approach to the tree of knowledge, which you men-scholars would endanger yourselves, in revenge, I suppose, for our common mother's shame in the great original transgression.

"And Rashleigh readily indulged your propensity to learning?"

"Why, he wished to have me for his scholar, and he thought I could not have that which he had. He was not likely to instruct me in the mysteries of wearing lace ruffles, or hemming cambric-handkerchiefs, I suppose.

"And you are not the temptation of getting such a scholar, and have no doubt that it made a weighty consideration on the tutor's part."

"O, if you begin to investigate Rashleigh's motives, my touchy woman, I can only be frank where my own are inquired into. But to resume—he has resigned the library in my favour, and never enters without leave had and obtained; and so I have been taken the liberty of making a posset for some of my own goods and chattels, as you may see by looking round you."

"I beg pardon, Miss Vernon, but I really see nothing but what which can distinguish as likely to claim you as mistress."

"That is, I suppose, because you do not see a shepherd or shepherdess wrought inworsted, and handsomely framed in black ebony,—or a stuffed parrot,—or a breeding-cage, full of canary-birds,—or a housewife-case, brodered with tarnished silver,—or a toilet-table, with a nest of japanned boxes, with as many tapers as Christmas-mistas,—or a broken-backed slipett,—or a lute with three strings,—or rock-work,—or shell-work,—or needle-work,—or work of any kind,—or a lap-dog, with a litter of blind puppies, to understand its value, was continued, after a pause, in order to recover the breath she had lost in enumerating them—" But there stands the sword of my ancestor Sir Richard Vernon, slain at the battle, and more than ordinary set off. I called Will Shakespeare, whose Lancastrian partialities, and a certain knack in embodying them, has turned history upside down, or rather inside out,— and by that redoubt a weapon hanged the mail of the still elder Vernon, afo to the Black Prince, whose fate is the reverse of his descendant's, since he is more indebted to the bard, who took the trouble to celebrate him, for good-will, than for talents,—

"Ah yes! that was the sword you wished to receive? Brave knight, with pipe on shield, eclipsed Vernon; Like a lone hawk amid the plain he thereon!"

"Fret to be carving thistles, while others plundered.

Then there is a model of a new martingale which I invented myself—a great improvement on the Duke of Newcastle's; and there are the hood and bells of my falcon's skin, that resided himself on a heron's tail. Horsely-moss—Peacock. There is a tame bird on the perches below, but are kites and rifers compared to him; and there is my own light fowling-piece, with an improved fire-lock; with twenty other treasures you would not see as another. And there, that speaks for itself.

She pointed to the carved oak-frame of a full-length portrait by Van Dyke, which was inscribed, in Gothic characters, T. R. The purchaser has looked at her for explanation. "Do you not know said she, with some surprise "our motto—the Vernon motto, where,

"Like the solemn vice, Iniquity, We moralize two meanings in one word."

And do you not know our cognizance, the pipes?—pointing to the armorial bearings sculptured upon the oaken steeple, around which the legend was displayed.

"Pipes—they look more like penny-whistles—But, pray, do not be angry with my ignorance," I continued, observing the colour mount to her cheeks, "I can mean no affront to your armorial bearings, for I do not even know my own."

"You in Osbaldstone, and confess so much!" she exclaimed. "Why, Percie, Thornie, John, Dickon—Wilfred himself, might be your instructor—Even ignorance itself is a plummet over you."

"With shame I confess it, my dear Miss Vernon, the mysteries couched under the grim hieroglyphics of heraldry are to me as unintelligible as those of the Pyramids of Egypt."

"Is it possible?—Why, even my uncle reads Gwilym sometimes of a winter night—Not know the figures of heraldry?—of what could your father be the thinking."

"Of the figures of arithmetic, I answered, "the most insignificant unit of which he holds more highly than all the blazonry of chivalry. But, though I am ignorant of the inexplicable decree, I have knowledge and taste enough to admire that splendid picture, in which I think I can discover a family likeness to you. What case and dignity in the attitude—what richness of colouring—what breadth and depth of shade?"

"Is it really a fine painting?" she asked.

"I have seen many works of the renowned artist." I replied, "and I never beheld one more to my liking."

"Well, I know as little of pictures as you do of heraldry," replied Miss Vernon; "yet I have the advantage of you, because I have always admired the painting, and have understood its character.""

"While I have neglected picces and tabors and all the whinsimal combinations of chivalry, still I am informed that they floated in the fields of ancient fame. But you will allow their exterior appearance is not so peculiarly interesting to the uninformed spectator as that of a fine painting.—Who is the person here represented?"

"My grandfather—he shared the misfortunes of Charles I; and, I am sorry to add, the excesses of his son. Our patrimonial estate was greatly injured by his prodigality, and was altogether lost by his successors. I have turned it out to the people who have got it—it was lost in the cause of loyalty."

"Oh! our father, I presume, suffered in the political dissensions of the period."

"He did indeed; he lost his all. And hence is his child a descendant orphan; eating the bread of others; subjected to their caprices, and compelled to study their inclinations: Yet louder of having had such a father, than if, playing a more prudent, but less upright part, he had left me possessor of all the rich and fair baronies which his family once possessed."

As she thus spoke, the entrance of the servants was dinner cut off all conversation but that of a general nature.

When our hasty meal was concluded, and the wines placed on the table, the domestic informed us, "that Mr. Rashleigh had desired to be told when our dinner was removed."

"Tell him," said Miss Vernon, "we shall be happy to see him in the room, step the way was open, and chair, and leave the room. You must retire with him when he goes away," she continued, addressing herself to me; "even my liberality cannot spare a gentleman above eight hours out of the twenty-four; I think we have been together for at least that length of time."

"The old scythe-man has moved so rapidly," I answered, "I cannot count his strides."

"Humph!" said Miss Vernon; "I believe Rashleigh— And she drew off her chair, to which I had approached mine rather closely, so as to place a greater distance between us.

A modest tap at the door,—a gentle manner of opening. Your maiden and solemnity, and the softness and humility of step and deportment, announced that the education of Rashleigh Osbaldeston at the College of St. Omera accorded well with the ideas I entertained of the model of a gentleman, and of Jesus, if need not add, that, as a sound Protestant, these ideas were not the most favourable. 'Why should you use the ceremony of knocking,' said Miss Vernon, 'when you know better?'

This was spoken with a burst of impatience, as if she had felt that Rashleigh's air of caution and reserve covered some insinuation of impertinent suspicion. 'I do not remember at this door so perfectly, my fair cousin,' answered Rashleigh, without change of voice or manner, 'that halit has become a second nature.'

'I praise sincerity more than courtesy, sir, and you know I do,' was Miss Vernon's reply.

'Courteously is a gallant way, a courtier by name and by profession,' replied Rashleigh, 'and therefore I fit it for a lady's bower.'

'But Sincerity is the true knight,' retorted Miss Vernon, 'and therefore much more welcome, cousin. But, to end a debate not over amusing to your sensitive feelings, I shall give you, Francis Osbaldestone your countenance to his glass of wine. I have done the honours of the dinner, for the credit of Osbaldeston Hall.'

Rashleigh, and filled his glass, glancing his eye from Diana to me, with an embarrassment which his utmost efforts could not entirely disguise. I thought he appeared to be uncertain concerning the extent of coinidence which I had reposed in me, and hastened to lead the conversation into a channel which should sweep away his suspicion that Diana might have betrayed my secrets which revealed my character. Mr. Rashleigh, said I, Miss Vernon, has recommended me to return my thanks to you for my speedy disengagement from the ridiculous accusation of Mr. Vernon; and, unjustly fearing my gratitude might not be warmly enough to remind me of this duty, she has put my curiosity on its sides, by referring me to you for an account, or rather explanation, of the events of the day.'

Indeed?' answered Rashleigh, 'I should have thought,' (looking keenly at Miss Vernon,) 'that the lady herself might have stood interpreter;' and his eye, retreating from her face, sought mine, as if to see whether I was not making a fruitless and vain effort, when Diana's communication had been as narrowly limited as my words had intimated. Miss Vernon retorted his inquisitive glance with one of decided scorn; which Rashleigh, not presenting obvious suspicion, replied, 'If it is your pleasure, Mr. Rashleigh, as it has been Miss Vernon's, to leave me in ignorance, I must necessarily submit; but, pray, do not withhold your information from me on the ground of imagining that I have already obtained any on the subject. For I tell you as a man of honour, I am as ignorant as that picture of any thing relating to which I have witnessed to-day, excepting that I understand from Miss Vernon, that you have been kindly active in my favour.'

Miss Vernon, has overrated my humble efforts,' said Rashleigh, 'for I can find credit for thezen. The truth is, that as I galloped back to get some one of our family to join me in becoming your bail, which was the most obvious, or, indeed, I may say, the only way of serving you which occurred to my stupidity, I met the man Cammell-Colville Campbell, or whatsoever they call him. I had understood from Morris that he was present when the robbery was committed, and that apart from the fact of the obvious and unanswerable suspicion on him (with some difficulty, I confess,) to tender his evidence in your exculpation, which I presumed was the reason of your being released from an unpleasant situation.'

'Indeed?—I am much your debtor for procuring such a reasonable evidence in my behalf. But I cannot see why, (having been, as he said, a fellow-sufferer with Morris,) it should have required much trouble to persuade him to step forth and bear evidence, whether to convict the actual robbers, or free an innocent person.'

'You do not know the genius of that man's country, sir,' answered Rashleigh; 'discretion, prudence, and foresight, are his leading qualities; these are only modified by a narrow-spirited, but yet ardent patriotism, which forces an even more constant loyalty to the concentric bulwarks with which a Scotchman fortifies himself against all the attacks of a generous philantropical principle. Surmount this mountain, you find an inner and severe detachment, which, as he has been born in his province, his village, or, most probably, his clan; storm this second obstacle, you have a third—his attachment to his own family—his father, mother, uncle, nephews, daughter, niece, the whole family. Knock through that, and you are in the ninth generation. It is within these limits that a Scotchman's social affection expands itself, never reaching those which are outermost, till all means of discharging itself, in the interior circles have been exhausted. It is within these circles that his heart throws each pulsation being fainter and fainter, till beyond the widest boundary, it is almost unfelt. And what is worst of all, could you surmount those concentric outworks, you have an inner citadel, deeper, higher, and more efficient than them all—a Scotchman's love for himself.'

'All this is highly eloquent and metaphorical, Rashleigh,' said Miss Vernon, who listened with unexpressed impatience; 'there are only two objections to it; first it is not true; secondly, if true, it is nothing to the purpose.'

'It is true, my finest Diana,' returned Rashleigh; 'and moreover, it is most instantly to the purpose. It is true, because you cannot deny that I know the country and people intimately, and because the character is drawn from deep and accurate consideration; and it is to the purpose, because it answers Mr. Francis Osbaldeston's question, and shows why this same worthy Scotchman, who has never been either his countryman, nor a Campbell, nor his cousin in any of the inextricable combinations by which they extend their pedigree; and, above all, seeing no prospect of personal advantage; but, on the contrary, much hazard of loss of time and delay of business—'

'With other inconveniences, perhaps, of a nature yet more formidable,' interrupted Miss Vernon.

'Of which, doubtless, there might be many,' said Rashleigh, continuing in the same tone. 'In short, my theory shows why this man, hoping for no advantage, from a sense of justice, might require degree of persuasion ere he could be prevailed on to give his testimony in favour of Mr. Osbaldeston.'

'It seems surprising to me,' I observed, 'that during the glance I cast over the declaration, or whatever it is termed, of Mr. Morris, he should never have mentioned that Campbell was in his company when he met the marauders.'

'I understood from Campbell, that he had taken his solemn promise not to mention that circumstance,' replied Rashleigh; 'his reason for exacting such an engagement you may guess from what I have hinted—he wished to get back to his own country undelayed and unembarrassed by any of the judicious inquiries which he would have been under the necessity of answering, if the fact of his being present were to vail on him (with some difficulty, I confess,) to tender his evidence in your exculpation, which I presume was the reason of your being released from an unpleasant situation.'

'Indeed?—I am much your debtor for procuring such a reasonable evidence in my behalf. But I cannot see why, (having been, as he said, a fellow-sufferer with Morris,) it should have required much to his promise when the robbery was committed. I cannot yet see how he could attain such an influence over the man as to make him suppress his evidence in order to avoid the manifest risk ofsubjecting his story to discredit.

Rashleigh agreed with me, that it was very extraordinary, and seemed to regret that he had not questioned on that point; but it must have been, that subject, which he allowed looked extremely mysterious.

"But," he added immediately after this acquiescence, "are you sure the circumstance of Morris's being accused before the Campbell, is really not alluded to in his examination?"

"I read the paper over hastily," said I; "but it is my strong impression, that no such circumstance is mentioned, at least it must have been, that subject, which he allowed looked extremely mysterious.

"Yet no—strictly speaking, served; but he has been, like most of his countrymen, trained to arms. Indeed, among the hills, they carry them from boyhood to the grave. So, if you know any thing of your fellow-traveller, you will easily judge, that, going to such a country, he will take care to avoid a quarrel, if he can help it, with any of the natives.—but, come, I see you decline your wine—and I too am a degenerate Osbaldestone, so far as respects the circulation of the bottle. If you will go to my room, I will hold your hand at puquet.

We rose to take leave of Miss Vernon, who had from time to time suppressed, apparently with difficulty, any allusion to a temptation to break in upon Rashleigh's details. As we were about to leave the room, the smothered fire broke forth.

"Mr. Osbaldestone," she said, "your own observations led you to verify the justice or injustice, of Rashleigh's suggestions concerning such individuals as Mr. Campbell and Mr. Morris. But, in slandering Scotland, he has borne false witness against a whole country; and I request you will allow no weight to his evidence."

"Perhaps," I answered, "I may find it somewhat difficult to obey your injunction, Miss Vernon; for if I must own I was bled up, wi' no very favourable taste of our northern neighbours."

"Distrust that part of your education, sir," she replied, "and let the daughter of a Scotchwoman prove, and make you a convert to the truth, without birth, until your own observation has proved them to be unworthy of your good opinion. Preserve your hardened and contemptible for dissimulation, baseness, and falsehood, wherever they are to be met with. You will find enough of all without leaving England. — Adieu, gentlemen. I wish you good evening."

And she signed to the door, with the manner of a privy servant, with a servile grace.

We retired to Rashleigh's apartment, where a servant brought us coffee and cakes. I had formed my resolution to press Rashleigh no further on the event of his marriage; but to ascertain if my suspicions were just, it was necessary to throw him off his guard. We cut for the deal, and were soon carnestly engaged in our play. I thought I perceived in this trifling for amusement (for the stake which Rashleigh proposed was a mere trifle) something of a fierce and over-temperamental disposition, perfectly to understand the beautiful game at which he played, but preferred, as it were on principle, the risking bold and precipitous strokes to the ordinary rules of play; and were better-balanced chances of the game, he hazarded everything for the chance of piquing, repiquing, or captivating his adversary. So soon as the intervention of a game or two at puquet, like the music between the acts of a drama, had completely interrupted our precious course of conversation, Rashleigh appeared to tire of the game, and the cards were superseded by discourse, in which he took the lead, and very slightly, since it failed to catch my attention.

"True, true," answered Rashleigh, forming his own inference while he adopted my words; "in order to think with you, that the circumstance must in reality have been mentioned, but so slightly, that it failed to attract your attention. And then, as to Campbell's interest with Morris, I incline to suppose that my information has been gained by playing upon his fears. This chicken-hearted fellow, is Morris, I understand, for Scotland, destined for some little employment under government; and, possessing the courage of his order, and a most uncommon MOUSE, he may have been afraid to encounter the ill-will of such a kill-cow as Campbell, whose very appearance would be enough to frighten him out of his little post, and thus let the whole Chronicle of Rashleigh has at times a keen and animated manner—something of a martial cast in his tone and bearing."

"I own," I replied, "that his expression struck me as being fierce, morose, and little adapted to his peaceable professions. Has he served in the army?"

"Yes—no—strictly speaking, served; but he has

"In your own house, my dear sir—and your own nephew—you will not surely persist in hurting his feelings and doing him such a disservice as to refuse him the credit that he so justly deserves. I am not interested in affirming. No doubt, you are fully deserving of all his confidence, and I am sure, were there anything you could do to assist him in this step—should he feel disposed to undertake it—\n\nThe resolution he intimated with a yawn, resistent, less as that of the Goddess in the Dunciad, which was responsive echoed by his giant sons, as they dispersed in quest of the pastimes to which their minds severely inclined them—Perce to discuss a pot of March beer with the steward in the buttery—Thorncliff to cut a pair of cudgels, and fix them in their scabbards, when he returned—Bellow to play at pitch and toss by himself, his right hand against his left—and Wilfred to bite his thumb, and hum himself into a calamin which should last till dinner, if possible. Miss Vernon had retired to the library.

Rashleigh and I were left alone in the old hall, from which the servants, with their usual bustle and activity, had retired to lengthen out the length of the remainder of our substantial breakfast. I took the opportunity to upbraid him with the manner in which he had spoken of my affairs to his father, which I frankly and continued, as I seemed, rather to exhort Sir Hildebrand to conceal his suspicions, than to root them out.

"Why, what can I do, my dear friend?" replied Rashleigh, his father's father's father, so tenacious of suspicions of all kinds, when once they take root, which, to do him justice, does not easily happen, that I have always found it the best way to silence him upon such subjects, instead of arguing with him. Thus I get the better of the weeds which I cannot eradicate, by cutting them over as often as they appear, until at length they die away of themselves. During the whole time he was disputing with me in such a mind as Sir Hildebrand's, which hardens itself against conviction, and believes in its own inspirations as firmly as we good Catholics do in those of the Pope.

"It is very hard, though, that I should live in the house of a man, and he a near relation too, who will persist in believing me guilty of a highway robbery."—

"My father's foolish opinion, if one may give that epithet to any opinion of a father's, does not affect your real innocence; and as to the disgrace of the fact, depend on it, that, considered in all its bearings, political as well as moral, Sir Hildebrand regards it as a meritorious action—a weakening of the enemy—a spoiling of the Amalekites—and you will stand the higher in his regard for your supposed accession to it.

"I desire no man to regard, Mr. Rashleigh, on such terms as must sink me in my own; and I think these injurious suspicions will afford a very good reason for quitting Osbaldstone Hall, which I shall do whenever I can communicate on the subject with my father."

The dark countenance of Rashleigh, though little accustomed to betray its master's feelings, exhibited a sarcastic smile, which he instantly shatened by sight.

"You are a happy man, Frank—you go on and come, as the wind bloweth where it listeth. With your address, taste, and talents, you will soon find circles where you will be the idol of an intelligent mansion of this mansion; while I—" he paused.

"And what is there in your lot that can make you or any one of you mine, an outcast, as I may almost term myself, from my father's house and favour?" my present establishment was more certain; but that must depend upon circumstances, which I can only learn by experience—the disposition of your father, for example.”

“Confess the truth without finesse, Rashleigh; you would willingly know something of him from me,” answered the other, laying his hand on the shoulder of his companion; and following the banner of the good knight Sincerity, I reply—certainly.”

Well, then, you will find in my father a man who has perceived the all the value of the fortune by which he is avariced; that for the exercise they afforded to his talents, than for the love of the gold with which they are surrounded. His active mind would have been happy in any situation which granted him the opportunity. But the existence of fortune has been its sole reward. But his wealth has accumulated, because moderate and frugal in his habits, no new sources of expense have occurred to dispose of his advantages without the influence of some change in his circumstances by which he is most interested in this, to the neglect of all other objects. He is severely strict in the duties of religion; but you have no reason to fear, with your, for he regards toleration as a sacred principle, and his utmost bitterness of satire, or the weapons of his Jealousy, he is born in utter detestation.

But I will add, that every sentiment, and as well as the least tendency to the highflyings or Tory

”O rare-painted portrait!” exclaimed Rashleigh, who was door to door in half a day’s hour’s and without saying a word to you, Frank. I see thy sire before me in all his strength and weakness; loving and honouring the King as a sort of lord mayor of the empire, or chief of the board of trade;—regarding those Connors, for the acts of commercialism in the export trade;—and respecting the Peers, friend, his exclusive devotion to it, which makes him see little worthy of praise or attention, unless it be in some measure connected with commerce.”

”Mine was a likeness, Rashleigh; yours is a caricature from Rome, which has unfolded to you, give me some lights on the geoography of the unknown lands.”

”On which you are wrecked,” said Rashleigh. “It is a name that is known in the Catholic world, and I take, with as little regard to curiosity as to delight the eye—you may desire it in all its nakedness in half a hour’s survey, as well as if I were to lay it down by you by line and compass.”

”O, but something there is, worthy a more attentive survey—What say you to Miss Vernon? Does not she form an interesting object in the landscapes were all round as rude as Iceland’s coast?”

I could plainly perceive that Rashleigh disliked the topic; but I forbore to make the best part of his confession that had given me the advantageous title to make inquiries in my turn. Rashleigh felt this, and found himself obliged to follow my lead, however difficult he might find it to play his cards successfully.

”I have known less of Miss Vernon,” he said, “for some time, than I was wont to do formerly. In early age I was her tutor; but as she advanced towards womanhood, I withdrew from her, and gave her the advice to which I was destined,—the peculiar nature of her engagements,—our mutual situation, in short, tendered a close and constant intimacy dangerous and unwise. We were not destined for each other, Miss Vernon; you are a man of the world, and know how far you can indulge yourself in her society, with safety to yourself and justice to her. But I warn you, that, if you continue to feel as sensible, of truth, as well as good sense, in all this; it seemed to be given as a friendly warning, and I had no right to take it amiss; yet I felt I could with pleasure have run Rashleigh along through the body all the time he was speaking.

The deuce take his insolence! was my internal meditation. Would he wish me to infer, that Miss Vernon and I were in some degree of attachment which had become degraded so low as to require his shyness to cure her of an impudent passion? I will have his meaning from him, was my resolution, if I should drag it out with me for a week.

For this purpose, I placed my temper under as accurate a guard as I could, and observed, “That, for a lady of her good sense and acquired accomplishment, it will be most repugnant to me, to understand Miss Vernon’s manners were rather blunt and rustic.”

”Frank and unreserved, at least, to the extreme,” replied Rashleigh; “yet, trust me, she has an excellent heart. To you, you the true expression of sentiments, should she confide—”

”But,” continued Rashleigh, as if thinking aloud,” I should not like to supplant Thorncliff.”

”Supplant Thorncliff!—Is your brother Thorn-cliff, I inquired, with great surprise,” the destined husband of Diana Vernon?”

”Why, yes; her father’s commands, and a certain family-contract, destine her to marry one of Sir Hildebrand’s sons. A dispensation has just been sought from Rome, on which Miss Vernon has, marry Blank Osbaldstone, Esq., son of Sir Hildebrand Osbaldstone, of Osbaldstone Hall, Bart., and so forth; and it only remains to pitch upon the happy man, whose name shall some day be Percis. Miss Vernon is seldom sober, my father pitched upon Thorn-cliff, as the second prop of the family, and therefore must proclay very near the line of the Osbaldstones.”

”The young lady,” said I, “forcing myself to assume an air of pleasure, which, I believe, became me extremely ill; “would perhaps have been inclined to look a little lower on the family-tree, for the branch to which Miss Vernon has not been more creditable than any of my elders.”

”And so you are not surprised at the doctrine of thunder lady, doubtless?”

”You are not to suppose so,” answered Rashleigh, with an affront of denial, which was contrived to convey the strongest affirmation the case admitted of.”

”Friends of mine, indeed!” answered Miss Vernon,
”For, you are entirely mistaken—we have com-xited to each other in it, and the tender affection of an opening love to its only instructor—Love was not near us—I told you I was wise in time.”

I felt little inclination to pursue this converversation.
any further, and, shaming myself clear of Rashleigh, withdrew to my own apartment, which I recollect I traversed with much vehemence of agitation, repeating a tunny three times—Richard the Third in all but his hump-back!—And yet the opportunities he must have had during his cursed course of lectures; and the fellow's flowing and easy strain of sentiment; and her extreme exclusion from every one who spoke and acted with common sense; and, and her obvious pique at him, mixed with admiration of his talents, which looked as like the result of neglected attachment—a man who had been so useless!—Well, and what is it to me that I should storm and rage at it? Is Diana Vernon the first pretty girl that has loved or married an angry fellow? And if she were free of every Osbaldestone of them, what concern is it of mine?—A Catholic—a Jacobite—a termagant in the boot—for me to look that way was utter madness.

By throwing such reflections on the flame of my desire, I succeeded in most of my心burning, and appeared at the dinner-table in so sulky a humour as could well be imagined.

CHAPTER XII.

Drunk?—and speak parrot!—and squabble—swaggers!—
Swear!—and discourse familiar with one's own widow?

THALILO.

I have already told you, my dear Tresham, what probably was no news to you, that my principal fault was an unconquerable pitch of pride, which exposed me to strange mortification; and when disapproved to myself, that I loved Diana Vernon; yet no sooner did I hear Rashleigh talk of her as a prize which he might stoop to carry off, or neglect, at his pleasure, than I felt, or fancied, a girl had taken, in the innocence and openness of her heart, to form a sort of friendship with me, seemed in my eyes the most insolting coquetry.

Soft! she would secure me as a foe alter, I suppose, in case Mr. Rashleigh Osbaldestone should not take compassion upon her! but I will satisfy her that I am not a person to be trepanned in that manner—I will make her sensible that I see through her arts, and that I scorn them.

I did not reflect for a moment, that all this indignation, which I had no right whatever to entertain, proved that I was anything but indifferent to Miss Vernon's charms; and I sat down to table in high ill-humour with her and all the daughters of Fye.

Miss Vernon heard me, with surprise, return ungracious answers to one or two playful strokes of satire; and, with a freedom of speech; but, having no suspicion that offence was meant, she only replied to my rude repartees with jests somewhat similar, but polished by her good temper, though pointed by her wit. At length she perceived I was really out of humour, and answered one of my rude speeches thus:

"They say, Mr. Frank, that one may gather sense from fools—I heard cousin Wilfred refuse to play any longer at cudgel the other day, cousin Thorrie, because cousin Thorrie got angry, and struck harder than the miles of amicable combat, it seems, permitted. We'll break your head in good earnest," quoth honest Wilfred, 'I tell you not; for I should do it so much more easily—but it's hard I should get raps on the codhead, and only pay you back in make-believes.'—Do you understand the spirit of this reply?

'I have never felt myself under the necessity, madam, of studying how to extract the slender portion of sense, with which this family season their coarse and wanton discourse.

'Necessity! and madam!—You surprise me, Mr. Osbaldestone.'

"any unfortunate in doing so." "And I suppose that the capricious tone is serious; or is it only assumed, to make your good-humour more valuable?" I ask.

"You have a right to the attention of any gentleman in this family, Miss Vernon, that it cannot be worth your while to inquire into the cause of my stupidity and bad spirits.

"What! And I am to understand, then, that you have deserted my faction, and gone over to the enemy?"

Then, looking across the table, and observing that Rashleigh, who was seated opposite, was watching us with a singular expression of interest on his harsh features, she continued,

"Horrible thought!—Ah, now I see 'tis true.
For in the manner Rashleigh smiles on me,
And points at these for his:

Well, thank Heaven, and the unprotected state which has taught me endurance, I do not take offence easily; and that I may not be forced to quarrel, whether I like it or no, I have the honour, earlier than usual, to wish you a happy digestion of your dinner and your bad humour.

Upon Miss Vernon's departure, I found myself very little satisfied with my own conduct. I had hurled back offered kindness, of which circumstances had but lately pointed to my uncle's side, and but just stopped short of insulting the beautiful, and as she had said with some emphasis, the unprotected being by whom it was professed. My conduct seemed brutal in its extreme. To collect myself from these painful reflections, I applied myself more frequently to usual with the wine which circulated on the table.

The agitated state of my feelings combined with my habits of temperance to give rapid effect to the beverage. Habitual tipers, I believe, acquire the power of soaking themselves with a quantity of liquor that does not affect them, and which, in their sober state, are none of the clearest; but men who are strangers to the voice of drunkenness as a habit, are more powerfully acted upon by such a fluid. It was not, however, that I became extravagant; I talked a great deal, argued upon what I knew nothing of, told stories of which I forgot the point, then laughed immoderately at my own forgetfulness; I accepted several letters without having the least judgment; I challenged the giant John to wrestle with me, although he had kept the ring at Hoxham for a year, and I never tried so much as a single fall.

My uncle had the goodness to interpose and prevent this consumption of drunken folly, which, I suppose, would have otherwise ended in my neck being broken.

It has even been reported by malingers, that I sung a song while under this vinous influence; but, as I remember nothing of it, and never attempted to turn it into a tune in all the printed languages, I suppose there is no actual foundation for the calumny.

I was absurd enough without this exaggeration. Without positively losing my senses, I speedily lost all command of my temper, and my impetuous passions whirled me onward at their pleasure. I had sat down sulky and discontented, and disposed to be silent—the wine rendered me loquacious, disputatious, and quarrelsome. I contradicted whatever was asserted, and attacked, with not the least respect to my uncle's table, both his politics and his religion. The affected moderation of Rashleigh, which he well knew how to qualify with irritating ingredients, was even more provoking to me, and the language of his obstreperous brothers. My uncle, to do him justice, endeavoured to bring us to order; but his authority was lost amidst the tumult of wine and passion. At length, frantic at some real, or supposed injurious insinuation, I actually struck Rashleigh with my fist. No Stoic philosopher, superior to his own passion and that of others, could have received as a result with a calmer degree of persuading myself that it apparently worth while to resent, Thorneloff resented for him. Swords were drawn, and we exchanged one or two passes, when the other brothers succeeded in a way which I never forget the diabolical sneer which wrinkled Rashleigh's wayward features, as I was forced from the apartment by the main strength of two of them.
ROB ROY

Outhful Titans. They secured me in my apartment by locking the door, and I heard them, to my inexorable rage, laugh heartily as they descended the staircase. I was not quite thus fate, but the window-panes, and the strength of a door clenched with iron, resisted my efforts. At length I threw myself on my bed, and fell asleep amidst vows of living or dying on the scaffold. In the vision of the execution.

But with the morning cool repentance came. I felt, in the keenest manner, the violence and absurdity of my conduct, and was obliged to confess that whole and purer, which had lowered my self-esteem below those of Wilfred Osbaldstone, whom I held in so much contempt. My uncomfortable reflections were by no means soothed by meditating the necessity of an austerely reprehensible behavior on my part, in collating that Miss Vernon must be a witness of my submission. The imporpiety and unkindness of my conduct to her personally, added not a little to these galling considerations, and for this I could not even plead the miserable excuse of intoxication.

Under all these aggravating feelings of shame and degradation, I descended to the breakfast-hall, like a criminal to receive sentence. I had been found guilty of an impossible feat; to take out the bounds, so that I had the additional mortification to meet the family, except only Rashleigh and Miss Vernon, in full array, surrounding the cold winenoom and melted ice in the great glass of the house entered, and I could easily imagine that the jests were furnished at my expense. In fact, what I was disposed to consider with serious pain, was regarded as an excellent good joke by my unclouded faculties, that part of my cousins. Sir Hilda, while he rallied me upon the exploits of the preceding evening, swore he thought a young fellow had better be thrice drunk in one day, than speak sober to bed like a present man, and leave a batch of honest fellows, and a double quart of claret. And to back this consolatory speech, he poured out a large bumper of brandy, exclaimed time to swallow "a hair of the dog that had bit me."

"Never mind these lads laughing, ne’er," he continued; "they would have been as great milk-sops as yourself, had I not nursed them, as one may say, at the toast and tankard."

Ill-nature was not the fruit of my cousins in general; they saw I was vexed and hurt at the recollection of the preceding evening, and endeavored, with clumsy kindness, to remove the painful impression they had made on me. Thorncroft alone looked sulky and unconciliatory. This young man had never liked me, and his brother marks of attention occasionally shewed by his brothers, awkward as they were, he alone had never joined. If it were true, of which, however, I began to have doubts, and my conversation, however expressive, or somewhat repressed himself, as the destined husband of Miss Vernon, a sentiment of jealousy might have sprung up in his mind from the market prediction which it was that young lady’s pleasure to show for one, whom Thorncroft might, perhaps, think likely to become a dangerous rival.

Rashleigh at last entered, his visage as dark as thunder-clouded brooding, I could not but doubt, over unjustifiable and disgraceful insult I had offered him. I had already settled in my own mind how I was to behave on the occasion, and had schooled myself to believe, that true honour consisted not in denying, but in apologizing for, an injury so much disproportioned to any provocation I might have to ilege.

I therefore hastened to meet Rashleigh, and to express myself in the highest degree sorry for the violence with which I had acted on the preceding evening.

"No circumstances," I said, "could have wrung from me a single word of apology, save my own circumstances and the place I stood under their influence, and I opened my cousin would accept of my regrets so sincerely offered, and consider how much of my misconduct was owing to the excessive hospitality of Osbaldstone Hall."

"He shall be friends with thee, lad," cried the next knight, in the full effusion of his heart; "or

"d—me, if I call him son more!"—Why, Rashlie, dost stand there like a log? Sorry for it is all a gentleman can say, if he happens to do anything awry, and especially over the head of Miss Vernon, and should know something, I think, of affairs of honour. Let me hear no more of this, and we'll go in a body and rummage out the badger in Birkenwood-haughter, the face resembled, as I have already noticed, no other countenance that I ever saw. But this singularity lay not only in the features, but in the mode of changing their expression. Other countenances, in altering from grief to joy, or from joy to satisfaction, pass through some brief intervals; ere the expression of the predominant passion succeeds entirely that of its predecessor. There is a sort of slight, like that between the clearing up of a dark and the rising of the sun, while the swollen muscles subside, the dark eye clears, the forehead relaxes and expands itself, and the whole countenance loses its stormer shades, and becomes serene and placid. Rashleigh's face exhibited none of these graduations, but changed almost instantaneously from the expression of one passion to that of the contrary.

My attention was strongly arrested by this peculiarity on the part of Miss Vernon, who, at the entrance, "black he stood as night!" With the same inflexible countenance he heard my excuse and his father's exhortation; and it was not until Sir Hildebrand had done justice, that he permitted me to enter. And at once, and he expressed, in the kindest and most civil terms, his perfect satisfaction with the very handsome apology I had offered.

"Indeed," he raised a poor a brain myself, when I impose on it the least burden beyond my usual three glasses, I that have only, like honest Cassio, a very vague recollection of the confusion of last night—remembering almost nothing of the thing distinctly—a quarrel, but nothing wherefore. So, my dear cousin," he continued, shaking me kindly by the hand, "conceive how much I am relieved, by finding that I have to receive an apology, instead of having to make one—I will not have a word said upon the subject more; I should be very foolish to institute any scrutiny into an account, when the balance, which I expected to be against me, has been so unexpectedly and agreeably struck in my favour. You see, Mr. Osbaldstone, I am practising the language of Lombard Street, and qualifying myself for my new calling.

As I was about to answer, and raised my eyes for the purpose, they encountered those of Miss Vernon, who, having entered the room unobserved during the conversation, had overheard my apology, and, confounded, fixed my eyes on the ground, and made my escape to the breakfast-table, where I huddled among my busy cousins.

My uncle, that the events of the preceding day might not pass out of our memory without a practical moral lesson, took occasion to give Rashleigh and me his serious advice to correct our milk-sop habits, as he termed them, and gradually to impress our brains to bear a gentlemanlike quantity of liquor, without wobbling or breaking of heads. He recommended that we should begin a regular course of claret per day, which, with the aid of March, beer and brandy, be a handsome competence for a beginner in the art of toping. And for our encouragement, he assured us that he had known many a man who had lived to our years without having drank a pint of wine a day. In this, with honest company, and following hearty example, had afterwards been numbered among the best good fellows of the time, and could carry off their six bottles of porter and claret a day, under their influence, and of braying or babbling, and be neither sick nor sorry the next morning.

Sege as this advice was, and comfortable as was the prospect, I set out to meet it. I profited but little by the exhortation; partly, perhaps, because, as often as I raised my eyes from the table, I observed Miss Vernon.
nation had given way to the most lively alarm, Miss Vernon threw herself between me and the door of the dark room.

"Stay!" she said, "stay; however just your resentment, you do not know half the secrets of this fearful prison-house." She then glanced her eyes and her voice for some time more, and then, in a whisper, "He bears a charmed life; you cannot assail him without endangering other lives, and wider destruction. Had it been otherwise, in some hour of justice, I would have told you from this very hour, I told you," she said, motioning me back to my seat, "that I needed no comforter—I now tell you, I need no avenger."

I regarded it mechanically, musing on what she said, and recollecting all that had escaped me in my first glow of resentment, that I had no title whatever to constitute myself Miss Vernon's champion. She paused to let her own emotions and mine subside, and then addressed me with more compassion.

"I have already said, that there is a mystery connected with Rashleigh, of a dangerous and fatal nature. Villain as he is, and as he knows he stands colored, the great chance, of which I am not, openly break with or defy him. You also, Mr. Osbaldstone, must bear with him, patience, foil his arts by opposing them prudence, not violence; and, above all things, avoid that secret weapon of late night, which cannot but give him perilous advantages over you. This caution I designed to give you, and it was the object with which I desired this interview; but you have extended my confidence further than I proposed."

I assured her it was misplaced.

"I do not believe that it is, she replied. "You have a talent for deciding matters which authorise your trust. Let us continue to be friends. You need not fear," she said, laughing, while she leaned a little, yet speaking with a free and unembarrassed voice, "you need not fear the great chance of which I am not."

We cannot choose a more appropriate name, as the poet says, for another feeling. I belong, in habits of thinking and acting, rather to your sex, with which I have always been brought up, than to my own. Besides, the fatal veil was wrenched from me in my cradle; for you may easily believe I have never thought of the detestable condition under which I may remove it. The time," she added, "for expressing my final determination is not arrived. But I would fain have the freedom of wild thoughts in the air with the other commoners of nature, as long as I can be permitted to enjoy them. And now that the passage in Danto is made so clear, pray go and see this sainted one,"—she smiled—and my head aches so much that I cannot join the party."

I left the library, but not to join the hunters. I felt that a solitary walk was necessary to compose my spirits before I went trusted man. In Rashleigh's company, whose depth of calculating villainy had been so strikingly exposed to me. In Dubourg's family, (as he was of the reformed persuasion,) I had heard many a tale of ruthless priests, who gratified, at the expense of friendship, hospitality, and the most sacred of social life, those passions, the blameless indulgence of which is denied by the rules of their order, but the gratification of which is permitted by the education of a deserted orphan of noble birth, and so intimately allied to his own family, with the pernicious purpose of ultimately seducing her, detailed as it was, I could not help gloating with exulting resentment, more atrocious to me than the worst of the tales I had heard at Bourdeaux, and I felt it would be extremely difficult for me to meet Rashleigh, and yet to suppress the abhorrence with which he impressed me. Yet this was absolutely necessary, not only on account of the mysterious charge which Diana had given me, but because I had, in quality, no tenable ground for quarrelling with him.

I therefore resolved, as far as possible, to meet Rashleigh's dissimulation with equal caution on my part. I resolved, as far as possible, to meet Rashleigh's dissimulation with equal caution on my part. I resolved to use the same amount of caution and reserve with Owen at least such a hint of his character as might spare him on his guard over my father's interests. Avarice or ambition, I thought, might have as great, or greater charms, for a mind constituted like Rashleigh's, as the most pleasing of the other passions, and his character, and his power of assuming all seeming good qualities, were likely to procure him a high degree of confidence, and it was not to be hoped, that either his seduction or his power would be lost to him.

The task was somewhat difficult, especially in my circumstances, since the caution which I threw out might beimported to jealousy of my rival, or rather my father and myself, and I thought it absolutely necessary to frame such a letter, leaving it to Owen, who, in his own line, was safe, prudent, and circumspect, to make the necessary use of his knowledge of Rashleigh's true character. Such a letter, therefore, I sealed, and dispatched to the post-house by the first opportunity.

At my meeting with Rashleigh, he, as well as I, appeared to have taken up distant ground, and to be disposed to avoid all personal collision. He was probably conscious that Miss Vernon's communications had been unfavourable to him, though he could not know that they extended to discovering his misdeeds, and that they were, at that time, reserved on both sides, and turned on subjects of little interest. Indeed, his stay at Osbaldstone Hall did not exceed a few days after this period, during which I met him, and was not at the instant of his arrival. He had studied hard, and occasionally made parade of his progress, as if to show me how light it was for him to lift the burden which I had flung down from very weariness of heart. His conduct, however, remarkable circumstances was, that, notwithstanding the injuries with which Miss Vernon charged Rashleigh, he had several private interviews together, at which he was not conspicuous to other public in did not seem more cordial than usual.

When the day of Rashleigh's departure arrived, his father bade him farewell with indifference; his brothers, with the well-concealed glue of schoolboys, who see their taskmaster depart for a reason, and feel a joy which they dare not express; and I myself with cold politeness. When he approached Miss Vernon, and went to take leave, looking back with a look of haughty disdain; but, said, as she extended his hand to him, "Farewell, Rashleigh; God reward you for the good you have done, and forgive you for your bad."

"Amen, my fair cousin," he replied, with an air of sanctity, which belonged, I thought, to the remembrance of Saint Omers; "happy is he whose good intentions have borne fruit; in deeds, whose evil thoughts have perished in the blossom." These were his parting words.

"Accomplished hypocrify!" said Miss Vernon to me, as the door closed behind him—"how nearly can we say what we most despise and hate approach in outward manner to that which we most venerate!"

I had written to my father by Rashleigh, and also a few words to Owen, before the confidence, in which I have already mentioned, and which I thought it more proper and prudent to dispatch by another conveyance. In these epistles, it would have been natural for me to express my grief, and my love, for my friend, that I was at present in a situation in which I could improve myself in no respect, unless in the mysteries of hunting and hawking; and where I was not unlikely to forget, in the company of page-grooms and horse-boys, any useful knowledge of elegant accomplishments which I had hitherto acquired. It would also have been natural that I should have expressed my disgust and horror, and likely to feel among beings, whose whole souls were centred in field-sports or more degrading pastimes— that I should have complained of the habitual infatuation of a family in which I was growing a guest, even the jurisdiction and almost revere—my uncle Sir Hildebrand received my apology for not taking the bottle. This last, indeed, was a topic on my father, himself a man of severe temperrans likely to be easily alarmed, and to have upon this spring would to a certainty have the doors of my prison-house, and would have been the means of abusing my exile, or it would have procured me a change of resitraying my rustication.
my dear Tresham, that, considering how pleasant a prolonged residence at Osbaldistil must have been to a young man of my age, with its habits, it might have seemed very na-se to my father, in order to obtain his consent in the uncle's mansion. Nothing, as to fact me, or the large share which she occupied in ug, we dwelt together, we lived together, gather, and sate together. The studies which broken off upon her quarrelling with Rashleigh, resumed under the auspices of a tutor, whose th, I was by no means qualified to assist her prosecution of several profound studies which d commenced with Rashleigh, and which ap-to be fitted for a churchman or any al female. Neither can I conceive with what ought to have engaged Dinna in the gloomy

f casuistry which schoolmen called philosophy, and in her conceit, she was as ignorant of matics and astronomy; unless it were down and confounded in her mind the difand distinction between the sexes, and ha-hat at his own time invest which is wrong pirit, though in the latter case the evil purpose ere obvious, that the lessons of Christian encouraged Miss Vernon in setting at nought spising the forms and ceremonial limits which now round females in modern society. It is was repeated from all female company, and example or precept; yet such was her modesty, and accurate sense of what was adient. And in the conduct of many of his brethren, the bold uncompromising manner which me with so much surprise on our first ac-had not been led to conceive, that a up of ceremony indicated at once superiority prising and the confidence of conversaand modern literature.

ere were not that strong talents will often when they seem to have least assistance.
Such was the footing upon which I stood with the family at Osbaldestone Hall; but I ought to mention another of its inmates with whom I occasionally held some of a more intimate kind. It was the gardener, who (since he had discovered that I was a Protestant) rarely suffered me to pass him without proffering his Scotch mul for a social pinch. There were some awkward advantages attending this courtesy. In the first place, it was made at no expense, for I never took snuff; and, secondly, it afforded an excellent apology to Andrew (who was not particularly fond of hard work at the time, perhaps) for being there for several minutes. But, above all, these brief interviews gave Andrew an opportunity of venting the news he had collected, or the satirical remarks which his shrewd moral humour suggested.

"I am saying, sir," he said to me one evening, with a face obviously charged with intelligence, "I have been down at the Trinley-knowe."

"Ah, Andrew," I suppose you heard some news at the alehouse?"

"Na, sir; I never gang to the yillhouse—that is, unless any neighbour was to gie me a pint, or the like o' that; but to own I lose the gratifying company, is it no? I've been o' times and hard-won aifter. But I was down at the Trinley-knowe, as I was saying, about a woe bit business o' my ain wi' Mattie Simpson, that's the widow o' the man that was a foolish fellow, that will never be missed in the Ha'house. And when we were at the strangest o' our bargain, wha said come in but Pat Macready the travelling merchant?"

"I suppose you do, Andrew?"

"E'en I've the honour to see him; but it's a creditable calling and a gainful, and has been long in use wi' our folk. Pat's a far-a-ways cousin o' mine, and we were blythe to meet wi' him anither."

"And you went and had a jil o' ale together, I suppose, Andrew?—For Heaven's sake, cut short your story."

"But a wee—bide a wee, you southrons are in a bit of a hurry, and this is something concerns yoursell, an ye wad tak patience to hear—t'll ye?—del a dram o' yill did Pat offer me; but Mattie gie us baith a drup smoked kilmel, and an o' her thick 'at jam-rocks, that was as wat and raw as a divot. O, for the bonnie girdle cakes o' the North!—and sae we eat down and took out our clavers."

"I wish you would take them out just now. Pray, tell me if you have got any worth telling, for I can't stop here all night.""

"Than, if ye maun ha'e, the folk in Lunnon are a clean wul about this bit job in the north here."

"Ou, just real daft—neither to haud nor to bind—'

"Hirdy-giddy—clean through ither—the dell's over Jock's door."

"But what does this all mean? or what business have I with the devil or Jack Webster?"

"Umph!" said Andrew, looking extremely knowing, "it's just because—that the dirdum's a' about you man's poknansy!"

"Whose portmante? I or what do you mean?"

"Ou, just the man Morris's, that he said he lost yonder; but if it's no your honour's affair, as little is it mine; and I maunna lose this gracious evening, resting my mind."

And, as suddenly seized with a violent fit of industry, Andrew began to labour most diligently. My attention, as the crafty knave had foreseen, was now arrested and unwilling, at the same time, to acknowledge any particular interest in that affair, by asking direct questions, I stood waiting till the spirit of voluntary communication should again prompt him to resume his story. Andrew dug on manfully, and spoke at intervals, but nothing to the purpose of Mr. Macready's news; and, I stood and listened, cursing him in my heart, and desirous, at the same time, of making his delight, as a contradiction would prevail over his desire of speaking upon the subject, which was obviously uppermost in his mind.

"Ach trenching up the sparry-grass, and an gann to saw sium Missiean beans; they winna want them to their swine's swine, I see warrant—muckle gude may I dc them. And sicklie-looking as the grieve has me; it should be wheat-straw, or sitten at the vast o' it, and it's peace-dirt, as fZXzenless as chuckies-stone. But the buntman guides a' as he likes about the thistle.-yard. But, however, we maunna lose a turn this Saturday at e'en, for the wather's air braw, and if there's a fair day in seven, Sunday's sav is come and gone. ""

"Ou, Pat Macready does say, that it may settle, if it be Heaven's will, till Monday morning, and what's the use o' my breaking my ycle at this rate—I think, I'll e'en a' wame, for ye just the current news, ye'll be for several hours.

Accordingly, applying both his hands to his sides, he pitched it upright in the trench which he had been digging, and, looking at me with the air of superiority of one who knows himself possessed of important information, which he may count as a great source of his pleasure, pulled down the sleeves of his shirt, and walked slowly towards his coat, which lay casually folded up under the same guarding board.

I must pay the penalty of having interrupted this tiresome rashal, thought I to myself, and even more Mr. Fair service by taking his communication as my guide, and he was not wrong, for I addressed myself to him.

"Oh, after all, Andrew, what are the Lech news you had from your kinsman, the traveling merchant?"

"The Lech, your honour means? retard to draw—'but ca' him ye what ye will, they're a great convenient in a country-side that's scant o' honest towns, like this Northumberland—that's no where, but in New, in Lunnon. There's the kingdom o' Fife, Colross to the East Nuit, it's just a nice hand of the city—Sae mony royal bowral seok on eng end, like ropes of ingans, with theic-strees at their booths, not bad, and their krennes and sae lair o' stone and lime and forestrees—Kirkhail, loch o't, is lairer than any town in England."

"I dare say it is all very splendid and very far, but you were talking of the London news a bit while ago.

"Ay," replied Andrew, "but I dinna think your honour cared to hear about them—however, continued, grinnig a ghastly smile, "Pat Macready does say, that they are marrist and in their parliament-House about this robbery o' Mr. Morris, or whatever they ca' the chiel."

"In the House of Parliament, Andrew! How can they do that there? They are not at present in London, are they?""

"Ou, that's just what I said to Pat; if it like honour, I'll tell you the very words; it's no ma making a lie for the matter—"Pate, said I, afore hand, that I would haud and lairds as well wi' the earle and his walters—When we had a Scotland Parliament, Pate, says I, and dail rax their tafts that rest us o'it! they sat dounly doun made laudin in a ball country seck, and sae flab they sae flabbed their beards about things that were coorse to the judge ordinar o' the bounds; but I think, I, that if a sae kail wife ye'd aff her neighbour's wife, they wad ha' the twa-women o' them in the parliament-House o' Lunnon. It's just, said I, and as silly as our auld daft laird here and his corns, wi' his huntsmen and his hounds, and baring cattle and horns, riding haud days, and the beast that winna weigh sax pund when they caught it.""

"You argued most admirably, Andrew," said willing to encourage him to go into the manner his intelligence; "and what said Pate?"

"Ou," he said, "what better could be expected from a weck poach-pudding English folk—But us twa, robbery, it's like that when they're at the time o' their Whig and Tory wark, and caing sax and eighteen blackguard—up gets me lang-tongued chiel, and he says, that o' the English rank too much, other honour of yer, and me may be, and that they had levied nae master and a king's messenger had been stopp'd and on the highway, and that the best blood o' Northumberland, and the auld daft laird's doing the same, the men o'shire will not aff him, and many valuable possess, there was nae redress to be gotten by people, for the first justice o' the peace that took.
and if he had gien them leg-bail, he was likely to have 'tain the air on the pillory for leaning-making.'

So speaking, honest Andrew collected his dibles, spades, and spade-axe, and, walking at his own pace, leisurely, however, and allowing me full time to put any further questions which might occur to me before he trundled them off to the toll-house, there where the fat taxes and other duties were in such a row,—leisurely, however, and allowing me full time to put any further questions which might occur to me before he trundled them off to the toll-house, there where the fat taxes and other duties were in such a row, he said, I wish to see your cousin the merchant, to ask him the particulars of what he heard in London, if it could be done without much trouble.

"Naething mair easy," Andrew observed; "he had but to hint to him that I wanted a pair or twa o' hose, and he wad be wi' me as fast as he could lay leg to the grund.

"O yes, assure him I shall be a customer; and as the night is, as you say, settled and fair, I shall walk in the garden until he comes; the moon will soon rise over the fells. You may bring him to the little back-gate; and then I'll have pleasure, in the mean-while, in looking on the bushes and evergreens by the bright frosty moon-light.

"Yarn right—vara right—that's what I hae aften said; a kiel-blaid, or a collarhin, glances see glesky by moonlight."

So saying, off went Andrew Fairservice with great glee. He had to walk about two miles, a labour he undertook with the greatest pleasure, in order to secure to his kinsman the sale of so much stuff as could be traded, though it is probable he would not have given him sixpence to treat him to a quart of ale.

The good-will of an Englishman would have displayed itself in a much truer light in the case I have thought, as I paced along the smooth cut velvet walks, which, embowered with high hedges of yew and of holly, intersected the ancient garden of Osbal- distone Hall.

As I turned to retrace my steps, it was natural that I should lift up my eyes to the windows of the old library, which, small in size, but several in number, stretched along the second story of that side of the house which now faced me. Light glanced from their casements. I was not surprised at this, for I knew Miss Vernon often sat there of an evening, though I could not see her room motives. I put a little motion of the head on my own, and never sought to join her at a time when I knew, all the rest of the family being engaged for the evening, our interviews must necessarily have been strictly private.

In the mornings we usually read together in the same room; but then it had happened that one or other of our cousins entered to seek some parchement duodecimo that could be converted into a fishing-book, despite its gildings and illumination, or to tell us of some "sport toward," or frits mere want of knowing where else to dispose of themselves. In short, in the mornings the library was a sort of public room, where man and woman might meet as in the second story of that side of the house which now faced me.

Miss Vernon first laughed, then blushed, and was disposed to be displeased; and then, suddenly checking herself, said, "I believe you are very right; and when, when I feel inclined to be a very busy one, will I abbreviate old Martha with a cup of tea to sit by me and be your screen.

Martha, the old housekeeper, partook of the taste of the family. Half a del, as many as three or four have pleased her better than all the tea in China. However, at the use of this beverage was then comm show to Diana my version of the first books of Aristo, I had requested her to invite Martha to a tea-party in the library that evening; to which arrangement Miss Vernon had refused her consent, alleging some apology which I thought frivolous at the time.

I had missed the opportunity of inviting her when the back garden-door opened, and the figure of Andrew and his countryman, bending under his pack, crossed the moonlight alley, and called my attention elsewhere.

I found Mr. Macready, as I expected, a touch, sagacious, long-haired Scotchman, and a collector of news both from choice and profession. He was able to give me a succinct account of the House of Commons and House of Lords on the affair of Morris, which, it appears, had been made by both parties a touchstone to ascertain the temper of the Parliament. It appeared also, that, as I had learned from Andrew by second-hand, the ministry had proved too weak to support a story, involving the character of men of rank and importance, and resting upon the credit of a person of such indiscrimate fame as Morris who was, moreover, confirmed and contradictory in his mode of telling the story. Macready was even able to supply me with a copy of a printed journal, or News Letter, seldom extending beyond the name of the writer, in which Andrew's paper and debate was mentioned; and with a copy of the Duke of Argylo's speech, printed upon a broadside, of which he had purchased several from the hawkers, because, he said, it would be interesting to any who were interested in the Tweed. The first was a meagre statement, full of blanks and asterisks, and which added little or nothing to the information I had from the Scotchman; and the duke's speech, though spirited and eloquent, contained chiefly a panegyric on his country, his family, and his clan, with a few compliments, equally sincere, perhaps, though less glowing, which were addressed to himself. I could not learn whether my own reputation had been directly implicated, although I perceived that the honour of my uncle's family had been impugned, and that the person Campbell, named Morris to have been the most active robber of the two by whom he was assaulted, was said by him to have appeared in the behalf of a Mr. Osbaldstone and by the connivance of the justices, procured his liberation. In this particular, Morris's story jumped with my own suspicions, which had attached to Campbell from the moment I saw him appear at Justice Inglis's bench, and the Scotchman's story with this extraordinary story, I dismissed the two Scotchmen, after making some purchases from Macready, and a small compliment to Fairxious, and put up in my own apartment to consider what I ought to do in defence of my character thus publicly attacked.

CHAPTER XV.

Whence, and what art thou?—Milton.

After exhausting a sleepless night in meditation on the intelligence I had received, I was at first inclined to think that I ought, as speedily as possible, to return to London, and by my open appearance repel the calumny which had been spread against me. But I hesitated to take this course on recollection of the kind reciprocity of my father's and my own relations as well as to all that concerned his family. He was most able, certainly, from experience, to direct what I ought to do, and from his acquaintance with the most distinguished men in power, his influence, and his great achievements, must have been of the highest value to me. But I resolved at least to take up my abode in the house in the wind and weather, and for the sake of my good name, I would give her more pleasure than if Ariosto himself were to awake from the dead.

This reflection came the more powerfully across my mind, because, having mustered up courage to debrand of his safe arrival in London, and of the kind reception he had met with from his uncle. Admitting that I might have been to blame, I did not deserve, in my own opinion at least, to be so totally forgotten by my father, and if I continued to suppose the letter to have the effect of bringing a letter from him to hand more early than it would otherwise have reached me. But before concluding my letter concerning the affair of Turks, I must express my earnest hopes and wish, that my father would honour me with a few lines, were it but to express his advice and commands in an affair of some difficulty, and where my knowledge and experience are so limited and inadequate to my own guidance. I found it impossible to prevail on myself to urge my actual return to London as a place of residence, and I disregarded my unwillingness to leave the house of my infancy, and the strong desire my father will, which, as I imposed it on myself as a sufficient reason for not urging my final departure from Osbaldestone Hall, would, I doubted not, be received as such by my parent. But I begged permission to come to London, for a short time at least, to meet and refute the infamous calumnies which had been circulated, concerning me, in so public a manner. Having made the application, and declared my earnest desire to vindicate my character was strongly blends with reluctance to quit my present place of residence, I rode over to the post town, and deposited my letter in the office. I was thus enabled to return to Osbaldestone Hall, somewhat earlier than I should otherwise have done, of the following letter from my friend Mr. Owen.

DEAR MR. FRANCIS,

"I am under the honour of Mr. R. Osbaldestone, and note the contents. Shall I do Mr. R. O. such civilities as are in my power, and have taken to see the Bank and Custom-house. He seems a sober, good-natured gentleman, and takes to business, and will be of service to the firm. I had wished another person had turned his mind that way; but God's will be done. As much as may be scarce in those parts, will return your enclosing their goldsmith's bill at six days' sight, on M'si Hooper and Girder of Newcastle, for 100l., which I doubt not will be duly honoured.—I remain, as in dirty, yours; or Mr. Frank, your very respectful and obedient servant,

JOSEPH OWEN.

Postscript.—Hope you will advise the above coming safe to hand. I am sorry we have so few of yours. Your father says he is as usual, but looks poorly."

From this epistle, written in old Owen's formal style, I was rather surprised to observe that he made no mention of the circumstance which I had written to him, with a view to possess him of Rashketh's real character, although from the course of the letter, it seemed certain that he ought to have received it, and that he was so well informed about his stepson, as had no reason to suspect that it could miscarriage upon the road. As it comprised matters of great importance, both to my father and to myself, I sat down in the post-office, and again wrote to Owen, recapitulating the heads of my former letter, and requesting to know, in course of post, if it had reached him in safety. I also acknowledged the receipt of the latter, and promised to make use of the contents, if I should have any occasion for money. I thought, indeed, it was odd that my father should leave the care of supplying my necessities to his clerk; but I concluded it was a matter arranged between them. At any rate, Owen was a bachelor, rich in his way, and passionately attached to me, so that I had no hesitation in being obliged to him for a small sum, which I resolved to consider as a loan, to be returned with my earliest ability, in case it was not previously repaid by my father; and I expressed myself to this purpose to Mr. Owen. A shop-keeper in a little town, to which my father had lately given me in gold the amount of my bill on Messrs. Hooper and Girder, so that I returned to Osbaldestone Hall a good deal richer than I had set forth. This recruit to my travelling expenses had left unexhausted at my arrival the imperceptibly diminishing. This source of anxiety was for the present removed. On my arrival at the Hall, I found that Sir Hildebrand and all his officers, having heard of my arrival, and the little family meeting, to which Trinley-Knowles, "to see," as Andrew Fea'servicr expressed it, "a whom midden cockes ptinke ilt theares harns out."

"It is indeed a brutal amusement, Andrew; I suppose you have none such in Scotland?"

"No, na," answered Andrew boldly; and then shaded away his negative with, "unless it be on Easter-eve, or the like of the kind."—The little family mused a little, as to what the folk do to the midden poorty, for they hand sicken a skarling and scrapping in the yard, that there's nae getting a bean or pea kepet for them.

"But I am not understanding what it is that leaves that turret-door open; now that Mr. Rashleigh's away canna be him, I trow."

The turret-door, to which he alluded, opened to the garden at the bottom of a winding-stair, leading down from Mr. Rashleigh's apartments. This, as I have already mentioned, was situated in a sequestered part of the house, communicating with the library by a vaulted passage with the rest of the house. A long narrow turf-walk led, between two high holly hedges, from the turret-door to a little postern in the wall of the garden, where was the great door of Osbaldestone Hall. Rashleigh, whose movements were very independent of those of the rest of his family, could leave the Hall or return to it at pleasure, without his absence or presence attracting any particular observation from the servants. He was above the stair and the turret-door were entirely disused, and this made Andrew's observation somewhat remarkable.

"Have you often observed that door open?" was my question.

"No just that often neither; but I have noticed it once or twice. I thinking it may have been the priest, Father Vaughan, when he was here catching one of the servants gangning up that stair, for frightened heathens that they are, for fear of bogles and brownies and long-nobit things true the neist world. But Father Vaughan thinks himself a privi-
ileged person—set him up and lay him down!—I've be caution the worst stibber that ever stickit a sermon out over the Tweed-yonder, wad lay a ghast twice as fast as him, wi' his holy water and his idolarous trinkets. I dinna believe he speaks gude Latin neither; at least he dinna take me up when I tell him the learned names of the plants."

Since I had considered his time and his leisure, and his close personal life, and his hesitation in coming to Osbaldestone Hall, and about half-a-dozen mansions of Catholic gentlemen in the neighbourhood, I have as yet said nothing, for I had not seen but little of him, and had lived at a distance from his family, as I was given to understand, in the north; of a striking and imposing presence, grave in his exterior; and much respected among the Catholics of Nortumberland, a worthy and upright man.
Chapter XVI

It happened one day about noon, going to my boat, I was exceedingly surprised with the print of a naked foot on the sand, which was very plain to be seen on the sand.

With the blended feelings of interest and jealousy which Miss Vernon's singular situation, my observations of her looks and actions became acutely sharpened, and that to a degree, which, not some months would have enabled me to escape her penetration. The sense that she was observed, or, more properly speaking, that she was watched by my looks, seemed to give Diana a mixture of fear and conscious truth. At times it seemed that she sought an opportunity of recoiling a conduct which she could not but feel as offensive, considering the frankness with which she had mentioned the difficulties that surrounded her. At other times she seemed prepared to expostulate upon the subject. But either her courage failed, or some other sentiment impeded her seeking an explanation.

It was in a singular relation to each other, spending, and by mutual choice, much of our time in close society with each other, yet disagreeing our mutual sentiments, and jealous of, or offended by, each other's actions. There was b erect empirical without confidence; on one side love without hope or purpose, and curiosity without any rational or justifiable motive; and on the other embarrassment and doubt, occasionally mingled with displeasure. Yet I believe that the agitation of the passions, such is the nature of the human heart, that came most nearly to resemble interesting and interesting, though petty circumstances, to render Miss Vernon and me the constant objects of each other's thoughts, tended, upon the whole, to increase the saving love. I was disposed to regard her with some interest, and disinterested, occasionally mingled with pleasure. the verses from her unrelenting pen—" and I have only written, but up as I am in this retired position, I have felt sometimes I could not amuse better if by carrying on, merely for my own amusement, you will of course understand, the version of a battle that was one of the most prominent events of my life when I was on the banks of the Garonne.

"I question whether it only be," said Diana, gravely, other you could not spend your time to better purpose than in again, but it must be for the last time."

My eyes followed the direction of hers as she spoke, and I thought she was tossing the tapestry that covered the door of the secret passage from Rashleigh’s room to the library. I conceived we were observed, and turned an inquiring glance on Miss Vernon.

“Dead for a ducat,” would have been my reply, had I dared to give way to the feelings which rose indignant at the idea of being subjected to an extra enumerator. Prudence and the necessity of suppressing my passion, and obeying Diana’s reiterated command of “Leave me! leave me!” came in place of any rash action. I left the apartment in a wave of giddiness and cloudiness of mind which I vain attempted to compose when I returned to my own.

A chaos of thoughts intruded themselves on me at once, passing haphazard through my brain, intercepting and overshadowing each other, and resembling those fogs which in mountainous countries are wont to descend in obscure volumes, and dissolve or obliterate the usual impressions of the mind. The traveller steers his course through the wilds. The dark and undefined idea of danger arising to my father from the machinations of such a man as Rashleigh Osbaldestone, half-declaration of his desire to recover Miss Vernon’s acceptance,—the acknowledged distress of her situation, bound by a previous contract to confine herself to a cloister, or to be in some disgrace, all pressed themselves at once upon collection, while my judgment was unable deliberately to consider any of them in their just light and being accounted for all the rest, I was perplexed by the manner in which Miss Vernon had received my tender of affection, and by her manner, which, fluctuating betwixt sympathy and firmness, seemed to me the interest to possess her bosom, but not of force sufficient to counterbalance the obstacles to her avowing a mutual affection. The glance of fear, rather than surprise, with which she had watched the motion of the tapestry over the concealed door, implied an apprehension of danger which I could not but suppose well-grounded; for Diana Vernon was little subject to the nervous emotions of her sex, and totally unapt to fear without actual and rational cause. I had, however, a sort of vague uneasy feeling, and was always ascribing Miss Vernon's conduct to the influence of some one individual agent, although, for ought I knew about the matter, her advisers might be as anachronous as Lomlton. I remarked this over and over to myself, but I found that my mind still settled back in my original conviction, that one single individual, of the masculine sex, and in all probability young and ignorant, was responsible for those mysteries be with which she was surrounded as with an enchanter's spell, and which seemed continually to exert an active influence over her thoughts and actions, though their agents were never visible. On this subject of doubt my mind finally rested, as if to shake itself free from investigating the propriety or prudence of my own conduct, by transferring it to that of Miss Vernon. I will be resolved, I concluded, ere I leave Osbaldeston Hall, concerning the light in which I must in future regard this fascinating being, over whose life frankness has given to them their reigning in the former inspiring her words and sentiments, the latter spreading in misty influence over all her actions. Joined to the obvious interests which arose from curiosity were those which excited me in the expectation of pleasing her, of involving her, of enjoying her, of exciting her. I was feeling a strong, though unavowed and undefined, infusion of jealousy. This sentiment, which springs up with love as naturally as the tares with the wheat, was combined with the degree of influence which Diana had appeared to concede to those unseen beings by whom her actions were directed. The more I reflected upon her character, the more I was internally though unwisely of influence which Diana had appeared to concede to those unseen beings by whom her actions were directed. The more I reflected upon her character, the more I was internally though unwisely admiring her. The more I reflected upon her conduct, the more I was impressed with the probability of consequences of my enterprise. The fresh and balmy air of the garden, impregnated with fragrance, produced its usual sedative effects on my over-heated brain, for I felt that the turmoil of my mind began proportionally to abate, and I was led to question the right I had to interfere with Miss Vernon's secrets, or with those of my uncle's family. What was it to me whom my uncle might choose to conceal in his house where I was myself a guest only by tolerance? And what title had I to pry into the affairs of Miss Vernon, fraught, as I saw, with agony, into which she had not voluntarily penetrated? Passion and self-will were ready with their answers to these questions. In detecting this secret, I was in all probability about to do service to Sir Hildebrand Vernon; I was probably impugned with the inquisitive spirit which carried on in his family; and a still more important service to Miss Vernon, whose frank simplicity of character exposed her to so many risks of apprehensions. At the same time I could not help regarding this correspondence as a person of doubtful or dangerous character. If I seemed to intrude myself on her confidence, it was not with the generous and disinterested (yes, even ventures to call it the disinterested) aversion of minding, defending, and protecting her against craft, against machinations, above all, against the secret counsellor whom she had chosen for her confidant. Such were the arguments which my last resolution led me to my conscience as coin which ought to be current; and which conscience, like a grumbling shopkeeper, was contrived to accept, rather than come to an open breach with my uncle, though more than doubting that the tender was spurious.

While I paced the green alleys, debating these things, I suddenly lighted upon Andrew Fair service, perched up like a statue by a range of bees, in an attitude of devotion contemplation; one eye, however watching the motions of the little inanimate citizens, who were settling in their strait-mouthed manes for the evening's meal, or eating on a book of devotion which much attention had deprived of its corners, and worn into an oval shape; a circumstance, which, with the close print and dingy colour of the volume in question, gave it an air of most remote and incomprehensible antiquity.

CHAPTER XVII.

I have already told you, Truch, if you deign to bear it in remembrance, that my evening visits to the library had seldom been made except by appointment, and under the sanction of old Dame Martha's presence. This, however, was entirely a tacit conventional arrangement of my own instituting. Of late, as the embarrassments of our relative situation had increased, Miss Vernon and I had never met in the evening at all. She had therefore no reason to suppose that I was likely to seek a renewal of these interviews, and especially without some previous notice or appointment betwixt us, that Martha might, as at other times, be upon duty; on the other hand, this cautionary provision was a matter of understanding, not of express enactment. The library was open to me, as to the other members of the family, at all hours of the day and night, and I could not be accused of intrusion, however suddenly and unexpectedly I might make my appearance in it. My belief, was strong, that in this apartment Miss Vernon occasionally received Vaughan, or some other person, by whom circumstances were casu istly arranged, with a view to her conduct, and that at the times when she could do so with least chance of interruption. The lights which gleamed in the library at unusual hours,—the creaking of some bowstring which I had heard in the postern-door in the morning dew from the turreted-door to the postern-gate in the garden,—sounds and sights which some of the servants, and Andrew Fair service in particular, had observed and been accounted for, all the rest, I was convinced by the manner in which Miss Vernon had received my tender of affection, and by her manner, which, fluctuating betwixt sympathy and firmness, seemed to me the interest to possess her bosom, but not of force sufficient to counterbalance the obstacles to her avowing a mutual affection. The glance of fear, rather than surprise, with which she had watched the motion of the tapestry over the concealed door, implied an apprehension of danger which I could not but suppose well-grounded; for Diana Vernon was little subject to the nervous emotions of her sex, and totally unapt to fear without actual and rational cause. I had, however, a sort of vague uneasy feeling, and was always ascribing Miss Vernon's conduct to the influence of some one individual agent, although, for ought I knew about the matter, her advisers might be as anachronous as Lomlton. I remarked this over and over to myself, but I found that my mind still settled back in my original conviction, that one single individual, of the masculine sex, and in all probability young and ignorant, was responsible for those mysteries be with which she was surrounded as with an enchanter's spell, and which seemed continually to exert an active influence over her thoughts and actions, though their agents were never visible. On this subject of doubt my mind finally rested, as if to shake itself free from investigating the propriety or prudence of my own conduct, by transferring it to that of Miss Vernon. I will be resolved, I concluded, ere I leave Osbaldeston Hall, concerning the light in which I must in future regard this fascinating being, over whose life frankness has given to them their reigning in the former inspiring her words and sentiments, the latter spreading in misty influence over all her actions. Joined to the obvious interests which arose from curiosity were those which excited me in the expectation of pleasing her, of involving her, of enjoying her, of exciting her. I was feeling a strong, though unavowed and undefined, infusion of jealousy. This sentiment, which springs up with love as naturally as the tares with the wheat, was combined with the degree of influence which Diana had appeared to concede to those unseen beings by whom her actions were directed. The more I reflected upon her character, the more I was internally though unwisely admiring her. The more I reflected upon her conduct, the more I was impressed with the probability of consequences of my enterprise. The fresh and balmy air of the garden, impregnated with fragrance, produced its usual sedative effects on my over-heated brain, for I felt that the turmoil of my mind began proportionally to abate, and I was led to question the right I had to interfere with Miss Vernon's secrets, or with those of my uncle's family. What was it to me whom my uncle might choose to conceal in his house where I was myself a guest only by tolerance? And what title had I to pry into the affairs of Miss Vernon, fraught, as I saw, with agony, into which she had not voluntarily penetrated? Passion and self-will were ready with their answers to these questions. In detecting this secret, I was in all probability about to do service to Sir Hildebrand Vernon; I was probably impugned with the inquisitive spirit which carried on in his family; and a still more important service to Miss Vernon, whose frank simplicity of character exposed her to so many risks of apprehensions. At the same time I could not help regarding this correspondence as a person of doubtful or dangerous character. If I seemed to intrude myself on her confidence, it was not with the generous and disinterested (yes, even ventures to call it the disinterested) aversion of minding, defending, and protecting her against craft, against machinations, above all, against the secret counsellor whom she had chosen for her confidant. Such were the arguments which my last resolution led me to my conscience as coin which ought to be current; and which conscience, like a grumbling shopkeeper, was contrived to accept, rather than come to an open breach with my uncle, though more than doubting that the tender was spurious. While I paced the green alleys, debating these things, I suddenly lighted upon Andrew Fair service, perched up like a statue by a range of bees, in an attitude of devotion contemplation; one eye, however watching the motions of the little inanimate citizens, who were settling in their strait-mouthed manes for the evening's meal, or eating on a book of devotion which much attention had deprived of its corners, and worn into an oval shape; a circumstance, which, with the close print and dingy colour of the volume in question, gave it an air of most remote and incomprehensible antiquity. "I was even taking a spell o' worthy Miss John Quackleben's Flower of a Sweet Saviour saw on his fiddled out of this World," said Andrew, closing his book at my appearance, and putting his horn spectacles, by way of mark, at the place where he had been reading. "And the bees, I observe, were dividing your attention, Andrew, with the learned author?"

"They are a contaminous generation, replied Andrew, as he was saying; yet I suppose I can bear to see some of them. It has been my lot to live on, and yet it's a common observation that they will swarm on the Sabbath-day, and keep folk at home with the sound of their drone. What! you say as mercy." "You might have gone to the parish church, as I did, Andrew, and heard an excellent discourse." "Clauta o' cauld parrich—clauta o' cauld parrich," said Andrew, with a most supercilious ascent, gaudy aneuch for dogs' liking, the like o' a parson—Ay! I might nae doubt has heard the curate aking awa at it in his white eark yonder, and the man playing on whistles, maie like a penny reeling than a sermon—and to the boot of that, I might ha' gone to even-songs, and heard Daddie Bochrie mumbling his mass—muckle the better it might ha' been."

"Dockerty!" said I. (This was the name of an old priest, an Irishman, I think, who sometimes officiated at Oswaldstieghall.) "I thought Father Vaughan had been at the Hall. He was here yesterday." "Ay," said Andrew, "he left them yestreen, gang to Greystock, or some o' the west-country auds. There's an unco stir among them: a' e'en, they are as busy as my bees are—God saw them! But I would even—He left them here to see this is the second swarm, and whiles they will whirr off in the afternoon. The first swarm set off une in the morning. But I am thinking they are aet in their sleep for the night. See, I wot your onour good-night, and grace, and muckle o' this."

So saying, Andrew retreated; but often cast a parting glance upon the stove, as he called the bee-hives. I postponed my unfruitful and unpromising sallies for information, that Father Vaughan, namely, was not supposed to be at the Hall. If, therefo re, there appeared light in the windows of the library this evening, it either could not be his, or he was observing very secret and suspicious line of conduct. I waited with impatience the time of sunset and of twilight. I had hardly arrived, ere a gleam from the windows of the apartment must have given my uneasy mind some slight relief; I was still enduring light of the evening. I marked it first glimpse, however, as speedily as the bourned lion describes the first distant twinkle of the light—approaching the swiftest bolt of discord and propriety, which had hither to contended with my curiosity and jealousy, vanished when an opportunity of gratifying the former was presented to me. I returned to the barrier, and among the stubborn apartments with the consciousness of one who wishes to keep his purpose secret, I reached the door of the library—hesitated for a moment as my hand was upon the latch; I heard a suppressed step within, when a hand opened the door, and I found Miss Vernon alone.

Diana appeared surprised,—whether at my sudden entrance, or from some other cause, I could not guess; but there was in her appearance a degree of fluster, which I had never before remarked, and which I new could only be produced by unusual emotion. She was calmed in a moment; and such was the force of confidence, that I, who studied to surmise her, seemed myself the surprised, and was certainly the embarrassed person.

"Has any thing happened?" said Miss Vernon. "Has any one arrived at the Hall?"

"No one that I know of," I answered, in some confusion; "I only sought the Orlando." "It lies there," said Miss Vernon, pointing to the table.

In removing one or two books to get at that which I pretended to seek, I was, in truth, meditating to make a handsome retreat from an investigation to which I felt my entanglement inadequate, when I heard a muffled voice from the other side of the table. My ears caught those of Miss Vernon, who blushed deeply.

"It is one of my relics," she said, with hesitation, replying not to my words, but to my looks; "it is one of the gloves of my grandfather, the original of the superb Vandyke which you admire."

As if she thought something more than her bare assertion was necessary to prove a statement true, she opened a drawer of the large oak table, and, taking out another glove, threw it towards me. When I saw the temper naturally inscuruous stoops to equivocate or to resemble, the anxious pain with which the unowned task is laboured, often induces the hearer to doubt the authenticity of the tale. I cast a hasty glance at the one on both gloves, and then replied gravely: "The gloves resemble each other in form and embroidery; but they cannot form a pair, since they both belong to the right hand." She bit her lip with anger, and again coloured deeply.

"You do right to expose me," she replied, with bitterness; "some friends would have only judged from what I said, that I chose to give no particular explanation of a circumstance which calls for none—at least to a stranger. You have judged better, and have made me feel, not only the meanness of duplicity, but my own inadequacy to sustain the task of a disseminator. I now turn to you, and candidly, the more so, as I do not think you, as you have acutely discerned, to the one which I just now produced. It belongs to a friend yet dearer to me than the original of Vandyke's picture—a friend I can be of the comfort and guidance, whom I honour—whom I!" She paused.

I was irritated at her manner, and filled up the blank in my own way. "Whom she loves, Miss Vernon would say.""And if I do say so," she replied, haughtily, "by whom shall my affection be called to account?"

"Not by me, Miss Vernon, assuredly. I entreat you to hold me acquitted of such presumption. But," I continued, with some emphasis, for I was now piged in return. "I hope Miss Vernon will pardon a friend, from whom she seems disposed to withdraw the title, for offering it with maiden simplicity."

"Observe nothing, sir," she interrupted, with some vehemence, "except that I will neither be doubted nor questioned. There does not exist one by whom I will be either interrogated or judged; and if you sought this unusual time of presenting yourself, in order to spy upon my privacy, the friendship or interest with which you pretend to regard me, is a poor excuse for your presumptuous curiosity."

"I relieve you of my presence," said I, with pride equal to her own; for my tongue has ever been a stranger to stinging, even in cases where my feelings were most deeply interested. I have not sought your presence. I awake from a pleasant, but a most delusive dream; and—but we understand each other." I had reached the door of the apartment, when Miss Vernon, whose movements were sometimes so rapid as to seem almost instinctive, overtook me, and, catching hold of my arm, stopped me with that air of authority which she could so whimsically assume, and which, from the naive and simplicity of her manner, had an effect so peculiarly interesting.

"Stop, Mr. Frank," she said; "you are not to leave me in that way neither; I am not so amply provided with friends, that I can afford to throw away even the ungrateful and the selfish. Mark what I say, Mr. Francis Oswaldstone. You shall know nothing of this mysterious glove, and she hold its up as she spoke—nothing-no, not a single iota more than you know already; and yet I will not permit it to be a ground of strife and defiance be twixt us. My time here," she said, sinking into a tone somewhat softer, "must necessarily be very short; yours must be still shorter; We are soon to part, never to meet again; do not let us quarrel, or make any mysterious miseries the pretext for further embittering the few hours we shall ever pass together on this side."
rival; for what other construction could I put on her declared preference of her mysterious confidant? And is it this avail, Miss Vernon? Why should I leave the apartment, and breaking with her for ever, it cost her but a change of look and tone, from that of real and haughty resentment to that of kind and playful dissemblance. But, indeed, I have neither tender nor angry feeling, to lead me back to my seat, her willing subject, on her own hard terms.

"What does this avail?" said I, as I sat down. "Yet can this avail, Miss Vernon? Why should I witness embarrassments which I cannot relieve, and mysteries which I offend you even by attempting to penetrate? Inexperience, as you are in the world, your aged friend, to be aware, that a beautiful woman can have but one male friend. Even in a male friend, I will be jealous of a confidence shared with a third party unknown and concealed; but with your own, Miss Vernon—"

"You are, of course, jealous, in all the tenses and moods of that amiable passion: But, my good friend, you have all this time spoke nothing but the paltry gossip which sepulchres repeat from play-books and romances, till they give more cant a real and powerful influence over their minds. Boys and girls prize themselves into love; and when their love is like to fail, sneer at the eloquent service of the eloquent, and fail behind it. But you and I, Frank, are rational beings, and neither silly nor idle enough to talk ourselves into any other relation, than of that plain honest disinterested friendship, which I feel so far out of our reach, as if I were man, or you woman. To speak truth, she added, after a moment's hesitation, "even though I am so complainant to the decorum of my sex as to blush in a light of my own alone desiring, we cannot marry, if we would; and we ought not, if we could."

And certainly, Tresrah, she did blush more angelically as she made this cruel declaration. I was struck with the difficulty of being sure of those suspicions which had been confirmed in the course of the evening, but she proceeded with a cold firmness which approached to severity.

"By far more indubitable truth, on which I will neither hear question nor explanation. We are therefore friends, Mr. Osbaldestone—are we not? She held out her hands, and taking mine, added, "And nothing to each other now, or henceforth, except as friends."

She let go my hand. I sunk it and my head at once, falsely overestimated, as Spenser would have termed it, by the trampled kindness and firmness of her rejection. She was right, she added gently.

"There is a letter," she said, directed for you, Mr. Osbaldestone, very duly and distinctly; but which, without sustaining the caution of the person who wrote and addressed it, your hands, had it not fallen into the possession of a certain Pachet, or enchanted dwarf of mine, whom, who all distressed and embittered, of romance, I retain in my secret service."

I opened the letter and glanced over the contents—the unfolded sheet of paper dropped from my hands, with the involuntary exclamation of "Gracious Heaven! my folly and disobedience have ruined my father!"

Miss Vernon rose with looks of real and affectionate alarm—You grow pale—you are ill—shall I write to the general? I will write to your father, Mr. Osbaldestone, and a fine one. Is your father—is he no more?"

"He lives, I said, thank God! but to what distress and difficulty."

"If I should despair not. May I read this letter?" she said, taking it up. I assented, hardly knowing what I said. She read with great attention, and added, "Who is this Mr. Tresrah, who signs the letter?"

"My father's partner, (your own good father, Will,) but he is little in the habit of acting personally in the business of the house."

He was, said Miss Vernon, "of various letters sent to you previously, you have received none of them."

"And it appears," she continued, that Rashleigh, who has taken the full management of affairs during your father's absence in Holland, has some time since left London for Scotland, with effects and retinues to guard in his house, by his father to persons in that country, and that he has not since been heard of."

"It is but too true.

And here she paused," she added, looking at the letter, "a head-clerk, or some such person,—Owen—Owen—dispatched to Glasgow, to find out Rashleigh, if possible, and you are entertained to repair to the same place, and aid in his researches."

"It is even so, and I must depart instantly."

"Stay but one moment," said Miss Vernon. "It seems to me that the worst which can come of this matter will be the loss of our certain sum of money; and can that bring tears into your eyes? For shame, Mr. Osbaldestone!"

"You do me injustice, Miss Vernon," I answered, I grieve not for the loss, but for the effect which I know it will produce on the spirits and health of my father, to whom mercantile credit is as honour; and who, if declared insolvent, would sink into the grave, oppressed with a sense of grief, remorse, and despair, like that of a soldier convicted of cowardice, or a man of honour who had lost his rank and character in society. All this I might have prevented by a trifling exertion.

No, my friend, she replied, recoiled from sharing the labours of his honourable and useful profession. Good Heaven! how shall I redeem the consequences of my error!"

"By instant departure," I said, "as you are conjured to do by the friend who writes this letter."

"But if Rashleigh," said I, "has really formed this base and unscrupulous scheme of plundering his benefactor, what prospect there that I can find means of frustrating a plan so deeply laid?"

"The prospect," she replied, "indeed, may be uncertain; but, on the other hand, there is no possibility that it will be so obvious in its remaining here. Remember, had you been on the post destined for you, this disaster could not have happened, hasten to that which is now pointed out, and you may possibly be retrieved. Yet stay—do not leave this room until I return."

She left me in confusion and amazement; amid which, however, I could find a lucid interval to admire the firmness, composure, and presence of mind, which Miss Vernon seemed to possess on every crisis, however sudden.

In a few minutes she returned with a sheet of paper in her hand, folded and sealed like a letter, but without address or signature. It was her proof of my friendship, because I have the most perfect confidence in your honour. If I understand the nature of your distress rightly, the funds in Rashleigh's possession, of which I was informed the day the 12th of September, think, is named—in order that they may be applied to pay the bills in question; and, consequently, that, if adequate funds be provided before that period, your father's credit is safe from the apprehended calamity."

"Certainly—I so understand Mr. Tresrah—" I looked at your father's letter again, and added, "There cannot be a doubt of it."

"Well," said Diana, "in that case my little packet may be of use to you. You have heard of a seal contained in a letter. Take this packet; do open it, and open it with haste, or you will lose by your exertions, I trust to your honour for destroying it without opening or suffering it to be opened. But if not, you may break the seal within ten days of the dated day, and you will find directions, which may possibly be of service to you. Mr. Adity, Frank; we never meet more—but sometimes that on your friend Die Vernon."

CHAPTER XVIII.

And hurry, hurry, off they rode, Hurry, hurry, the dead can ride, Do not fear to ride with me.
traction which they afford by their contradictory operation prevents the patient from being overwhelmed under either. I was deeply grieved at my separation from my dear friend, Mr. Vere, as I should have been, had not my father apprehended distresses forced themselves on my attention; and I was distressed by the news of Mr. Trehaw, yet less so than I should have been, had I fully occupied my mind with the idea of a false lover or an unfeeling son; but man can give but a certain portion of distressful emotion to the causes which demand them, and if two operate at once, one of sympathy, and the funds of a compound ing bankrupt, can only be divided between them. Such were my reflections when I gained my apartment—it seems, from the illustration, they already blanked out the image of the cottage and the rustic scenes in my mind.

I set myself seriously to consider my father's letter. It was not very distinct, and referred for several particulars to Owen, whom I was entreated to meet with as soon as possible at a Scotch town, called Glasgow; being informed, moreover, that my old friend was to be heard at Messrs. Macvittie, Macfar, and Company, merchants in the Gallowgate of that said town. The letter appended to several letters which, as it appeared to me, must have miscarried or have been intercepted, and complained of my obstinate silence in terms which would have been highly unbecoming the said business proposes to me. I was amazed as I read. That the spirit of Rashleigh walked around me, and conjured up these doubts and difficulties by which I was surrounded, I felt highly frightful, and yet it seemed to frighten me to the conception of combined villainy and power which he must have employed in the perpetration of his designs. Let me do myself justice in this respect: I did not quarrel with my own self. I, however, distressing it might in other respects and at another time have appeared to me, sunk into a subordinate consideration when I thought of the dangers impending. I could not set a higher estimation on wealth, and had the affection of most young men of lively imagination, who suppose that they can better dispense with the possession of money, than resign their time and faculties to the labour necessary to acquire it. But in my father's case, I knew that bankruptcy would be considered as an utter and irrecoverable disgrace, to which life would afford no comfort, and death the speediest and sole relief.

My mind, therefore, was bent on averting this catastrophe, with an intensity which the interest could not have produced had it referred to my own fortune. It was a definite resolution to depart from Osbaldstone Hall the next day, and wend my way without loss of time to meet Owen at Glasgow. I did not hold it expedient to inform my mother of my plans than by leaving a letter of thanks for his hospitality, assuring him that sudden and important business prevented my offering them in person. I knew the blunt old knight would readily excuse my conduct, and I had such a belief in the exist and decided character of Rashleigh's machinations, that I had some apprehension of his having provided means to intercept a journey which was undertaken with a view to discover the truth. The letters were publicly announced at Osbaldstone Hall.

I therefore determined to set off on my journey with daylight in the ensuing morning, and to gain the main post road from the town of Scotland on as any idea of my departure was entertained at the Hall; but one impediment of consequence was likely to prevent that speed which was the soul of my expedition. I did not know the station, nor indeed any road to Glasgow; and as, in the circumstances in which I stood, dispatch was of the greatest consequence, I determined to consult Andrew Fairertain on the subject, as the most available authority in my neighbourhood. Late as it was, I set off with the intention of ascertaining this important point, and after a few minutes' walk reached the dwelling of the gardener. At the great distance from the exterior wall of the garden, a snug comfortable Northumbrian cottage, built of stones roughly dressed with the hammer, and having the windows and doors decorated with huge heavy architraves, or lintels, as they are called, of hewn stone, and its roof covered with broad gray flags, instead of shingles, the flat tile. A large pear-tree at one end of the cottage, a rivulet, and flower-plot of a rood in extent, in front, and a kitchen-garden behind; a paddock for a cow, and a small field, cultivated with several rows of currant and gooseberry. This was the benefit of the cottage than for sale, announced the warm and cordial comforts which Old England, even at her most northern extremity, extends to her meanest inhabitants.

As I approached the mansion of the sagacious Andrew, I heard a noise, which, being of a nature peculiarly solemn, nasal, and prolonged, led me to think that Andrew, according to the decent and meritorious custom of his countrymen, had assembled some of his neighbours to join in family exercise, as he called evening devotion. Andrew had indeed neither wife, child, nor female inmate in his family. "The first of his trade," he said, "had had enough o' those cattle."

But, notwithstanding, he sometimes contrived to form an audience for himself out of the neighbouring Papists and Group of English-men, bands, an electric, expressed it, snatched out of the burning, on whom he used to exercise his spiritual gifts, in defiance alike of Father Vaughan, Father Docharty, Rashleigh, and all the world. I knew that Andrew's interference on such occasions an act of heretical intercourse. I conceived it likely, therefore, that the well-disposed neighbours might have assembled to hold some thing which he was reading. However, when I listened to it more accurately, seemed to proceed entirely from the lungs of the said Andrew; and when I interrupted it by entering the house, I found Fairertain abating that, as she beat could, with long words and hard names, and reading aloud, for the purpose of his own edification, a volume of controversial divinity. "I was just taking a spell. He read a bit," said he, "and I see the huge volume as I entered, 'of the worthy Doctor Lightfoot.'"

"Lightfoot!" I replied, looking at the ponderous volume with some surprise; "surely your author was, unhappily named!"

"Lightfoot was his name, sir; a divine he was, and another kind of a divine than they have any where. Always, I crave your pardon for keeping ye standing at the door, but having been misinstructed (gude preserve us!) with as bogle the night alread, I was dubious o' opening the yet till! I had gan through the e'ming worship; and I had just finished that book before I saw a young man gar them keep their distance, I wone what will?"

"Trysted with a bogle!" said I; "what do you mean by that, Andrew?"

"I said misinstructed," replied Andrew; "that is as muckle as to say, fyi'd wir a ghost—gude preserve us, I say again."

"Flay'd by a ghost, Andrew! how am I to understand that?"

"I did not say flay'd," replied Andrew, "but fyi'd, that is, I got a fleg, and was ready to jump out o' my skin, though nobody offered to whirf it aff my body as a man wad bark a tree."

"I beg a truce for your torsos in the present case, Andrew, and I wish to know whether you can direct me the nearest way to a town in your country of Scotland, called Glasgow?"

"A town-nad Glasgow," echoed Andrew Fairertain. "Glasgow's a ceety, man.—And is't the way to Glasgow ye were speering if I kend it?—What said all me to kerst it?—it's no that dooms far frae my ain parish of Glasgow, but a bogle Dựe, a genuine ghost, to the west. But what may your honour be gan to Glasgow for?"

"Particular business," replied I.

"That's a muckle as to say, speer nae questions, and I'll tel ye nae less—To Glasgow?"—he made a short pause—"I am thinking ye wad be the better o some aye to show you the road."

"Certainly, if I could meet with any person who can, that way."

"And your honour, doubtless, will consider the time and trouble?"
"Unquestionably—my business is pressing, and if you can find any guide to accompany me, I'll pay him handomely."

"This is no day to speak of carnal matters," said Andrew, casting his eyes upwards; "but if it werea Satanic matter, I'd consent to go to one that was bearable. I don't want a pleasant company on the road, and tell ye the names of the gentleman's and nobleman's seats and castles, and count their lads to ye?"

"I tell you, all I want to know is the road I must travel; I will pay the fellow to his satisfaction—I will give him any thing in reason."

"Any thing," replied Andrew, "is nothing; and this lad that I am speaking o' kens the short cuts and queer by-paths through the hills, and—"

"I have no time to talk about it, Andrew; do you make the horrid sermon of me and you?"

"Aha! that's speaking to the purpose," answered Andrew. "I am thinking, since sae be that sae it is, I'll be the lad that will guide you myself,"

"You, Andrew? How will you get away from your employment?"

"I tell'd your honour a while syne, that it was lang that I had been thinking o' flitting, maybe as lang as four weeks since I came to Osbaldeston Hall; and now I am o' the mind to gang in gude earnest—better, soon as syne—better a finger aff as aye wagging."

"You leave your service then? but will you not lose much?"

"Nae doubt there will be a certain loss; but then I hae soiler o' the laird's in my hands that I took for the apples in the sud orchard—and a sair bargain the folowers got from the white-house—where the common trash—and yet Sir Hildebrandt's as keen to hae the soiler (that is, the steward is as pressing about it) as if they had been a'gowden pipings—and then there's the soiler for the sewer that's been so long away—I'll be in a manner decently made up. But doubtless your honour will consider my risk of loss when we won to Glasgow—and ye'll be for setting out forthwith?"

"By day-break in the morning," I answered.

"That's nothing o' the suddenest—where am I to find a nag?—Stay—I ken just the beast that will answer me."

"At five in the morning, then, Andrew, you will meet me at the head of the avenue."

"Deil a fear o' me (that I saul any sac) missing my tryste," replied Andrew very briskly; "and, if I might advise, we wad be off two hours earlier. I ken the road well enough, and that's the laird's."

"The laird has made a tour round the country-side, and diena ken the colour of a heather-cope when it's a-dun."

I had improved of Andrew's amendment on my original proposal, and we agreed to meet at the place appointed in the morning. At once, however, a reflection came across the mind of my intended travelling companion—own way."

"The bogle! the bogle! what if it should come up upon us?—I downe forgather wi' these things twice in the four-and-twenty hours."

"Yeth! I pooh!" I exclaimed, breaking away from him, "fear nothing from the next world—the earth contains living fiends, who can act for themselves without assistance, were the whole host that fell with Lucifer and his multitude of devils in that fiendish and devilish chase to obey or to reply to me. My anger was, however, quite impotent. I attempted once or twice to get up alongside of my self-willed guide, with the purpose of knocking him off his horse with the but-end of my whip; but Andrew was better mounted than I, and either the spirit of the animal which he bestrode, or more probably some presentiment of my kind intentions towards him, induced him to quicken his pace whenever I attempted to make up to him. On the other hand, I was compelled to exert my spur to keep him in sight, for without his guidance I was too well employed in keeping the horse which was adhering to my body to give any prepared notices which must otherwise have pressed on my mind. But at length, after halloowing repeatedly to Andrew to ride slower, I became seriously incensed at his immoderate speed and at my subsequent perseverance in not obeying or to reply to me. My anger was, however, quite impotent. I attempted once or twice to get up alongside of my self-willed guide, with the purpose of knocking him off his horse with the but-end of my whip; but Andrew was better mounted than I, and either the spirit of the animal which he bestrode, or more probably some presentiment of my kind intentions towards him, induced him to quicken his pace whenever I attempted to make up to him. On the other hand, I was compelled to exert my spur to keep him in sight, for without his guidance I was too well employed in keeping the horse which was adhering to my body..."

With these words, the import of which was suggested by my own situation, I left Andrew's habitations, and returned to the Hall.
accord. Apparently this threat made some impression on the tympanum of his ear, however, for all my milder entreaties; for he relaxed his pace upon hearing it.

"There was a muckle sense in riding at sic a daft-like gate."

"And what did you mean by doing so at all, you self-willed, self-wend?" I replied; for I was in a towering passion, to which, by the way, nothing contributes more than the having recently undergone a space of personal fear, which, like a few drops of water flowing down a wall, when it is the back of an affectionate mountain-river, which is insufficent to quench."

"What's your honour's will?" replied Andrew, with impertinente gravity.

I tell you, you have been roaring to you this hour to ride slower, and you have never so much as answered me—Are you drunk or mad to behave so?"

"An it like your honour, I am something dull o' hearing; and I'll no deny but I might have maybe taen a stirrup-cup at parting free the auld biggin where I hae dawt sae lang; and having nobody to say o' me, so the lee was not taen reely do mysel', or else leave the e'nd the brandy stoup to that papis, and that wad be a waste, as your honour kens."

"This might be all very true, and my circumstances required that I should be on good terms with your guide; I therefore satisfied myself with requiring of him to take his directions from me in future concerning the path of travel."

Andrew, emboldened by the mindness of his tone, elevated his own into the pedantic, conceited octave, which was familiar to him on most occasions.

"Your honour winna persuade me, and nobody shall persuade me, that it's either halaciste or prudent to take the night air on those moors without a cordial o' crow-gillflower water, or a tass of brandy or aquavitae, or sic-like creature-comfort. I hae taen that my custom, and I have done that many a day and night, and never could find the way without when I hae taen my mien; mair by token that I hae whiles twa bits o' anckers o' brandy on ilk side o' me."

"In other words, Andrew," said I, "you were a snuggler—how does a man of your strict principles reconcile yourself to cheat the revenue?"

"Hoot, now, what o' that?" exclaimed Andrew; "pair auld Scotland suffers enough by that blackguard loons o' eccesimes and gaugers, that hae come down on her like locusts since the sad and sorrowful time of the Reformats, being like a bank o' soup—something that will keep up her auld heart, and that will they nill the, the ill-far-ard thieves."

"Upon more particular inquiry, I found Andrew had from time to time made himself a smuggler, both before and after his establishment at Osbaldeston Hall; a circumstance which was so far of importance to me, as it proved his capacity as a guide, notwithstanding the escape of which he had been guilty at his outset. Even now, though traveling at a more moderate pace, the stirrup-cup, or whatever else had such an effect in stimulating Andrew's motions, seemed not to really to have lost its influence. He often cast a nervous and startled look behind him; and whenever the road seemed at all practicable, showed symptoms of a desire to accelerate his pace, as if he feared some pursuit from the rear. These appearances of alarm gradually diminished as we reached the top of a high bleak ridge, which ran nearly east and west for about a mile, with a very steep descent on either side. The pale beams of the morning were now enlightening the horizon, when Andrew cast a look behind him, and not seeing the appearance of a living being on the moors which he had, as if he feared some pursuit from the rear. As first whistled, then sung, with much glee and little melody, the end of one of his native songs:

Jenny, last! I think I have her.

One thing I can tell the world:

All their clan shall never get her."

As we passed at the same time the neck of the horse which had carried him so gallantly; and my attention being directed by that action to the animal, I instantly recognised a favourite mare of Thorncliff Osbaldestone. "How is this, sir?" I said sternly, to that gentleman, who, I thought, was Mr. Thorncliff's nephew.

"I'll no say but she may aiblins has been his ho- sour's Squire Thorncliff's in her day—but she's mine now.""

"You have stolen her, you rascal!"

"Na, na, sir, nae man can wyte me wi' theft! The thing stands this gate, ye see—Squire Thorncliff bor-cowed ten punds o' me to gang to York Races—deil a boddle was thare. January back. Then the dogs was raddling my baneis, as he cud it, when I asked him but for my ain back again—now I think it will riddle him or he gets his horse over the Border again—unni- less he pays me dight, and bawbee, he shall aiver a hair o' her tail. I ken a canny chield at Lough-maben, a bit writer lad, that will put me in the way to sort him—Steel the mair! na, na, far be the sin through me, and I'll give me to no juridiction fandandy causey. Thare be bonny writer words—amaist like the language o' huz gardeners and other learned men—it's a pit they're a rare deal—than the boddle at the melie—nae gane for a lang law-plea, and four anckers o' as guid branc-by as was e'er couplit ower craig—Heh, sins! but law's a dear thing."

"You are likely to find it much dearer than you suppose, Andrew, if you proceed in this mode of paying yourself, without legal authority."

"Hout tout, we're in Scotland now, (be praised on't,) and I can find both friend, ane, and lawyer, and judge too, o' the auld Osbaldestone family."

My mother's mither's third cousin was cousin to the Provost o' Dunfries, and he winna see a dop o' her blude wranged. Hout awa, the laws are indifferently administered here to a man alike; it's no like on a road, when a chield may be winnuppt awa' wi' one o' Clerk Johnson's warrants, afores he kens where he is. But they hae little enough law among them by and by, and the law is a grand reason that I nae gien them gude day."

I was highly provoked at the achievement of Andrew, and considered it as a hard fate, which a second time threw me into collision with a person of such irregular practices. I determined, however, to buy the mare of him, when we should reach the end of our journey, and send her back to my cousin at Thorncliff, which Andrew, in a great hurry, informed me he resolved to make my uncle acquainted from the next post-town. It was needless, I thought, to quarrel with Andrew in the meantime, who had, after all, acted with all the skill and caution in his circumstances. I therefore smothered my resentment, and asked him what he meant by his last expressions, that there would be little law in Northumberland, and that he was just, and saidAndrew, "hout, ay—there will be sub-law enough. The priests and the Irish officers, and thae papist cattle that has been sodging abroad, because they durent bide at hame, are a feicing thick in Northumberland o'now—and thae corbies binna gather without they smell carrion. As sure as ye live, his honour Sir Hilbrand is gone to stick the nose in the bow—that Andrew's fate was but gun and pistol, sword and dagger, among them—and they'll be laying on, I see warrant; for the're fearless fules the young Osbaldestone squares, ay treaving your honour's pardon, constraint, and doctors spoke very truly in stating his conviction, that some desperate plots were in agitation, as a reason which determined his resolution to leave the Haill."

"The devils!" he said, with some way of country and other habits, instead of properly enrolled and maintained, and they wanted me to take arms also. "But I'll ride in nace siccan troope—they little kend Andrew them..."
asked him. I'll fight when I like myself, but it sail neither be for the hure o' Babylon, nor any hure in England.

CHAPTER XIX.

Where longs to fall you rife spine, and righly spake of this sancruminal. The poet's thoughts, the warrior's fire, The lover's sighs, are sleeping there.

LONDON.

At the first Scotch town which we reached, myuide sought out his friend and counsellor, to consult upon the proper and legal means of converting into his own lawful property the 'bonny creature,' which was at present the only one by one of these slight-of-hand arrangements, which still sometimes took place in that once lawless district. I was somewhat diverted with the dejection of his looks on his return, instead of the usual cheerful rather too communicative to his confidential friend, the attorney; and learned with great dismay, in return for his unsuspecting frankness, that Mr. Touthope had, during his absence, been appointed clerk to the peace of the county, and was bound to communicate to justice all such achievements as that of his friend, Mr. Andrew Fairservice. There was a necessity, this alert member of the入党, for arresting the horse, and placing him in Baillie Trumbull's stable, therein to remain at livery, at the rate of twelve shillings (Scotch) per diem, until the question of property was duly tried and decided. He even had said to us, in strict and rigid execution of his duty, he ought to detain him. Andrew himself; but on my guide's most pitiously entreating his forbearance, he not only desisted from this proposal, but made a present to Andrew of a broken-winded and spanned pony, in order to enable him to pursue his journey. It is true, he qualified this act of generosity by exacting from poor Andrew an absolute cession of his right and interest in the horse, which was to be sold by Baillie Trumbull, with the transference which Mr. Touthope represented as of very little consequence, since his unfortunate friend, as he facetiously observed, was likely to get nothing of the mare.

Andrew seemed woful and disconsolate, as I screwed out of him these particulars; for his northern pride was cruelly pinched by being compelled to abandon among his countrymen, more especially the inflammation of reckonings, the diminished size of pint-stoups, and other grievances, which he pointed out to me during our journey.

For I myself, as things had turned out, acquitted of all charge of the mare, and wrote to my uncle the circumstances under which she was carried into Scotland, concluding with informing him that she was in the hands of justice, and her worthy representatives, Baillie Trumbull and Mr. Clerk Touthope, to whom I referred him for further particulars. Whether the property returned to the Northern man forstukers, or continued to lie in the person of the Scottish attorney, it is unnecessary for me present to say.

We now pursued our journey to the north-west, to reach much slower than that at which we had achieved our nocturnal retreat from England. One chain of barren and uninteresting hills succeeded another, and the more the scenes of Clyde opened up us; and with such dispatch as we might, gained the town, or as my guide pertinaciously termed it, the city of Glasgow. Of late years, I understand it has fully deserved the name, which, by a sort of political second-sight, my guide assigned it. An extensive and increasing trade with the West Indies and American colonies, has, if I am not informed, laid the foundation of wealth and prosperity, which if carefully strengthened and built upon, may one day support an immense fabric of commercial prosperity; but, in the earlier time of which I speak, of this country in the island, and the national jealousy of the English, its merchandize, since Scotland were so great a measure, from the exercise of the privilege which that memorable treaty conferred on it. Glasgow lay on the right side of the island, in the direction of which the tristing commerce is yet possessed by Scotland, chiefly supported itself. Yet, though she gave small promise of the commercial eminence which was to be her order to attain, Glasgow, as the principal center toward the eastern district of Scotland, was a place of considerable rank and importance. The broad and beautiful Clyde, which floats of which are means of an inland navigation of some importance. Not only the fertile plains in its immediate neighbour, but the districts of Ayre and Dumfries are admitted to their capital, to which these not admitted their produce, and received many necessaries and luxuries as their consumption required.

The dusky mountains of the Western Highlands often sent forth wilder tribes to frequent St. Mungo's holy city, on which the wild, short, dwarfish cattle and ponies, conducted by Highlanders, as wild, as shaggy, and sometimes as dwarfs, as the animals they had in charge, often traversed the streets of Glasgow. Strangers gazed with envy on the antique and fantastic dress, and listened to the unknown and dissonant sounds of their language, while the mountaineers, armed even while eating in this singular city, moved with the sword, dagger, and target, stared with astonishment on the articles of luxury of which they knew no use, and with an avowal which seemed somewhat alarming on the articles which they showed me.

It is always with unwillingness that the Englisher, quits his deserts, and at this early period was like tiring a pine from its rock, to plant elsewhere a flourishing seedling; often over-peopled, although thinned occasionally by an or by the sword, and many of their inhabitants crowded down to Glasgow—there formed settlements, and there sprang the trade, indeed, from that of their native hills, of supply of a hardly and useful population was of consequence to the prosperity of the place, formed in these means of which the town already boasted, and laid the foundation of its future prosperity.

The exterior of the city corresponded with the firmness and importance of the people, the broad and important, decorated with public buildings of an architecture rather striking than correct in respect of taste, and running between rows of tall built of ashlar, with a basis of masonry, and a rich ornamentation with masonic-work; a circumference which gave the street an imposing air of dignity and grandeur, of which most English towns are so marked with a measure deprived, by the slight, unsubstantial and imperishable quality and appearance of the bricks from which they are constructed.

In the western metropolis of Scotland, we arrived, and I arrived on a Saturday evening; the streets filled with the Sabbath, my first impulse, not unexpectedly, was to go out Owen; but on inquiry I found that was a word "would be in vain," until dark-time went on.

ava', we maunna be late o' gumn in to disturb the worship; if we bide here, the searchers will be on us, and carry us to the guard-house for being idlers in kind time."

This admonished, I followed my guide, but not, as I had supposed, into the body of the cathedral. "This gate—this gate, sir!" he exclaimed, dragging me off as I made towards the main entrance of the building. —"This gate, entering from the yard of the churchyard, will carry you to the ceremonial morality, as dowd' and as fussionless as rue leaves at Yule—Here's the real savour of doctrine."

So saying, we entered a small, low-arched door, secured by a padlock. I found a looking person seemed on the point of closing, and descended several steps as if into the funeral vaults beneath the church. It was even so; for in those subterranean precincts, why then, for such a purpose I know not, was established a very singular place of worship.

Concealed, Tresham, an extensive range of love-browed, dark, and twilight vaults, such as are used for sepulchres in other countries, and had long been dedicated to the same purpose in this, a portion of which was walled with pew, and used as a church. The part of the vault thus occupied, though capable of containing a congregation of many hundreds, bore a small proportion to the darker and more extensive vaults which yawned around what may be termed the interior of those vaults, a series of niches, oblongs, and recesses, by which the vaulted ceilings rise from the floor to the roof, and are ornamented with columns and capitals of dainty design.

Inscriptions, which could only be seen through the pinnacled arches, inlaid in the vaults, made the vaults seem like the paradise antediluvian, a sanctuary to the god of love; and, like the paradise antediluvian, as the seat of devotion in charity which they inspired, invited the passengers to pray for the souls of those whose bodies rested beneath. Surrounded by these recollections of the last remains of mortality, I found my admiration and gratitude engrossed in the act of prayer. The Scotch perform this duty in a standing, instead of a kneeling posture, more, perhaps, to take us broad a distinction as possible from the ritual of Rome, the form of which, as I have observed, in their family worship, as doubtless in their private devotions, they adopt, in their immediate address to the Deity, that posture which other Christians use as the humblest and most reverential. Standing, therefore, the men being uncovered, a crowd of several hundreds of both sexes, and all ages, listened with great reverence and attention to the expostulator, at least the unprinted, prayer of an aged clergyman, who was very popular in the city. Educated in the same religious persuasion, I sincerely felt my mind deeply moved for the day, and it was not till the congregation resumed their seats that my attention was diverted to the consideration of the appearance of all around me.

The address of the prayer, most of the men put on their hats or bonnets, and all who had the happiness to have seats sat down. Andrew and I were not of this number, having been too late of entering the church to secure such accommodation. We stood among a number of other persons in the same situation, forming a sort of ring around the central part of the congregation. Behind and around us were the vaults I have already described; before us the devout audience, dimly shown by the light which streamed on their faces through one or two low Gothic windows, such as give air and light to churches, the piercing rays of the sun which play on the various parts of the vaults, which are generally turned towards a Scotch pastor on such occasions, almost all composed to attention, unless where a father or mother bore the hands of a child in the wandering eyes of a lively child, or disturbed the slumbers of a dull one. The high-boned and harsh countenance of the nation, with the expression of ingenuity and shrewdness which fires them, had, seen to more advanced age and infirmities had impaired the power of a voice originally strong and sonorous. He read in text with a pronunciation somewhat inaudible to us, but which reached the entire assembly. In sermon, his tones gradually strengthened, as he entered with vehemence into the arguments with which he maintained. They related chiefly to the subject of Christ's presentation and call to the apostles, and the fathomless by mere human reason, but for which, with equal ingenuity and propriety, he sought and, in liberal quotations from the inspired writings, to mind was unperturbed in conciliating all his reasoning, nor was I sure that in some instances I rightly comprehended his positions. But nothing could be more impressive than the eager enthusiasm of the good old man, and nothing more ingenious that is mode of reasoning. The Scotch, it is well known, are more remarkable for the exercise of their intellectual powers, than for the keenness of their moral feelings; they are, therefore, more moved by rhetoric than by argument, and more attracted by acute and argumentative reasoning on doctrinal points, than influenced by the sentimental appeal to the heart and to the passions, by which our popular preachers in other countries win the favour of their hearers.

Among the attentive group which I now saw, might be distinguished various expressions of an expression of devout pride, as if sharing the triumph of his argument; the forlornness of the right hand hand of the church, successively those of the left, the present argument, argued the speaker, as his condition. Another, with fiercer and sterner look, nodded at once to the contempt of all who doubted his creed of his pastor, and his joy at the approbation denounced against them. A third, perhaps belonging to a different congregation, and not only by accident or curiosity, had the appearance of most deeply affecting any of the content. You and you might plainly read, in the slight nod of his head, his doubts as to the soundness of the preacher's argument, the greater part of whom were not yet convinced by the words of the minister, and by an expression of decent pride, as if sharing the triumph of his argument; the forlornness of the right hand hand of the church, successively those of the left, the present argument, argued the speaker, as his condition. nics stood beside and behind me, stragglers, who, like ourselves, had been too late in obtaining entrance. But at last they, whom I, though I could hardly say why, that none of these was the person who had spoken to me. Their countenance seemed not composed to attention to the ear; and not content with returning to the inquisitive and startled look with which I surveyed them. A massive round pillar, which was close behind us, might have concealed the speaker for the instant he uttered his mysterious caution; but wherefore it was given in such a place, or to what species of danger it directed my attention, or by whom the warning was uttered, were points on which I cavilled with myself and itself in perspective. I would, however, be concluded, be repeated, and I resolved to keep my countenance turned towards the clergyman, that the whisperer might be tempted to renew his communication, under the idea that the first had passed unobserved.

My plan succeeded. I had not resumed the appearance of attention to the speaker for five minutes, when he cast a glance at me, and seeing what he supposed to be a slight blush on the face of a woman, to whom I had been speaking, he turned and wasyre, and I kept my face in the same direction. "You are in danger in this place," the voice proceeded; "so am I—Meet me to-night on the bridge, at twelve o'clock, at home till the gloaming and avoid observation."

Here the voice ceased, and I instantly turned my head. But the speaker had, with still greater promptitude, glided back to the pillar, and I availed myself of the excuse of inspection to retire to the interior circle of hearers, I also stepped behind the column. All this time I had been, and I knew, that I was not wrapped in a mantle, whether a Lowland cloak, or a Highlands plaid, I could not distinguish, which traversed, like a phantom, the dreary vacancy of vaulted tombs, in which I have described.

I made a mechanical attempt to pursue the mysterious form, which glided away, and vanished in the vaulted cemetery, like the spectre of one of the numerous dead who rested within its precincts. I had little chance of arresting the course of one obviously determined not to be spoken with; but that little chance was lost by my stumbling and falling before I had made three steps from the column. The obscurity which enveloped my misfortune covered my disgrace; which I accounted rather lucky, for the preacher, with that stern authority which the Scottish ministers assume for the purpose of keeping order in their pulpits, said nothing of course, to desire the "proper officer" to take into custody the cause of this disturbance in the place of worship. As the noise, however, was not repeated, and the porter, or the head or the head of the church, from which I thought it necessary to be rigorous in searching out the offender; so that I was enabled, without attracting further observation, to place myself by Andrew's side in my original position. The service proceeded, and closed without the recurrence of any thing else worthy of notice.

As the congregation departed and dispersed, my friend Andrew exclaimed, "See, yonder is worthy Mr. MacVittie and Mrs. MacVittie, and Miss Alison MacVittie, and Mr. Thomas MacFin, that they say she is to marry Miss Alison, if a bowls row right—she'll have a humble seat at the Chevreul, for she was engaged to me, without ever hearing me an answer; it was only when I found I could not otherwise be kept quiet that I understood to inform me, that, being once in the vault, I could not leave it till service was over, because the doors were locked so soon as the prayers began. Having thus spoken in a brief and peremptory manner, Andrew again assumed the air of intelligent and dignified importance, and attention to the preacher's discourse.

While I endeavored to make a virtue of necessity, I recall my attention to the sermon. I was again arrested, ad ocularly by the disappearance of the form which whispered distinctly in my ear, "You are in danger in this city."—I turned round as if mechanically.

One or two starched and ordinary-looking mecha-ed this insidious thought—she alone knew of my journey; from her own account, she possessed friends and influence. I was determined to be too strong for a talisman, whose power I was to invoke when all other aid failed me: who, then, but Diana Vernon, possessed other means, knowledge, or inclination for the rescue? and, by the turn of the cock, I knew that my steps were surrounded? This flattering view of my very doubtful case pressed itself upon me again and again. It insinuated itself into my thoughts, though kept very banished from my open, and now it poised itself with an added force, to foster and develop its attractions more boldly during the course of my frugal meal, and became so courageously insin- tive during the succeeding half-hour, (laid perhaps by the French), that, though I sought to fly, I was con- vinced that the time of desperate attempt to escape from a delusive seduction, to which I felt the danger of yielding, I pushed my glass from me, threw aside the air, and drank with the feeling of one who could fly from his own thoughts. Yet perhaps I yielded to the very feelings from which I seemed to fly, since my steps insensibly led me to the bridge over the Clyde, the place assumed for the rendezvous by my mysterious monitor.

Although I had not parted from my escort until the hour of evening-service within the church, and by the window, I was tortured with the religious scruples of my landlady, who hesitated to dress a hot dinner between sermons, and also with the admonition of my unknown friend, to keep my apartment till I would return to it. But I had taken the opportunity of the time of my appointment and that at which I reached the assigned place of meeting. The interval, as you will readily credit, was wearisome enough; and I can hardly explain to you how it passed away. Various groups of persons, all of whom, young and old, seemed impressed with a reverential feeling of the sanctity of the day, passed along the large open meadow which lies on the northern bank of the Clyde, and serves at once as a bleaching-field and pleasure-walk for the inhabitants, or paced with slow steps the long bridge which communicates with the southern shore of the county. All that I remember of them was the general, yet not unpleasant, intimidation of a devotional character impressed on each little party, formally assumed perhaps by some, but sincerely characterising the greater number, which hushed the pedantic gaiety of the young into a tone of more quiet, yet more interesting, interchange of sentiments, and suppressed the vehement argument and querulous gloom of the SVG. This window to the advancing age. Notwithstanding the numbers who passed me, no general sound of the human voice was heard; few turned again to take some minutes' vol- untary solemnity, by which the length of the day, and the beauty of the surrounding scenery, seemed to invite them; all hurried to their homes and resting places. To one accustomed to the mode of spending Sunday evenings abroad, even among the French Calvinists, there seemed something Judaical, yet at the same time striking and affecting, in this mode of keeping the Sabbath holy. Insensibly, I felt my mood of musing at the side of the river, and observ- ing successively the various persons who were passing homeward, and without tarrying or delay, must expose me to observation at least, if not to censure, and I slunk out of the way of them, to seek a trivial occupation for my mind in marshalling my re- solving walk in such a manner as should least render me obnoxious to observation. The different alleys lined out through this extensive meadow, and which are planted with trees, like the Park of St. James's in London, gave me facilities for carrying into effect these childish manoeuvres.

As I walked out of these avenues, I heard, to my surprise, the sharp and concordant voice of Andrew Fair, raised by a sense of self-consequence to a pitch somewhat higher than others seemed to think consistent with the situation. Strange is this dubious intimation, conveyed at a time and place, and in a manner so surprising. She alone—whispered... ioity. As he passed, I heard him communicate a grave-looking man, in a black coat, a slouched hat, and Geneva cloak, the following sketch of a man of his appearance: 'And he advanced as a morose, silent, even sullen, magisterial gentleman; and as a caricature, could not, nevertheless, refuse to assume as a likeness. Ay, ay, Mr. Hammonhow, it's en as I tell ye. He had a face that gave one a warning that he was a man of some experience. Such a man, even as a picture, could not be mistaken. He was a man of few words, but the words that he spoke carried with them a weight that was not to be dismissed lightly. He had a manner that was at once authoritative and commanding. Even in his gait and deportment, there was a dignity that was felt by all who came in contact with him. He was a man of strong character, and his influence was felt in every circle that he entered. His presence was a source of inspiration to all who were near him.' whom, think ye, your life is of such consequence, that they should be afraid of you if it?"

"I fear, replied he, though somewhat hastily, "Walk on—I attend you."

We proceeded, contrary to my expectation, to re-enter the town, and glided like mute spectres, side by side under its gloomy stone fronts, and with the variegated ornaments and pediments of the windows, looked yet taller and more sable by the imperfect moonshine. Our walk was at some minutes in perfect silence. At length my conductor spoke:

"Are you afraid?"

"I retract your own words," I replied; "wherefore should I fear?"

"Because you are with a stranger—perhaps an enemy, in a place where you have no friends and many enemies."

"I neither fear you nor them; I am young, active, and armed."

"I am not armed," replied my conductor; "but no matter, a willing hand never lacked weapon. You say you fear nothing; but if you knew who was by your side, perhaps you might underlie a tremor."

"And why should I?" replied I. "I again repeat, I fear nothing that you can do."

"I am not strong," said he. "The bolts revolve in my hand. But do not you fear the consequences of being found with one, whose very name whispered in this lonely street would make the stones themselves rise up to apprehend him—on whose head half the men in Glasgow would bend their fortunes on a found enema, and had the luck to grip him by the collar—the sound of whose apprehension were as welcome at the Cross of Edinburgh, as ever the news of a field stricken and won in Flanders?"

"And who then are you, whose name should create so deep a feeling of terror?" I replied.

"No enemy of yours, since I am conveying you to a place where I know not myself. I am but a man and a companion of this light which afforded me, and was sufficient to guard me against any sudden motion of assault."

"You have said," I answered, "either too much or too little—to much to induce me to confide in you as a mere stranger, since you avow yourself a person amenable to the laws of the country in which we are—and too little, unless you could show that you are unjustly subjected to their rigour."

As I ceased to speak, he made a step towards me. I drew back instinctively, and laid my hand on the hilt of my sword.

"What," said he, "on an unarmed man, and your friend?"

"I am yet ignorant if you are either the one or the other," I replied; "and, to say the truth, your language and manner might well entitle me to doubt both."

"It is manfully spoken," replied my conductor; "and I respect him whose hand can keep his head. I will be frank and free with you—I am conveying you to prison."

"And why," I exclaimed; "by what warrant, or for what offence?—You shall have my life sooner than my liberty—I defy you, and I will not follow you a step further."

"I dare not," he said, "carry you there as a prisoner. I am," he added, drawing himself haughtily up, "neither a messenger nor sheriff's officer; I carry you to see a prisoner from whose lips you will learn the risk it is to trust me. But my treachery is less likely to be resented by the visit; mine is in some peril; but that I readily encounter on your account, for I care not for risk, and I love a free young blood, that knows no precautions, but that of the cross o' the sword."

While he spoke thus, we had reached the principal street, and were passing before a large building of new stone, garnished, as I thought I could perceive, with gratings of iron before the windows.

"Muckle," said the stranger, whose language be-"Shentlemans to spea' wi' her," replied Dougal, resuming the true dogged sullen tone of a turnkey, in exchange for the shrill clang of Highland congratulation with which he had welcomed my mysterious guide; and, turning on his heel, he left the apartment.

It was some time before I could prevail upon the unfortunate sleeper to awaken and recognize me; and when he did so, the dressness of the wretched creature was, at supposing, which he naturally did, that I had been sent thither as a partner of his captivity.

"O, Mr. Frank, what have you brought yourself an' the house to—I think nothing of myself, that am a mere ephor, so to speak; but you, that was your father's sum total—his ummon—you that might have been the first man in the first house in the first city, to be shunt up in a natty Scotch jail, where one cannot even get the dirt brushed off your clothes?"

He rubbed, with an air of prevish irritation, the once stainless brown coat, which had now shared some of the impurities of the floor of his prison-house—his habits of extreme punctilious neatness acting mechanically to increase his distress.

"Heaven be gracious to us," he continued. "What news this will be on 'Change! There has not the like come there since the battle of Almantia, where the total of the British loss was summed up to five thousand men and the war was trying, the unspeakable, the unmentionable balance of missing—but what will that be to the news that Osbaldstone and Treharn have stopped?"

I broke in on his lamentations to acquaint him, that I was no prisoner, though searchable to account for my being in that place at such an hour. I could only allude to his inquiries by persisting in those which his own situation suggested; and at length obtained from him such information as was able to give me. It was none of the most distinct; for, however cleared in his own routine of commercial business, Owen was not aware, was not very acute in comprehending what I was asking.

The sum of his information was, that of two correspondents of my father's firm at Glasgow, where, owing to engagements in Scotland formerly alluded to, he transacted a great deal of business, both my father and Owen had found the house of MacVittie, MacFin and Company, the most obliging and accommodating. They had deferred to the great English house on every occasion; and, in all their transactions, without repining, the part of the jackall, who only claims what the lion is pleased to leave him. However small the share of profit allotted to them, they have the satisfaction of knowing, that many, even to the extent of, 'enough for the like of them,' however large the portion of trouble, 'they were sensible they could not do too much to deserve the continued patronage and good opinion of their honoured friends in Crane Alley.'

The dictates of my father were to MacVittie and MacFin the laws of the Mede and Persians, not to be altered, innovated, or even discussed; and the punctilios exacted by Owen in their business transactions, for he was a great lover of form, more especially when he could dictate it ex cathedra, seemed scarce less sanctimonious in their eyes. This tone of deep and respectful observance went all currently down with Owen; but my father looked a little closer into men's bosoms, and whether suspicious of this excess of deference, or, as a lover of bowery and similarity in business, tired with these gentlemen's long-winded professions of regard, he had uniformly resisted their desire to become his sole agents in Scotland. On the contrary, he transacted many affairs through a correspondent of a character perfectly different—a man whose good opinion of himself amounted to self-conceit, and who, by the mere disliking of the name of the meddlesome O'Shaughnessy, and supposing that any allusion to it was inordinately and not without, the authority of all, Lombard-Stone had stood against his own private opinion.
As these peculiarities of temper rendered it difficult to transact business with Mr. Nicol Jarvie,—as they occasioned at times disputes and coldness between the parties and the household, and the involuntary remarks which were only got over by a sense of mutual interest,—as moreover, Owen's personal vanity sometimes suffered a little in the discussions to which the conversation of MacVittie and MacFin, and their occasional whim, conversant Scotch pellter, with whom there was no dealing.

It was also not surprising, that in these circumstances, which I only learned in detail some time afterwards, I put up the other house, of which the house was reduced by the absence of my father, and the disappearance of Rashleigh, should, on his arrival in Scotland, which took place two days before the time to which the correspondents, who had always professed themselves obligéd, gratified, and devoted to the service of his principal. He was received at Messrs. MacVittie and MacFin in Gallowgate, with something like the devotion a Catholic would pay to his tutelar saint. But, alas! this sunshine was soon overclouded, when, encouraged by the fair hope in which he inspired, he opened the difficulties of the house to the friends of the youthful and inquiring, and interceded for knowledge and assistance. MacVittie was even stunned by the communication; and MacFin, who at first seemed disposed, was already at the leger of his firm, and the depressions of the English firm; and the faces of MacVittie and MacFin, hitherto only blank and doubtful, became now ominous, grim, and lowering. They met Mr. Owen's request, and, I fancy, he might as well have asked for a warrant of instant security against imminent hazard of eventual loss, and at length, speaking more plainly, required that a deposit of assets, destined for other purposes, should be placed in their hands for that purpose. Owen repelled this demand with great indignation, as dishonourable to his constituents, unjust to the other creditors of Osballstone and Tresham, and was entirely ungrateful on the part of those by whom it was made.

The Scotch partners gained, in the course of this controversy, what is very convenient to persons who are not in the very heat of an arduous business, for putting themselves in a violent passion, and for taking, under the pretext of the provocation they had received, measures to which some sense of decency, if not of country, might otherwise have deterred them from resorting.

Owen had a small share, as I believe is usual, in the house to which he acted as head clerk, and was therefore personally liable for all its obligations. This was known to Messrs. MacVittie and MacFin; and, with a view of making him feel their power, or, rather in order to force him, at this emergency, into those measure in their favour, to which he had expressed himself so repugnant, they had recourse to a summary process of arrest and imprisonment, which it seems the law of Scotland (thence surely liable to much abuse) allows to a creditor, who finds his conscience at liberty to make oath that the debtor meditates his escape from the realm. Under such a warrant, poor Owen was confined to durance on the day preceding that when I was so strangely guided to his prison-house.

Thus possessed of the alarming outline of facts, he question remained, what was to be done? and it was a question of some perception that the party with which we were surrounded, it was more difficult to suggest any remedy. The warning which I had already received seemed to intimate, that things might be the cause of it, by springing full upon those who should appear when the doors opened, and forcing his way through all opposition into the street; and such was the appearance of strength and agility displayed in his frame, and of determination in his look and manner, that I did not doubt a moment but that he might get clear through his opponents unless they employed fatal means to stop his purpose. It was a task to get possession of the port of the outward gate and that of the door of the apartment, where there appeared—no guard with bayonets fixed, or watch with clubs, bills, or parchment slung over the doorway, but a mere party of police, tuckered up for truing through the streets, and holding a lantern in their hand. This female ushered in a more important personage, in town.
stout, short, and somewhat corpulent; and by digni-ity, as it soon appeared, a magistracy, bogwiggled, butting, and breathless with perversity and impatience.
Mr. Jarvis was the guide we had engaged, and it was proposed to take an unceremonious leave. He made a sign to me to say nothing, and intimated by his change of posture, an intention to glide towards the top, and to press the accommodation which that posture afforded.

Mr. Jarvis, who seemed very alert and expeditious in going through business, soon showed himself master of that which has been considered and addressed by him. Mr. Owen—Mr. Owen,—the following strain:

"Weel, Mr. Owen, weel—your house are ain certain sums to Messrs. MacVitty and MacFin (fame fa' their soun braw); they made that and mae out o' it. And whether that's true or no, at Caiziechat, that they took out atween my teeth—wi' help o' your gude word, I maun needs say, Mr. Owen —but that makes nae oaks now.—Weel, sir, your house awes them this siller; an' next, the business of other engagements they stand in for you, they has put a double turn o' Stanchells' muckle key on ye. Weel, sir, ye aye this siller—and maybe ye aye some mair to some other body too—maybe ye aye some to myself, Bailie Nicol Jarvis."

"I cannot deny, sir, but the balance may of this date be brought out against us, Mr. Jarvis," said Owen; "but—"

"I hae nae time to consider e'enow, Mr. Owen.—
Sae near Sabbath at een, and out o' one's warm bed at this time o' night, and a sort o' draw in the air besides—there's nae time for considering—but, sir, as I was saying, ye aye me money—it wanna deny—ye aie me mony, less or mair, I'll stand by it—But then, Mr. Owen. I canna see how you, an active man that under-stands the give-abouts o' business, y're come down about, and clear us a' a'—as I have gritt hope ye will—if ye're keepin lying here in the looth of Glasgow. —Now, sir, if you can find cout o' what I say, judicio siasti, —I'll be good, but appear and relieve your caution when ca'd on in our legal courts, ye may be set at liberty this very morning." —

"Mr. Jarvis," said Owen, "if any friend would become surry for me to that effect, my liberty might be usefully employed, doubless, both for the house and all connected with it."

"Aweel, sir," continued Jarvis, "and doubless such a friend wad expect ye to appear when ca'd on, and relieve him o' his engagement."

And I should do so as certainly, bating sickness or death, as that two and that two crooked and doubless, both for the house and all connected with it."

"Aweel, Mr. Owen," resumed the citizen of Glasgow, "I dinna misdoubt ye, and I'll prove it, sir—I'll prove it. I am a careful man, as is weel kend, and industrious, as the hole town can testify; and I can win my own crowns, and keep my crown, and count my crowns, wi' body only in the South- Market, or it may be in the Gallowgate. And I'm a prudent man, as my father the deacon was before me; but rather than an honest civil gentleman, that understands business, and is willing to do justice to all men, should lie by the heels this gate, unable to help himself or body else why—wull, sir, I'll be good, but appear and—-
But ye'll mind it's a bail judicio siasti, as our town-clerk says, not judicature solvuti; ye'll mind that, for there's muckle differences." from his failing to present himself when lawfully called upon.

"I believe ye— I believe ye. Enough said— enough said. We've hae your cows lost by breakfast-time.—And now let's hear what that chamber chieft o' yours has to say for themselves, or how, in the name of un-rule, they got here at this time o' night."

CHAPTER XXIII.

"Hame came the groomman at sic' o' bell, And hame came the lad. And hame came the young man Where a man should be."

"How's this, now, kimmer? How's this, now?"

"How came this calf here Without the boor's ha' me?"

"Och Seeg.

The magistrat took the light out of his servant-maids hand, and advanced to his scrutiny, like Diogenes in the street of Athens, lantern-in-hand, and probably with as little expectation as that of the cynic, that he was likely to encounter any especial treasure in the bosoms of his researches. The first whom he approached was my mysterious guide, who, seated on a table as I have already described him, with his eyes firmly fixed on the wall, his features arranged into the utmost expression of repose, his hands folded on his breast with an air betwixt carelessness and defiance, his heel resting against the foot of the table, to keep time with the tune which he pronounced in a measured manner to Mr. Jarvis, in an investigation with an air of absolute confidence and assurance, which, for a moment, placed at fault the memory and sagacity of the acute and anxious interfloorer.

"Ah! Eh! Oh!" exclaimed the Bailie. "My conscience!—it's impossible—and yet no!—Conscience, it canna be!—and yet again—Bell hae me! that I shall say an as I say it—ye've born divil that ye are to bad ends and nac duid ane—can this be you?"

"Fae as ye see, Bailie," was the laconic answer.

"Conscience! if I am no clean bumbadie—ye, cheat-the-wudly rogue, you here on your venture in the tolbooth o' Glasgow?—What ye' thakkin the value o' your head?"

"Umpf! Fairly weighted, and Dutch weight, it might weigh down one proct's, four bailies', a town-clerk's, six deacons', his salsent-master's—"

"Ah, ye raiving villain!" interrupted Mr. Jarvis. "Prepare over your sins, and prepare ye, far if I say the word!"

"True, Bailie," said he who was thus addressed, folding his hands behind him with the utmost non-motion and solemnity. "And why said I not, sir? I exclaimed the magistrate!—Why said I not? Answer me that—why said I not?"

"For three sufficient reasons, Bailie Jarvis,—First, for auld langsyne;—second, for the sake of the auld wife aye at the fire at Stickavallachan, that made some mixture of our bluid, to my own proper shame be it spoken! that has a court wi accounts, and yarn wannies, and looms, and shuttles, like a mere mechanical person;—and lastly, Bailie, because if I saw a sign o' your betraying me, I would platter that we with your harms ere the hand of man could rescue you!"

"Ye're a hale desperate villain, sir," retorted the undaunted Bailie; "and ye ken that I ken ye to be, and that I wadna stand a moment for my ain risk and your tricks—"

"I know it, sir," said the other, "you're a gentle bluid 'n your veins, and I wad be faith to hurt my ain manum. But I'll gang out here as free as I came in. In the very wa's o' Glasgow tolbooth shall tell o' those ten for the cause."

"Well, well," said Mr. Jarvis, "bluid's thicker than water; and it lies in kin, kin, and all, and we motes in ilk other's even if ocher even see them no. It was he seeth the bailie o' ye, Mr. Jarvis, at Stickavallachan, that you, ye Hieland limmer, had knocked out my braes, or that I had kilt you up in law. But ye'll own, ye dour devils, that it was no your very sel, I wad hae grippit the best man in the Hieland."

"Ye wad hae tried, cousin," answered my guide, "that I wot w Jed; but I doubt ye wad hae come an' wi' the short mesure; for we gang-there-out Hiel- land ladys are an unchly generation when you speak to us o' that sort. We да wadna come on the powers o' guid brand-clad about our hielands; let a be loads o' free-stone, and garters o' iron."

"Ye'll find the same bracks and the arm garter, ay, and the harem n' the rib for a thrang o' ribour," re- plaint the Bailie. "Nae man in a civilized country ever played the plaskies ye hae done—be 'n pick in your ain poch-neuk—I hae gien ye warning."

"Well, cousin," said the other, "ye'll wear black at my burial!"

"Deil a black cloak will be there, Robin, but the cuffs and the hoozie-craws, I accit ye my hand a the. But what's a gait me to say to a man of a good—a man of a good—what has ye for to do that? I left ye, man, and when am I to see it again?"

"Where is it," replied my guide, after the affecta- tion of considering for a moment, "I cannot justly tell—probably where last year it was seen."

"And that on the time o' Schieligion, ye Hieland dog," said Mr. Jarvis; "and I look for payment free you where ye stand."

"Aye," replied the Hielander, "but I keep neither snow nor dollar in my sporran. And as to when you'll see it—why, just when the king enjoys his ain again, as the auld sang says."

"Wast of a, Robin," returned the Glaswegian,—"I mean, ye ken, my ain man,—Wast of a!—Wad ye bring poppy in on us, and arbitrary power, and a feast and a warming-pan, and the forms, and the curates, and the mild monstries o' surfaccs and cements? Ye hae had better stick to your auld trade o' thistle-boot, black-spurns, sprees and stillwagon—better steaming nothose than rutting nations."

"Host, man, whisht wi' your whinnyter," answered the Celt, "we'll not go and rue another time till a la lang day. I'll theke care your counting-room is no' clencut out when the Gillon-a-nailie come to rub up the Glasgow butties, and clear them o' their auld shop-wares. And, unless it just fae, in the process way o' your duty, ye numna see me othen, Nicol, than I am disposed to be seen."

"Ye are a dauring villain, Rob," answered the Bailie; "and ye will be hanged, that will be seen and hard tell o' ; but I'm never be the ill bird and foul my nest, set apart strong necessity and the scrifh of duty, which no man should hear and be indignant.—But the devil who does the deed, I've turned, turning to me— Some skillyarther that ye had listed, I dour say. He looks us if he had a hard heart to the high-way, and a lang craig for the gibbet."

"This, tootin' Bailie," said Mr. Jarvis, "ye auld man, ye've been myself, had been stuck dumb during this strange recognizance, and no less strange dialogue, which took place between these extraordinary kinmen—"

"This, dear Bailie, as young Mr. Frank Oswald-stone, only child of the head of our house, who should have been taken into our firm at the time Mr. Rescleigh Oswaldstone, his cousin, had the luck to be taken into it"— (Here Owen could not suppress a grin) "—But, howsoever?—"

"O, I have heard of that snail," said the Scotch merchant, interrupting him; "it is he whom you call your principal, like an estimable and able merchant o', wad he or wad he no, and the lad turned a strolling stage-player, in pure dislike to the labour an honest man should live by.—Well, sir, what say ye to your handkerchief? Will Hamlet the Daunt o' Hamlet's ghost, be good security for Mr. Owen, sir?"

"I don't deserve your taunt," I replied, "though I respect your motives, and am too grateful for the assistance you have given me—my dear Mr. Hamlet! My only business here was to do what I could (it is perhaps very little) to aid Mr. Owen in the management of his father's affairs. My dislike of the commercial profession is a feeling of which I am the best and sole judge."

"I protest," said the Hielander, "I had some respect for this candid even before I heard what wain him; but now I honour him for his contempt of weavers and spinners, and scrie-like mechanical persons and their pursuits.

"Ye're mad, Rob," said the Bailie—"mad as a March mair than at Martinmas, is mair than I can weel say. Weavers! Deil shake ye oot o' the web the weaver craft made. Spinners!—ye'll spin and weav with a hand nae better than a March dairk, here, that ye're hoying and hounding on the shortest road to the galloway and the decivil, will his stage-plays and his poesies help him here, d'ye think. ye'll be a t'first being as so weel drawn dirks, ye'll be probate that ye are?—Will Tyreis tu tatzles, as they cau't, tell him when Raasliegh Osbaldistone is at Macbeth, and all his hornes and gala-glasses, and red hair of one. Raasliegh means to have the housewives to answer the bills which fell due ten days a'nce, were they a rouded at the Cross, basket-hills, Andrea-Ferras, leather targets, brooches, broochan, and possiball more.

"Ten days?" I answered, and instantly drew Dinna Vernon's packet; and the time being elapsed during which I was to keep the seal sacred, I hastened to tear open the black envelope, owing to the trepidation with which I opened the packet. A slight current of wind, which found its way through the broken pane of the window, wafted the letter to Mr. Jarvis's feet, who lifted it to read it. It was a letter from a gentleman at Glencairn, and, to my astonishment, handed it to his Highland kinsman, saying, "Here's a wind has blown a letter to your right worship, though there were ten thousand cold winds against it to the contrary."

The Highlander having examined the address, broke the letter open without the least ceremony. I endeavoured to interrupt his proceeding.

"You must satisfy me," said he, "and let me know that the letter is intended for you before I can permit you to peruse it."

"Make yourself quite easy, Mr. Osbaldistone," replied the mountaineer, with great composure—"remember Justice Inklewood, Clerk Jobson, Mr. Morris—above all, remember your very humble servant Robert awauid, and the beautiful Dinna Vernon. Remember all this, and doubt no longer that the letter is for me."

I remained astonished at my own stupidity. Through the whole night, the voice, and even the face of man, behind the letter, were justifications, banished me with recollections to which I could assign no exact local or personal associations. But now the light dawned on me at once,—this man was Campbell. It was but a moment before I was at once,—the deep strong voice,—the inflexible, stern, yet considerate cast of features,—the Scottish brogue, with its care-sounding dialect and imagery, which, although not rasped, the tone his, as of laying them aside, occurred at every moment of emotion, and gave path to his sarcasm, or vehemence to his exposition. Rather beneath the middle size than above it, his limbs were formed upon the very strongest model that is consistent with agility, while, from the remarkable ease and freedom of his movements, you could not doubt his possessing the latter quality in the highest degree of perfection. Two points of this person interfered with the rules of symmetry—his shoulders were so broad in proportion to his height, as, notwithstanding the lean and lathy appearance of his face, gave him something of the air of being very square in respect to his stature; and his arms, though round, sinewy, and strong, were so very long as to be neither dexterity. I afterwards heard that this leanness of frame was of origin which he bore with the ease and gracefulness of a man who was very dexterous. But certainly this want of symmetry destroyed the claim he might otherwise have set up, to be accounted a very handsome man; it gave something of the air of being uncouth, unlovely, to his appearance, and reminded me partly of the tale which Mabel used to tell of the old Picta which ravaged Northumberland in ancient times, who, according to her tradition, were a sort of half-goblin half-human beings, distinguished, like this man, for courage, cunning, ferocity, the length of their arms, and the squareness of their mass."

When, however, I recollected the circumstances in which we formerly met, I could not doubt that the billet was most probably designed for him. He had made a mark in my memory among those mysterious personages over whom Dinna seemed to exercise an influence, and from whom she experienced an influence in her turn. It was painful to think that the fate of one of them was to be revealed to me. And this was just what I expected of this man's description; yet it seemed impossible to doubt it. Of what use, however, could this person be to my father's affairs?—I could think only of one. Raasliegh Means to have the people from the mission of Miss Vernon, certainly found means to produce Mr. Campbell when his presence was necessary to exculpate me from Morrison's accusation. Was it selfish red-shanks—it didn't become my place, man."

"It's a kittle cas, she has gien me to play; but yet it's fair play, and I winna baulk her. Mr. Osbaldistone, I dwell not very far from hence—from my kinsman can show you the way—I leave Mr. O. and me; Dinna Vernon can show you the way. I'll see you in the glens, and see me in the glens, and it's like I may pleasure you, and stead your father in his extremity. I am but a poor man; but wi a better than wealth—and, conyen," turning from me to address those mystified as personages, said, "it's like I see a muckle to eat a dish of Scotch collops, and a leg o' red-deer venison wi' me, come ye wi' this Sassenach gentleman as far as Drymen or Buchinie, or the Clachan of Aberfoil will be better than ony o' them, and I'll hae somebody waiting to receive ye the gate to the place where I may be for the time. What say ye, man!—There's my thumb, I'll ne'er be欺any!"

"Na, na, Robin," said the cautious burgher, "I seldom like to leave the Gorbals; I have nae freedom to gang among your wild hills, Robin, and your kithless red-shanks—it dainna befit me, man.

"The devil damn your place and you bairn!" retorted Campbell. "The only drap o' gentle blude that's in your body was our great-grand-uncle's that weel at Dunbarton, and we'll be an hark in the world for ony bairn of yours, and just daik the gate w' this Sassenach."

"Hout awa' wi' your gentility," replied the Bailie; "carry your gentle blude to the Cross, and see what you'll be buyin'. But it's atersome, wad ye really and soothsayyly pay me the sillie!"

"I swear to ye," said the Highlander, "upon the holy name of him that sleeps beneath the gray stane at Inch-Caillescach! Inclines, in like manner, might prevail on Campbell to produce Raasldeigh? Speaking on this supposition, I requested to know where my dangerous kinsman was, and when Mr. Campbell had seen what I wanted, and that ye needna be so douterous, then ye cau't, tell him when Raasldeigh Osbaldistone is at Macbeth, and all his hornes and gala-glasses, and red hair of one. Raasldeigh means to have the housewives to answer the bills which fell due ten days a'nce, were they a rouded at the Cross, basket-hills, Andrea-Ferras, leather targets, brooches, broochan, and possiball more.

"Hout tout, man, let that flee stick in the wai," answered his kinsman; "when the dirt's dry it will rub out. Your father, honest man, could look over a frieze."

"Ye may be right, Robin," replied the Bailie, after a moment's reflection; "he was a considerate man the deacon; he knew we had a' our furniture, and he let us have it. Ye'll have to get it, Robin, I and I'll be glad to help ye."

This question put in a softened tone, convoying as much at least of the ludicrous as the pathetic.

"Forgotten him," replied his kinsman, "what said all me to forget him?" was a question never lost on, and baw' him was, and wrought my first pair o' hose—But come awa' kinsman.

"Come fill up my cap, come fill up my ear, come fill up my eye, come open your gate, and let me see free, I daurna stay longer in bonnie Dundee."

"Whisht, sir!" said the magistrates, in an authoritative tone, sitting near the latter end o' the Sabbath! This house may hear ye sing another tune yet—Aweel, we have a' backslidings to answer for—Stanehills, open the door.

"And let us—abide, a', me, myself, locked up in the tolbooth a' night!" exclaimed the Bailie, in pre and perturbation.

"Ca' for fore-hammers, sledges, hammers, pickaxes, and cudgels," they answered; they cried, "Ye'll have to get it, Robin, I and I'll be glad to help ye."

And let him, and let him be, and let him be locked up in the tolbooth by a Hillbrand blackguard, whom he'll hang up as high as Hum—"

"When ye catch him," said Campbell, gravely; "but I'm ane' o' the watch, and I'll be ane' o' the watch." Indeed, on examination, we found that the door was not only left open, but that Dougal in his retreat had, by carrying away the keys along with him, taken care that no one should exercise his office of porter in a hurry.

"He has glimmerings o' common sense now, that creature Dougal," said Campbell; "he kend an open door to me at a' o' the time I was a' avel me at a' o' the time."

We were by this time in the street.

"I tell you, Robin," said the magistrates, "in my pair mind, if ye live the life ye do, ye shud has an o' your ghillie did keep such as they didnae come in lack in Scotland, in case o' the warst."

"Ane o' my kinsman a bailie in ilk burgh will just do as weel, cousin Nicoll—so, guid-night or gude-morning to ye; and forget not the Clachan o' Aberfool."

And without waiting for an answer, he sprang to the other side of the street, and was lost in darkness.

Immediately, and as we walked, we heard himself, with a low whistle of peculiar modulation; which was instantly replied to.

"Hear to the Hillbrand devil," said Mr. Jarvie; "they think themselves on the skirts of Benadam, already, where they may go whistling, and whistling about without missing Sunday or Saturday."

Here he was interrupted by something which fell with a heavy clack on the street before us—I gude gude! Is's what ma' o' Mattie, houd up the lantern—Consarn! if it ians the keys—Well, that's just as weel—they cost the burgler sing, and they've the same clack—O, an Bailie Grahame were to gow ort o' this night's job, it wad be a saur hair in my neck!"

As we were still a few steps from the tolbooth door, there appeared two or more of our friends, and consigned them to the head usher, who, in lieu of the usual mode of making good his post by turning the keys, was keeping sentry in the vestibule till the arrival of some assistant, whom he had summoned in order to replace the Clachan fugitive Dougal.

Having discharged this piece of duty to the burgh and mankind better than the said magistrates' profit by the light of his lantern, and he by his arm, to find our way through the streets, which, whatever they may now be, were filled by the multitude brought hither to see if I was eaten a roasted haddock, or a fresh herring at breakfast wi' him the morn, and meet my friend, Mr. Owen, whom, by that time, he would place at liberty.

"My lad, I, when I was ane' o' the magistrates, I offered an invitation with thanks, 'how could you possibly connect me with the stage?'

"I want,' replied Mr. Jarvie; 'it was a baleful phrasin' shed they ca' Fairweather, that cam' tae get an order tae send the经过 through the streets, which, whatever they may now be, were filled by the multitude brought hither to see if I was eaten a roasted haddock, or a fresh herring at breakfast wi' him the morn, and meet my friend, Mr. Owen, whom, by that time, he would place at liberty."

toasted ale, his Scotch dried salmon, his Lochfine herrings, and even to the double damask table-cloth, with which Miss Smith served, as you may guess, save that of his deceased father the worthy Deacon Jarvis.

Having concluded our good-humoured host by those little attentions which are great to most men, I was free to turn to the man whom I had come to learn something which might be useful for my guidance, as well as for the satisfaction of my curiosity. We had not hitherto made the least allusion to the translation we were proceeding in, a circumstance which made my question sound somewhat abrupt, when, without any previous introduction of the subject, I took advantage of a pause when the history of the table was coming to an end, to ask Mr. Jarvis whether he had commenced, to inquire, "Pray, by the by, Mr. Jarvis, who may this Mr. Robert Campbell be whom we met with last night?"

The interrogatory seemed to strike the honest magistrate, to use the vulgar phrase, "all of a heap, and instead of answering, he returned the question.

"What's Mr. Robert Campbell?--ah, ah--What's Mr. Robert Campbell, quo' he?"

"Yes," said I, "I mean who is and what is he?"

"Why he's--ah--he's--ah--Where did ye meet with Mr. Robert Campbell, as ye ca unc him?"

"Last Saturday, to reply, "some months ago, in the north of England."

"Ou then, Mr. Oswald-Gee, said the Bailie doggishly, ye'll ken as muckle about him as I do."

"No, na," said Mr. Judge, "replied, "you are his relation it seems, and his friend."

"There is some causam-red between us, doubtless," said the Bailie reluctantly, "but we have seen little o' ilk other since Rob gave up the cattie-lie o' dealing, poor fellow! he was hardly guided by them might have used him better--and they ha made their plack a bawbee o' neither. There's many ane this day wil rather the lad now chase put Robin free the Cross o' Glasgow--there's many aye and rather see him again at the tail o' three hundred kyloes, than at the head o' thirty wait cattle."

"I'll go and see to me, Mr. Jarvis, of Mr. Campbell's rank, habits of life, and means of subsistence," I replied.

"Rank?" said Mr. Jarvis; "he's a Highland gentleman, nae doubt--better rank need nae be; and for habit, I judge he wears the Highland habit among the hills, though he has breaks on when he comes to Glasgow--and as for his subsistence, what needs we, the estate is so large as he makes nothing free us, ye ken. But I have nae time for clairing about him e'en now, because we mean look into your father's concerns wi' a speed."

"He is a man of extraordinary endowment, and sets down to examine Mr. Owen's states, which the other thought it most prudent to communicate to him without reserve. I know enough of business to be aware that nothing could be more acute and sagacious than the views which Mr. Jarvis entertained of the matters submitted to his examination, and, to do him justice, it was marked by much fairness and even liberality. He scratched his ear indeed repeatedly, on observing the balance which stood at the debit of Oswald-Gee and Trashed-off in account with himself personally.

"A man may be a dead loss," he observed; "and, conscience! what'er ane o' your Lordship's goldsmiths may say to it, it's a small aine in the South Market o' Glasgow. It will be a heavy deficit--a staff out of my pocket. I know. But what then? I trust the house wonna cump the crans for a' that's come and gone yet; and if it does, I'll never hear sae many a sae as think in the Gallow-gate--and I'll paint it for as long as the law will let me work by my mouny a fair pound sterling--Sae, an it come to the worst, I'll gae lay the head o' the saw to the tail o' the price."

"I warrant," said Mr. Jarvis, "I understand the proverbial arrangement with which Mr. Jarvis conducted himself, but I could easily see that he took a kind and friendly interest in the arrangement of my father's affairs."

Suggested several expedients, approved several plans, proposed by Owen, and, by his countenance and counsel, greatly shone the glories upon the brow of that illustrious man.

As I was an idle spectator on this occasion, and, perhaps, as I showed some inclination more than once to turn to the prohibited, and, apparently, the puzzling topics of our conversation, Mr. Jarvis dissembled me with little formality, with an advice to "gang up the gate to the college, where I had find some chills could speak Greek and Latin well; --at least they got plenty of knowledge and all the thin things, but, if you didn't do wrong and where I made a spell o' the worthy Mr. Zachary Boyles's translation of the Scripture--better poetry ned be to, as he had been taid by a man that kind, and auld hae kend, about such things."

But I observed this device of my blood and hospitable invitation, "to come back and take part of his family-clack, at my pleasure--there was a leg o' mutton, and, it might be, a top o' a suck, for they were in season," but, as a whole, I was to return at "aene o'clock precisely--it was the hour he and the deacon his father eyed din at--they put it all for mooting not for nobody."

CHAPTER XXV.

"I sat the Germain and men with his spend Fall in the rain, and hounds the hunteed hart;
And here am I in the rustling wood, and seen
His image in the flash of the benighted morn, and seen
And thinke--Here comes my mortal enemy,
And either he must fall in sight, or Pall more and Artis."

I took the route towards the college, as recommended by Mr. Jarvis, less with the intention of seeking for any object of interest or amusement, than to arrange my own ideas, and meditate on my future conduct. I wandered from one quadrangle of old-fashioned buildings to another, and from there to the College-yard, or walking-ground, where, pleased with the solitude of the place, most of the students being engaged in their classes, I took several turns, pondering on the waywardness of my own destiny, and could not, doubt, from the circumstances attending my first meeting with this person Campbell, that he was engaged in some strangely desperate courses; and the reluctance with which Mr. Jarvis alluded to the college, swelling, by the contemplation of the preceding night, tended to confirm these suspicions. Yet to this man Diana Vernon had not, it would seem, hesitated to address herself in my behalf; and I could not but consider it extraordinary and extraordinary it did that his fate was doomed to have influence over, and conjunct with my own. I resolved to bring Mr. Jarvis to close quarters on the first proper opportunity, and learn as much as was, as possible from the circumstances attending the mysterious person, in order that I might judge whether it was possible for me, without prejudice to my reputation, to hold that degree of further correspondence with him, to which he seemed to invite.

While I was musing on these subjects, my attention was attracted by three persons who appeared at the upper end of the walk through which I was sawing, seemingly engaged in very earnest conversation. That intuitional impression which announces to us the approach of whomever we love or hate with intense vehemence, long before a more indifferent eye can recognize it, flashed upon my mind the sure conviction that one of these three men was Rashleigh Oswald-Gee. To address him was my first impulse; my second was to watch him and until he was already among his companions before confronting him. The party was still at such distance, and engaged in such deep discourse that I had time to stand unobserved to the other side of a small path, which imperfectly screened the alley in which I was walking.

It was at this period the fashion of the young and gay to wear, in their morning walks, a scurf called often large and embroidered, but it was the trick of the time for gallants occasion..." ally to dispose it so as to muffle a part of the face.

The imitating this fashion, with the degree of shelter which I received from the hedge, enabled me to meet my father’s friends, and ask them to dinner, without my being perhaps as a passing stranger. I was not a little startled at recognizing in his companions that very small air which was the opening, and Mr. Alfric for the merchant, from whose stove and severe aspect I had recoiled on the preceding day.

A more ominous conjunction to my affairs, and that of my father, could scarce have been formed.

I remembered the merchant’s false accusation against me which he might be as easily induced to renew as he had been intimidated to withdraw; I recollected the manner in which Moriss and Mrs. Vittoria forced their way from the lady’s house, and I remembered the pretense of imprisonment of Mr. Vittoria’s arms, testified by the imprudence of Owen; and I had seen both the men combined with me, whose talents for mischief I deemed little inferior to those of the great author of all ill, and my abhorrence of whom almost amounted to dread.

When they had passed me for some paces, I turned and followed them unobserved. At the end of the way I found Mr. Alfric, Moriss and Vittoria entering the gardens, and Rashleigh returning alone through the walks. I was now determined to confront him, and demand reparations for the injuries he had done me. I must trace them all, nor must I be satisfied to be rendered remained to be known. This, however, I trusted to chance; with the cloak in which I was muffled, I passed through a gap of the hedge, and the garden was only half-shadored, and it was well with me that I was so; for Rashleigh’s sword was out and at my breast ere I could throw down my cloak, or get my way upon unshadored ground.

I followed him accordingly, keeping a strict eye on his motions, for I believed him capable of the very worst actions. We reached an open spot in a sort of wilderness left out in the Dutch taste, with clipped bushes, and flowers forming a charming and enchanting garden. In that spot, so that I only overtook, and quite alone, and not only my name, but also my arms, which I was about to ascertain.

"I had other views with respect to you, young man," was his answer; "less hazardous for you and more suitable to my present character and future education. But I see you will drag on yourself the personal chastisement your boisterous insolence so well merits. Follow me to a more remote spot, where we are less likely to be interrupted.

enemy, seizing with my left hand the hilt of his sword, and shortening my own with the purpose of running him through the body. Our death-grapple was so strong, so long, and so intense, that many thought we would kill each other, and, as it were, strangle strangers!—by the hand of my father, I will cleave to the breast the first man that mints another stroke!"

I looked up in astonishment. The speaker was no other than a tall, baleful, bespectacled man, with an expressive dark-brown sword drawn in his hand, which he made to whistle around his head as he spoke, as if for the purpose of enforcing his mediation. Rashleigh and I stood in silence, but this unexpected interlude proceeded quite uncharacteristically as follows: "Do you, Master Frances, oppose that ye will re-establish your father's credit by cutting your kinsman's thraldom, or getting your aim smacked in the face of the College-yards of Glasgow?—or do you, Mr. Rashleigh, think men will trust their lives and fortunes wi' ane, that, when in point of trust and in point of confidence wi' a great political interest, gains and losses hang like drunken gills?—Nay, rather wi' ane superstitious man—if ye're angry, ye ken how to turn the buckie o' your belt behind you.

"Ye presume on my present situation," replied Rashleigh, "or you would hardly dare to interfere where my honour is concerned.

"Hunt, tout, tout—Presume?—And what for shall I be presuming?—Ye may be the richer man, Mr. Osbaldistone, the more you want to be so, but I have as much reason to suppose that each of us, in the present day, may be the mair learned man, whilk I dispute not; but I reckon ye are neither a prittter man nor a better gentleman than myself—and it will be newson when I hear ye are as good. And sure too?—Muckle daring there's about it—I trow here I stand, that has flashed as het a haggis as ony o' the twa o' ye, and thought nae muckle o' my morning's work when it was wi' a blade o' steel o' the in the causeway, or this pickle gravel, that's little better, I have been waur mistystyed than if I were set to gie ye both yer sawing o'.

Rashleigh had by the time recovered his temper completely. "My kinsman," he said, "will acknowledge he forced this quarrel on me. It was none of my seeking. I am glad we are interrupted before I chance to make a speech worthy of the subject I have been hearing."

"Are ye hurt, lad?" inquired Campbell of me, with some appearance of interest.

"A very slight scratch," I answered, "which my kind of hand have thrown about that will not come between us."

"In truth, and that's true, Master Rashleigh," said Campbell, "for the could iron and your best blade would have been a match for me. I walked Mr. Frank's right hand. But never look like a saw playing upon a trunk for the love o' that, man—come and walk wi' me. I hae news to tell ye, and ye'll cool and come to yourself, like Mac-Gibbon's crowd, when he set it out at the window-box.

"Pardon me, sir," said I. "Your intentions have seemed friendly to me on more occasions than one; but I must not, and will not, quight of this person, until he yields up to me those means of doing justice to my father's engagements, of which he has treacherously possessed himself."

"Ye're daft, man," replied Rashleigh, "it will serve ye nothing to follow us eneow; ye has just seen o' me, ye bring tae your head, and might hide quiet?"

"Certainly," I replied, "if it be necessary."

I laid my hand on Rashleigh's collar, who made no resistance, but said, with a sort of scornful smile, "You turn him, MacGregor; he rushes on his fate—worse for the if the Infield. The warrants are by this time ready, and all is prepared."

The Scotchman was obviously embarrassed. He looked on the ground, and before, and behind him, and then coolly said: "The note is not a large one, being ill-guided, for standing up for the father that got him—and I'm God's man, and mine to a' sort o' magic, bailsie, sheriffs, sheriff-offishcars, constables, and sic-like black cattle, that has been the plagues o'puir and Scotland this hundred years—"it was a merry warld when every man had his ain gairden wi' his ain chicken, wi' his ain plough, and his ain manor side wasnae fashed wi' warrants and pavements and apprizings, and a' that cheety craft. And ances may I say it, my conscience winnae see this pur thongle. I am as lasse and old as thou art, and ye cannae tell me that I wad rather ye fell till's again, and fought it out the dour honest men."

"Yes, my conscience," reiterated Campbell or MacGregor, or whatever was his name; "I have seen a thing or two at home, and I am no sure that in a matter of this nature it may weel chance that I have the better o' ye. Ye are to our knowledge of each other—if ye ken w'eel am, ye ken what usage it was made me w'eel—ye ken what usage it was made me w'eel—and wherever ye may think, I would not quarrel with the proudest of the oppressors that be driven me to the heather-bush for a beast. What you are, Master Rashleigh, and what excuse ye can make for being the man you are, I can tell ye for the same day. And now, Master Frank, ye're my collar; for he says truly, that ye are in main danger from a magistrat than he is, and were your case a straight one, you wad find a way to pu' wrang—So lose his craig, as I said.

He seconded his words with an effort so noble and unexpected, that he freed Rashleigh from his hold, seated himself, notwithstanding his wounds, in his own chair, and immediately added: "You are the best, Mr. Rashleigh. Make ane pair o' legs and twa pair o' hands; ye have done that before now.

"You must thank this gentleman, kinsman," said Rashleigh, "if I leave any part of my debt to you unpaid; and if I quit you now, it is only in the hope we shall soon meet again without the possibility of interference.

He took up his sword, wiped it, sheathed it, and was lost among the bushes.

The Scotchman, partly by force, partly by resistance, prevented my following him; indeed, I was of opinion my doing so would be to his purpose.

"As I live by bread," said Campbell, when the one or two struggles in which he used much force to maintain his possession were over, "I am quite quiet. I never saw saw daft a callant! I was bain in the best man in the country the breath o' the back gin he had gien me sic a kempsing as a Müslin o' a' dune."

"Wad you think?—Wad you think?—Wad you think it was a hidden?—If I tell ye, man, he has the yuld trapper—He has got the collector creature Morris to bring a' the gaudy story again, and ye man look at the poor, I was thinking, for a moment, it was good for my health to come in the gaudy whiskamore bailie bodies. Now gang your way home like a gude larkin—look and let the jaw gin by—out o'ight o' Rashleigh, and, Morris, and the MacVitie anima—Mind the Clachan of Aberfoel, as I said before, and, by the word of a gentleman, I warrant ye were wranged. But keep a calm sough till we meet again—Mind the Clachan of Aberfoel, and before a' the others come out, for the neb o' him's never o' micht—Mind the Clachan of Aberfoel."

He turned upon his heel, and left me to ruminate on the singular events which had befallen me. My care was to adjust my dress and re-assume my old dispositions so as to conceal the blood which had run down my right side. I had scarcely secured this, when the classes of the College dispersed, and the gardens began to be filled with parties of students. I therefore left them as soon as possible, and in my way towards Mr. Jarvie's, where I thought to buy an hour's repose in the pretentious shop, the sign of which intimated that it dweller to be Christopher Nielson, surgeon and apothecary. I requested of a little boy who was selling some lollipops, where I might see an audience of this learned pharmacologist. I opened the door of the back-shop, where I found a lively old man, who showed his trust in the people of Johnstone.

As tame Guest from confidence will grow, Insult the graces of the vale below.

"What made ye so late?" said Mr. Jarvis, as I entered the dining-parlour of that honest gentleman; it was a large, commodious room, a a party of the family, as John, and Tom, and Mattie had been twice at the door with the dinner, and weel for you it was a tup's head, for that same suffer by delay. A sheep's head ower muckle nipped the head of the child, and I was needful to say—"he likit the lug o' ane head, honest man."

I made a suitable apology for my breach of punctuality, and was soon seated at table, where Mr. Jarvie presided with great kindliness and hospitality, compelling, however, Owen and myself to do rather more justice to the Scottish dainties with which his board was charged, than was quite agreeable to our southern taste. I escaped pretty well from having those sorts of society which enable one to elude this species of well-meant persecution. But it was ridiculous enough to see Owen, whose ideas of politeness are not unrivaled, excuses his host, who was willing, in all acts of lawful compliance, to evince his respect for the firm of the friends, eating, with guileful impiety, mouthful after mouthful of sauced owd, and pronouncing it excellent, in a tone in which disgust almost overpowered civility.

When the cloth was removed, Mr. Jarvis conversed with his own hands a very small bowl of jam-punch, the first which I had ever the fortune to see.

"The times," he assured us, "were from his own the farm yonder—a-wa, conducting the West Indies under the Union, and he had learned the art of composing the liquor from such a master as Capt. Coffin, who required it," he added in a whisper, "as must folk thought, among the Buccaneers, the Spaniards, and pirates; and all good ware has often come free a wick market. And as for Capt. Coffin, he was a scurvy man when I knew him, only he used to swear mildly—but he's dead, and he's not my account, and trust he's accepted—I trust he's accepted."

We found the liquor exceedingly palatable, and it led to a long conversation between Owen and our host on the opening which the Union had afforded to trade between Glasgow and the British colonies in America and the West Indies, and on the facilities which Glasgow possessed of making up portable carriages for that market. Mr. Jarvis answered some objections which Owen made on the difficulty of sorting a cargo for America, without buying from England, with vehement and volubility.

"As we are making fair stall at cottons and muslins—Na, na! let every gerring hizz by its ain head, and every sheep by its in shanks, and ye'll find, sir, us Glasgow folk no see far aint but what we may follow. This is but poor entertainment for you, Mr. Osbaldistone," (observing that I had been for some time silent), "but ye ken cadgery maun yer be speaking about cart-saddles."

I apologized for the inattention which the preoccupation of my own situation, and the singular adventures of the morning, as the causes of my abstraction and absence of mind. In this manner I gained what I sought—an opportunity of telling my story distinctly and without interruption. I only omitted mentioning the wound I had received, which I did not think worthy of notice. Mr. Jarvis listened with great attention and apparent interest, twanging his little gray eyes, taking snuff, and only interrupting me by brief interjections. When I came to the account of the recounter, at which Owen folded his hands and cast up his eyes to Heaven, the winsome lass was surprised. Mr. Jarvis broke in upon the narration with "Wrag now—clean wrang—to draw a sword on your kinsman is inhibited by the laws of God and man; and to draw a sword on the streets of a royal burgh, is punishable by fine and imprisonment—and the College-yards are nae better privileged—they should be a place of peace and quietness. I trust, the College did not put out its foot in these matters, rents, sorrow for the brood o' bishops and their rents too! nor yet a lease o' the Archbishopric o' Glasgow the soil o' th' that, they said let folk tuize in their yards, or the world will be.hackkered as they do, as they whiles do, that when Mattie and I go there, we are fain to make a baik and a bow, o' the risk o' our harms being knocked out—"it could be looked to." But coming to the duel itself.

On my mentioning the appearance of Mr. Campbell, Jarvie arose in great surprise, and paced the room, exclaiming, "Robin again!—Robert's mad—clean mad, and a man to be frightened out of his senses grace a' his kindred, and that will be seen and heard tell o'. My father the deacon wrought him first—hose—o'ay, I am thinking Deacon Threipland, the rape-spinner, who was with me, and he was with me as Ay, pur Robin is in a fair way o' being hanged—but come awa'—come awa'—let a hear the love o' th'."

I told the whole story as pointedly as I could, but Mr. Jarvis still found something lacking to make it clear, until I went back, though with considerable reluctance, on the whole story of Morris, and of my meeting with Campbell at the house of Justice Ingolds. Mr. Jarvis inclined a second ear to all this, and remained silent for some time after I had finished my narrative.

"Upon all these matters I am now to ask your advice, Mr. Jarvis," I said, "I have taken you through the best way to act for my father's advantage and my own honour."

"Ye're right, young man—ye're right," said the Bailie. "Aye, the bairns o' the Highland gentry are nudder and wiser than yourself, and binn like the godless Rehoomen, who took the advice o' a wheen beardless callants, neglecting the sad counsellors who had sate at the feet o' his father Solomon, and, as it was weel put by Mr. Meiklejohn, in his lecture on the chapter, were doubtless partakers of his sapience. But I maun hear naething about honour—we ken naething here but about credit. Honour is a homicide and a bloodspiller, that gangs about making frays in the street; but Credit is a decent honest man, that aye at home and makes the pat play.

"Assuredly, Mr. Jarvis," said our friend Owen, "credit is the sum total; and if we can but save that, at whatever discount."

"Ye are right, Mr. Owen—ye are right; ye speak well and wisely; and I trust bowls will row right, though they are awae aje e'naw. But touching Robin, I am of opinion he will benn this young man if it is in his power. He is a gude heart, pur Robin; and though I lost a matter o' twa hundred pundis wi' his former engagements, and nae murr-

* The boys in Scotland used formerly to make a sort of natumale in a snow storm, by pelting pedestrians with snow balls. But those groups of snow balls were usually rather more devastating, starting with a small quantity of a bath (cuck-sky) from a female, or a bow from a man. It was only the refractoriness who undertook the burden.

of the folk, and in his pocket o' the gills, and ragged as the beasts they drove. And both civil and just in his dealings, and if he

"I suppose he has rendered himself amenable to the laws of the country?"

"Amenable!—ye may say that; his owing wad ken the weight o' his holdings if they could get hand o' Rob, as wad the weight o' the grit folk; and I could sell ye o' the grit family that keeps him up as far as they decently can, to be a thorn in the side of another. And then he's ain auld-farran lang-haused chiefly as never took the trade o' -catin in our time; mony a daft reik he's played—mair than wad fill a boot, and a queer an it wad be—as good as Robin Hood, or William Wallace; a' fu' o' venturesome deeds and escapes, sic as folk tell ower at a winter-ingle in the daft days. It's a queer thing o' me, gentlemen, that am a man o' peace myself, and a peaceful man's son, for the decon my father quarterly he kept quive o' the town—Council—it's a queer thing, I say, but I think the Hieland blude o' me warmed at thae daft tales, and whiles I like better to hear them than a word o' profit, Gude forgive me!

But they are vanities—sinful vanities—and, moreover, again the statute law—again the statute and gospel law."

I now followed up my investigation, by inquiring what influence of influence this Mr. Robert Campbell could possibly possess over my affairs, or those of my father.

"Why, ye are to understand," said Mr. Jarvis, in a very affected tone—"I speak amiable friends, and under the rose—Ye are to understand, that the Hielands have been kept quiet since the year aught-and-thirteen—that was Kilkerrancie year. But how hean they kept quive, him the young Mr. O'Graham, by siller, Mr. O'Shaulstine. King William caused Bredalbane to distribute twenty thousand guineas punda, among them, and it's said the said Hieland Earl John, in his former day, and when Queen Anne, that's dead, gave the chief's bits o' pensions, as hard they had with each other to keep it in the Hieland, all the gentlemen and the gentlemen and the gentlemen and the gentlemen and the gentlemen and the gentlemen—But there's a new world come up wi' this King George, (say, God bless him, for ane)—there's neither like to be siller nor pensions gane among them; they cannae the means o' maintaining the clan that can't keep up; and I may give you free of what I said before; their credit's gane in the Lowlands; and a man that can whistle ye up a thousand or fifteen hundred linking lads to do his will, wad hae had o' his hands for the Cross in Glasgow. This canna stand long—there will be an outburst for the Stewarts—there will be an outburst—they will be downed on the Low country like a bowldie di'd in awfu' times o' Montrose, and that will be seen and heard o' e'er a twelvemonth gane round."

"Yet still," said I, "I do not see how this concerns Mr. Campbell, much less my father's affairs."

"Rob can levy five hundred men, sir, and therefore war auld concern him as muckle as mait folk," replied the Bailie; "for it is a faculty that is far less profitable in a time o' peace. Then, to tell ye the truth, I doubt he has been intermeddlin' wi' some o' our Hieland chiefs and the gentlemen in the north o' England. We a' heard o' the public money that was taken from the child Morris somewhere about the fit o' Cheviot by Rob and several o' the Osbalstine lads—ye, and to tell ye the truth, word gaited that it was yours and, Mr. Francis, and sorry was I that your father's son had seen to sic practices. Na, ye understood me, sir. I am in it wi' you, and I was mistaken; but I wad believe any thing o' a stage-player, whilk I concluded ye to be. But now, doubtless, it has been a rashness himself, or some other o' your cousins—there are a tarry wi' the stick—Rankbrothers and the Jacobites and paper and the government official and government paper and said prize. And I believe this is sic a cowardly affair, that ye could tell him this hour he durins says that Rob took the portman to see him; and trust hie's right, for your custom-house and excise cattle are all lik't on sides, and Rob might get a back-handed kick, before the Board, as they ca'n, could help him."

"I have long suspected this, Mr. Jarvis," said I, "and perfectly agree with you; but as to my father's affairs—"

"Suspected it?—it's certain—it's certain I be that saw some of the papers that went to Mr. Morris—it's needless to say where. But it was Mr. O'Graham's temple, ye think that in the two years by-gone, some o' the Hieland lairds and absentees have come to some sense of their interest, and their father and others have brought the woodlands, the dispossessed, Glen Kioshoch. Torber-rari granted large bills in payment, and as the chief's Shetland and Tresham was said—ye may foresee Mr. O'Dwyer's face as I house will have been at this bating misfortunes of the Lord's sending, news could be more honourable in business— the Hieland gentlemen, holders o' these bills, has found ends in Glasgow and Edinburgh—(I might amuse ye at your home, it's little the proudf'e Edinburgh folk do in real business)—for all, or the great part of the contents o' these bills. So that—aha!—" said I now more comfortably.

I confessed I could not quite follow his drift.

"Why," said he, "if these bills are not paid—Glasgow merchant comes on the Hieland laird, as a gentleman; what has he done? He has laid his hand on the rock, and the man has given up what is item a' spent—They will turn dispute—every hundred will rise that might have stood at home—the devil will gang ower Jock Webster's and some of the best estates will be almost in the break that's been sae lang biding us."

"You think then," said I, surprised at the superficial view of the case, "that Rashleigh Osbalstine is in a rising in the Highlands, by distressing the gentlemen to whom these bills were originally granted?"

"Doubtless—doubtless—it has been one man's son, Mr. O'Graham, or his father, or his cousin, or his cousin, or his cousin, having money he carried off wi' him might be another; that makes comparatively but a small part of your loss there, though it might make the matter of Rashleigh's direct gain. The assets he can lay his hands on of nae ma' use to him than if he were to the pipe wi' them. He tried if Mr. Victe and what gave him siller on them—that ten by ten by ten, as Mr. Tyne and Blythe. He did not get what he carried on the spot and left debt in his name, Na, na, he canna fit a paper here; folk will mock him how he carry it. Na, na, he'll have the stuff safe at some of his hands in the Highlands, and I can tell ye, Mr. Jarvis, that if any Rob could get at it gin he liked."

"But would he be disposed to serve us in this, Mr. Jarvis?" said I. "You have described him as an agent of the Jacobite party, and deeply connected with their intrigues; will he be disposed for my sake if you please, for the sake of justice, to make an offer of restitution, which, supposing it in his power, would, according to your view of the case, make a difference in his plans?"

"I cannae precisely speak to that—the gentleman among them are doubtful o' Rob, and he's done them—" and he's been well friend at the family, who stand for the present model of a gentleman. If he was freed o' his hangings and not there was neither on Argyle's side or that he was a friend at the Bredalbane family, and his name and name, truth is, that Rob is for his aim, as Henry fought, he'll take the side that suits him best."

"Two great clans fought out a quarrel with their sides; in presence of the king, on the North side of the room about the custom-house; a man was killed. The room was filled by a little body of citizens of Edinburgh. The room was said by the Auld party, as the young Cheyne, that is, the bandit chief, who was said to have fought a man of the side—sir, he fought on—no, for he fought on."

Henry Wynd, passed into a groan.
ROB ROY.

Rob is an outlaw, to himself be it said—there is no laws now about reft of intercommunicated persons, as there was in the ill times of the last Stewarts—I trov bae a Scotch tongue in my head—if they speak, I see answer.

It was with great pleasure that I saw the Bailie gradually surmount the barriers of caution, under the influence of public spirit and national interest in our affairs together with his natural wish to avoid loss and acquire gain, and not a little harmless vanity. Through the combined operation of these motives as he length arrived at the discovery resolution of taking the field in person, to aid in the recovery of my father's property. His whole information led me to believe, that if the papers were in possession of this House of Commons, it would be possible to induce him to surrender what he could not keep with any prospect of personal advantage; and I was conscious that the presence of his kinman was likely to have considerable weight with him. I therefore cheerfully acquiesced in Mr. Jarvis's proposal, that we should set out early next morning.

That honest gentleman was indeed as vivacious and alert in preparing to carry his purpose into execution, as he had been slow and cautious in forming it. He roared to Matteo to "air hit trout-cray, to have his jack-boots greased and set before the kitchen-fire all night, and to bring me his riding gear in order." Having agreed to meet him at five o'clock next morning, and having settled that Owen, whose presence could be of no use to us upon this expedition, should make our return to Edinburgh, we took a kind farewell of this unexpectedly zealous friend. I installed Owen in an apartment in my lodgings, contiguous to my own, and, giving orders to Andrew Fairweather, I went to the hotel.

It was in the bracing atmosphere of a harvest morning that I met by appointment Fairweather, with the horses, at the door of Mr. Jarvis's house. The first matter which caught my attention was, that whatever were the deficiencies of the pony which Mr. Fairweather's legal adviser, Clerk Thomson, had to boast, generous and magnanimous as he was, had contrived to part with it, and procure in its stead an animal with so much curiosity and complete a lameness, that it seemed only to make use of three legs for the purpose of progression, for the fourth appeared as if meant to be flourished in the air by way of accompaniment. "What do you mean by bringing such a creature as that here, sir? and where is the pony you rode to Glasgow upon?" were my very natural and inpatient inquiries.

"It's a grand bargain—cost but a pound sterling the foot—that's four a' thether. The string-halt will give all when its gan a mile; it's a week-old former; they call it Soulpe Tomato." "On my soul, sir," said I, "you will never rest till my saddle-jack and your shoulders become acquainted. If you do not go instantly and procure the other horse, I will take mine and leave you." Andrew, notwithstanding my threats, continued to battle the point, as he said it would cost him a guinea of me-bargain to the man who had bought his gay companion. He held a very bad way, said he, of the house, and my lord Vangenish, though wiser, was deceived by the rascal. I was about to pay his exaction rather than lose time, when forth saul Mr. Jarvis, cleaned, raiment, helmet, hooded, and booted, as if for a Scottish winter, while two apprentices, under the immediate direction of Mattie, led forth the decent ambling stock which had the honour on such occasions to support the person of the Glasgow magistrate. Ere he "close my mouth," an expression more decorous of the Bailie's mode of mounting than that of the knights-errant to whom Spencer applies it, he incurred the charge of the dispute between my servant and me. Having learned the real source of my misfortune, he instantly cut short all debate by pronouncing, that if Fairservice did not forthwith return the three-legged palmy, and produce the meat consecrated which he had promised, he would send him to prison, and amerce him in half his wages. "Mr. Obadiahstome," said he, "contracted for the service of both your horses and the two horses at another unreasonably rascal—but I see look well for you during this journey."

"It will be nonsense fixing me," said Andrew doubtfully, "that he should pay a fine to—"

"It will take the breaks all a Highlandman," replied the Bailie, "and I will look well to ye getting your money back the way was made, and a' the people said to the harrow, when every tooth gae her a toot."

Apparantly he found no difficulty in getting rid of Supple Tam, and recovering possession of his former Bubbling Folds, for he accomplished the exchange, and went being many minutes ahead; nor did I hear further of his having paid any smart-money for breach of bargain.

The town set forward, but had not reached the top of the street in which Mr. Jarvis dwelt, when a loud hailing, and breathless call of "Stop, stop!" was heard behind us. We stopped accordingly, and were overtaken by Mr. Jarvis's two lads, who bore two panniers which contained a copper measure. The first was conveyed in the form of a voluminous silk handkerchief, like the main-sail of one of his own West-Indian ships, which Mrs. Mattie particularly desired he should put about his neck, and which, thus entrusted, he added to his other inclusions. The second youngster brought only a verbal charge (I thought I saw the rogue disposed to laugh as he delivered it, and throw it away with every stride, thinking the master would take care of the waters. "Paw! paw! silly hussey," answered Mr. Jarvis; but added, turning to me, "it shows a keen heart though—"it shows a keen heart, and no man who sees a can't help loving him." So speaking, he piled the sides of his palmy, and we left the town without further interruption.

While we paced easily forward, by a road which conducted us out of the town, I had an opportunity to estimate and admire the good qualities of my new friend. Although, like my father, he considered commercial transactions the most important objects of human life, he was not wedded to them so as to undervalue more general knowledge. On the contrary, with much oblige and valour of manner—with a vanity which he made much more ridicules by disguising it now and then under a veil of humility, and devoid as he was of all the advantages of a learned education, Mr. Jarvis's conversation showed tokens of a shrewd, observing, liberal, and, to the extent of its opportunities, a well-improved mind. He was a good local antiquary, and entertained me, as we passed along, with an account of remarkable events which had formerly taken place in the town; the stories through which was passed. And as he was well acquainted with the ancient history of his district, he saw with the prospective eye of an enlightened person what held the advantage, which have only blossomed and ripened within these few years. I remarked also, and with great pleasure that, although a keen Scotchman, and to the extent his opportunities, a well-modelled mind. He was disposed to think liberally of the state's kinsman.

the ewe-milk cheese, dried salmon, and oaten bread, being all besides that the house afforded. Some very indifferent two-penny ale, and a glass of excellent brandy, crowned our repast; and as our horses had, in the meantime, discussed their corn, we resumed our journey with renovated vigour.

I had need of all the spirit a good dinner could give, to resist the dejection which crept insensibly on my spirits. I told myself that the suspense of my errand with the disconsolate aspect of the country through which it was leading me. Our road continued to be, if possible, more waste and wild than before, and in many respects was even worse. The few miserable hovels that showed some marks of human habitation, were now of still rarer occurrence; and at length, as we began to ascend an uninterrupted swell of moorland, they totally disappeared. This only exercise which my imagination received was, when some particular turn of the road gave us a partial view, to the left, of a large assemblage of dark-blue mountains stretching to the north and north-west, which promised to include within their recesses, a country as wild perhaps, but certainly duller; great ly in point of interest, from that which we now traversed. The evenness, the smoothness, the wildness and desolation, with toil and danger, similar to that which a sailor feels when he wishes for the risks and animation of a battle or a gale, in exchange for the inseparable monotony of a voyage, was a welcome change.

I next attempted to lead the discourse on the characters and history of the person whom we were going to visit; but on this topic Mr. Jarvis was totally in- sensitive. The conversation wandered through the banter of Mr. Andrew Fairrince, who chose to keep so close in our rear that his ears could not fail to catch every word which was spoken, while his tongue as usual maintained correspondence with his ears, as often as he saw an opportunity. For this he occasionally incurred Mr. Jarvis’s reproof.

"Keep back, sir, as best suits ye, said the Ballie, as Andrew pressed forward to catch the answer to some question I had asked about Campbell. "Ye wad sae ride the fore-horse, an ye wad wear—That child’s eye for being out of the cheese-fat he was poulished in. Now, as for your questions, Mr. Oswaldstane, now that child’s out of ear-shot, I’ll just tell ye it’s free to you to speak, and it’s free to me to answer: or no—Gude I canna say muicke o’ Rob, puir child, ye canna say o’ him, for, forbly, that’s my cuisin; we’re coming near his ain country, and there may be ane o his kithies a-mutterin’ every whin-bush for what I ken—And if ye’ll be guided by my advice, the less ye speak about him, or where we are gaun, or what we are gaun to do, we’ll be the mair likely to send us in our errand. For it’s like we may fa’ in some o his unfriends—there are e’en some o’ the lairds he was a talking to without a thought o’ his brow, for a’ that; but I doubt they’ll be upsid wi’ Rob the last—air day or late day, the fox’s hide finds the flaying knife.

"Well, sir," I replied, "be entirely guided by your experience."

"Right, Mr. Oswaldstane—right—but I maun keep this gabbling skypo too, for bairns and fules."
There's sma' sorrow at our parting, as the auld mear said to the broken cart.

"Never end, perseverance again rising to a point which threatened to occasion me inconvenience, I was under the necessity of explaining to him, that in case of his going to the front, I would not send him on any errand without further instructions. The argument ad crumenam, as it has been called by juridical logicians, has weight with the greater part of mankind, and Andrew was in that particular for a effecting any trick or trickery.

He "drew in his horns," to use the Bailey's phrase, on the instant, professed no intention whatever to disabuse, and a resolution to be guided by my copiously.

Concord being thus happily restored to our small party, we continued to pursue our journey. Thereroad, which had ascended for six or seven English miles, began now to descend for about the same space, through a country which, neither in fertility or interest, could boast any advantage over that which we had passed already, and which afforded no variety, unless with some tremendous peak of a Highland mountain appeared at a distance. We continued, however, to ride on without pause; and even when night fell and overshadowed the desolate whiles which we rode as wide as from Mr. Jarvie, still three miles and a bitcok distance from the place where we were to spend the night.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Born of Buck loin, May the fowl fledge ye, And a' pinters rive ye, For buildis nae art a town, Where there's nae house meat, nor man's meat, nor a chair to sit down Scotch Popular Song on a bad lass.

The night was pleasant, and the moon afforded us good light for our journey. Under her rays, the ground over which we passed assumed a more interesting appearance than during the broad day-light, which might be due to the extent of dullness, or the mind's light and shadows gave it an interest which: not; did not belong to it; and, like the effect of a vivid slung over a plain woman, irritated our curiosity on a subject which had in itself nothing gratifying.

The descent, however, still continued, turned, winded, left the more open heaths, and got into steeper ravines, which promised soon to lead us to the banks of some brook, which might afford us some refreshment. We found ourselves at length on the bank of a stream, which rather resembled one of my native English rivers than those I had hitherto seen in Scotland. It was narrow, deep, still, and silent; although the imperfect light, as it gleamed on its placid waters, showed also that we were now among the lofty mountains which formed its cradle. "That's the Firth," said the Bailey, with an air of reverence, which I have observed the Scotch usually pay to their distinguishing rivers. The Clyde, the Tweed, the Forth, the Spey, are usually named by those who dwell on their banks with a sort of respect and pride, and have known duties occasioned by any word of disparagement. I cannot say I have the least quartet with this sort of harmless enthusiasm. I received my friend's communication with the approbation which I seemed to think appertained to it. In fact I was not a little pleased, after so long and dull a journey, to approach a region which promised to engage the imagination. My faithful squaw, Anne, finding her kind words of the same opinion, for he received the solemn information, "That is the Firth," with a "Umph!"—and he had said that's the public house, it was had been more to the contrary.

The Firth, however, as far as the imperfect light permitted me to judge, seemed to merit the admiration of those who claimed an interest in its streams, or a sentiment of nature. There was a round shade, and closed with copsewood of hazels, mountains, and dwarf-oak, intermixed with a few magnificent old trees, which, rising above the underwood, arrayed their forked and bared branches to the silver moonlight, and to protect the sources from which the river springs. If I could trust the tale of my companion, I might even add that every word of it, he told under his breath, and with an air of something like intoxication, this hill, so regularly formed, so richly verdant, and garnished with such a beauty of thickets, a copsewood, was held by the neighbourhood to contain within its unseen caverns, the palaces of the fairies; a race of airy beings, who formed an inter mediate step in the chain of things, but not negatively malignant to humanity, were yet to be avoided and feared, on account of their capricious vindictive, and irritable disposition.

"The Firth," said Mr. Jarvie, in a whisper, "Daunie Schie, whil's signifies, as I understand men of peace, meaning thereby to make their guide-well. And we may e'en as weel ca' them to Mr. Orskaldised, for there's none gude in speaking of the laird within his sinews." But he added presently on, after seeing one or two lights which twinkled before us, "It's deceits of Satan, after s., and I fear the ghostly now, and yonder are the lights in the Clachan of Aberfoyle."

I own I was well pleased at the circumstance to which Mr. Jarvie referred; which was, as I understand, from Mr. Jarvie, still three miles and a bitcok distance from the place where we were to spend the night.

The lakes and precipices amidst which the Avon-Dee, or river Firth, of Abertay, are, are still, according to the model, haunted by the Elin people, the most, peculiar, but most pleasing, of the creations of Celtic superstition. The opinion entertained about these beings, are much the same as the notion of the Irish, so exquisite well narrated by Mr. Crofton Croker. An eminently beautiful little conical hill, near the eastern extremity of the valley of Aberfoyle, is supposed to be one of their peculiar haunts, and is the scene which awakens, in August Fairweeke, the terror of their power. It is remarkable, that two successive chieftains of the parish of Aberfoyle have enjoyed themselves in writing about this fairy superstition. The eldest of these was Robert Kirk, a man of some talents, who translated, and added notes to the Latin Historia naturale ministri at the neighbouring parish of Balquidder, and died at Aberfoyle in 1688, at the early age of forty-two.

He was the author of the Secret Commonwealth, which was written after his death, in 1691, an edition which I have never seen, and is said to have been written in Edinburgh. The story was concerning the fairy people, in whose existence Mr. Kirk appears to have been a devout believer. He describes them with the usual exaggeration and qualities credited to such beings in Highland tradition.

But what is sufficiently singular, the Rev. Robert Kirk, as author of the said treatise, is believed himself to have been taken away by the fairies, in revenge, perhaps, for having set much light upon the secrets of their commonwealth. We lose this catastrophe from the information of his successor, the late amiable and learned Mr. Patrick Graham, also minister at Aberfoyle, who, in his Sketches of Perthshire, has not forgot to touch upon the Deist Kirk, or men of peace.

The Rev. Robert Kirk was, it seems, walking upon a little Eminence to the west of the presents name, which is still held Linn Shie, Kirkstone, in what some have acquired to mortals a St., and was supposed to be dead. This, however, was not his fate."

"Mr. Kirk was the near relation of Graham of Duchay, the ancestor of the present General Graham writing. Shortly after his death, his remains were found in the district of down, to a medical relation of his own, and of Duchay. 'Ga' said he to him, 'to my cousin Duchay, and tell him that I am not dead. I fell down in a swoon, and was carried into Fair- land, where I was kept, in what state, until I assembled at the baptism of my child, and the have left his wife pregnant.' I will appear in the room, and that if he burned the knife and the knife's head in his hand, I will be released, and restored to human society.' The man, it seems, neglected these directions, and to deliver the knife to him, appeared to him a second time, threatening to haunt him night and day till he executed his commission, which at length he did. The time of the occurrence arrived. The table which bore the: figure of Mr. Kirk entered, but the Laird of Duchay, in some unconscious manner, neglected to observe it and the ceremony. Mr. Kirk retired by another door, and was soon: none more. It is best described by "Linn Shie, Kirkstone, in Perthshire."

Sketches of Perthshire, p. 94."
the Forde of Frew, at all times deep and difficult of passage, and often altogether unfavourable. Beneath these lourds there was no pass of general resort until such time as the bridge of Stirling; so that the river of Forth forms a defensible line between the Highlands and Lowlands of Scotland, from its source nearly to the Forth, or inlet of the ocean, in which it terminates. The better that then in which we busied me to recall with attention what the shrivelled of Bailie Jarvie suggested, in his proverbial expression, that “Forth bridges the wild Highlands of men.”

About half a mile’s riding, after we crossed the bridge, placed us at the door of the public-house where we were to pass the evening. It was a hovel rather than a tavern. The better that there in which we were dined; but its little windows were lighted up, voices were heard from within, and all intimated a prospect of food and shelter, to which we were by no means indifferent. Andrew was the first to observe that there was a peeped wogg-wand placed across the half-open door of the little inn. He hung back, and advised us not to enter. "For," said Andrew, “some of these clumps of chieftains laugh in there, and dinna be troubled; but the least we'll get, if we gang ram-stam in on them, will be a broken head, to learn us better having. I've a tatter, that I've entered through of a could dink in our wamo, whis is as likely.

I looked at the Bailie, who acknowledged, in a whisper, "that the gowk had some reason for singling us out.

Meantime a staring half-clad wench or two came out of the inn and the neighbouring cottages, on hearing the sound of our horses' feet. No one bade us welcome, yet we were soon within. The landlady, from which we had alighted; and to our various inquiries, the hopeless response of "Hiel Sassenach," was the only answer we could extract. The Bailie, having reconnoitred the figures of the two strangers, and having learned that they speak English. "If I gie ye a barbee," said he to an urchin of about ten years old, with a fragment of a tattered plaid about him, "will you understand Sassenach?"

"Ay, ay, that will I," replied the brat, in very decent English.

Then gang and tell your mamma, my man, there's two Sassenach gentlemen come to speak with her."

The landlady presently appeared, with a lighted piece of split fir blazing in her hand. The turpentine in the chimney (which is put out the turf—bog—makes it blaze and sparkle readily, so that it is often used in the Highlands in lieu of candles. On this occasion such a torch illuminated the whole of the room, the males, the females, and rather above the usual size, whose seated and ragged dress, though aided by a plaid or tartan screen, barely served the purposes of decency, and certainly not those of comfort. Her black hair, which escaped in uncombed elf-locks from under her coif, as well as the strange and embarrassed look with which she regarded us, gave me the idea of a witch disturbed in the midst of her unlawful rites. She plainly refused to admit us into the house. We remonstrated anxiously, and pleaded the length of our journey, the state of our horses, and the certainty that there was not another inn between the spot where we were and the Callander, which the Bailie stated to be seven Scots miles distant. How many times these may exactly amount to in English measurement, I have never been able to ascertain, but I think the double road may be pretty safely taken as a medium computation. The obdurate hostess treated our expostulation with contempt. "Better gang farther than fire war," she said, seating herself on a table and removed the sign indicating indeed a native of the Lennox district. —"Her house was taken up with them wadna like to be intruded on wi’ strangers."—She didn ken what mair might be in the sign, for we that day might be. (These last words she spoke under her breath, and with very strong emphasis.) "The night," she said, "was fair above head—a night among the heather and eels our blood—we might sleep in our class as mony a gude blade does in the scaberd—there wasna muckle flow-moss in the shaw, if we took up our quarters right, and we might pit up our horses to the hill, nae less than thae three or four that the Bailie and me bade au for takin up my abode supperless among these mountains of yours. I positively must enter; and make the best apology you can to your guests for adding a stranger or two to your number.—Andrew, you see the horses put up."

The Hecate looked at me with surprise, and then ejaculated, "A wilfie man will hae his way—thim that will to go tae them will be in luck. The Hiel Sassenach—belly-gods—he has a fit meal the day already, and he'll venture life and liberty rather than he'll want a lust suppie! Set roasted beef and pudding on the opposite side of the pit o' Tophet, and an Englishman will make a spang at it—but I wash my hands o'—Follow me, sir," (to Andrew) "and I'll show ye where to pit the beasts.

I own I was somewhat dismayed at my landlord’s expressions, which seemed to be ominous of some approaching danger. I did not, however, choose to shrink back after having declared my resolution, and accordingly went accordingly in. We were rather narrow escaping breaking my shins over a turf back and a salting tub, which stood on either side of the narrow external passage. I opened a crasty half-decayed door, constructed of plank and boards, which was followed by the Bailie, entered into the principal apartment of this Scottish caravansary.

The interior presented a view which seemed singularly far enough to have been intended for flying turf and branches of dried wood, blasted merely in the centre; but the smoke, having no means to escape but through a hole in the roof, eddied round the rafters of the room, and set the air in a heavy, moist stuff, of a height of about five feet from the floor. The space beneath was kept pretty clear, by innumerable currents of air which rushed towards the fire from the broken panel of basket-work which served as a door, from two square holes, designed as ostensible windows, through one of which was thrust a plaid, and through the other a tattered great-coat, and moreover, through various less distinguishable apertures, in the walls of the tenement, which, being built of round stones and turf, cemented by mud, let in the atmosphere at innumerable crevices.

At an old, smoky fire sat three men, guests apparently, whom it was impossible to regard with indifference. Two were in the Highland dress; the other, a little dark-complexioned man, with a white face, and a black beard, that had the same features, wore the tresses, or close pantaloons, wore out of a sort of chequered stocking stuff. The Bailie whispered me that he behaved to be a man of some consequence, for that he had dressed as a soldier, for his shoes were worn the tresses; they were ill to weave exactly to their Highland pleasure.

The other mountaineer was a very tall, strong man, with a quantity of red hair, freckled face, high cheek-bones, and long chin—a sort of caricature of the national features of Scotland. The tartan which he wore differed from that of his companion, as it was by no means much more prominent in the wool than the others. The crimson, black, and dark-green predominated in the other. The third, who sat at the same table, was in the Lowland dress,—a bold, stout-looking man, with a cast of military daring in his eye and manner, his riding-dress showily and profusely laced, and his cocked hat of formidable dimensions. His hanger and a pair of pistols lay on the table before him. Each of the above men, and the one that was stuck upright in the board beside him,—an emblem, I was afterwards informed, but surely a strange one, that their comportation was not to be interrupted by any brawl, or any marroch. He had one or two things about an English quart of unembated, a liqueur nexting as strong as brandy, which the Highlanders drank from malt, and drink undiluted in excesses; lies, was placed before these worthy.
glass, with a wooden foot, served as a drinking cup to the whole party, and circulated with a rapidity, which, added to the sprightly merriment of the hour, secured absolutely mirthful. These men spoke loud and eagerly together, sometimes in Gaelic, at other times in English. Another Highlander, draped in his plaid, reclined on the bough of a stunted fir, from which it was only separated by a wisp of straw, and seemed to sleep, without attending to what was going on around him. He also was propped by a stouter, as he lay in a forlorn and accepted with the sword and target, the usual arms of his countrymen when on a journey. Cribs there were of different dimensions beside the walls, formed of some framed boards, some of whiter interlaced攻克s, or plaited boughs, in which slumbered the family of the house, men, women, and children, their places of repose only concealed by the dusky wreaths of vapour which arose above, below, and round them.

Our entrance was made so quietly, and the encroachers I have described were so eagerly engaged in their discussions, that we escaped their notice for a minute or two. But the sight of the Highlander who let out the fire raise himself on his elbow as he entered, and, drawing his plaid over the lower part of his face, fix his look on us for a few seconds, after which he resumed his recumbent posture, and seemed actually striving to conceal the repose which our entrance had interrupted. We advanced to the fire, which was an agreeable spectacle after our late ride, during the chillness of an autumn afternoon, and the mountains, and at first attracted the attention of the guests who had preceded us, by calling for the landlord. She approached, looking doubtfully and timidly, now at us, now at the other party, and returned a hesitating and doubtful answer to our request to have something to eat.

"She didn't ken," she said, "she wassa sure there was anything in the house," and then modified her reception of the qualification, "—that is, anything fit for the like of us."

I assured her we were indifferent to the quality of our supper; and looking round for the means of accommodation, which were not easily to be found, I arranged an old hen-coop as a seat for Mr. Jarvis, and turned down a broken tub to serve for my own. Andrew Fairervke entered presently afterwards, and took up the place in silence behind our backs. The natives, as I may call them, continued staring at us with an air as if confounded by our assurance, and we, at least I myself, disguised as well as we could, under another name, and his half-shaven face, we might feel concerning the mode in which we were to be received by those whose privacy we had disturbed.

At length, the lesser Highlander, addressing himself to me, said, in very good English, and in a tone of great harshness, "Ye make yourself at home, sir. I see.

"I usually do so," I replied, "when I come into a house of public entertainment."

"And did she na see," said the taller man, "by the white wander at the door, that gentlemen had taken up the public-house on their own business?"

"I do not pretend to understand the customs of this country; but I am yet to learn," I replied, "how three persons should be entitled to exclude all other travellers from the only place of shelter and refreshment for miles round."

"There's nae reason for't, gentlemen," said the Balie; "we mean nae offence—but there's neither law nor reason for't—but as far as a stump of a guid brandy wad make up the quarrel, we, being peaceable folk, wad be willing."

"Darn your brandy, sir," said the Lowly, adding, with a nod, that carried wholly upon his head, "we desire neither your brandy nor your company, and up be rose from his seat. His companions also arose, muttering to each other, drawing up their plaid, and armfuls of the air being thrust in their manner of their countrymen when working themselves into a passion.

"If tauld ye what wad come, gentlemen," said the anldady, "an ye wad ha been tauld—get awa! wi' ye out o' my house, and make nae disturbance here—there's nae gentleman be disturbed at Jeanie MacAlpine's an' ye get out o' her lounns, gaun about the country under cloud o' night, and disturbing honest peaceable gentlemen that are drinking their dram drink at the fire-side!"

At another time I should have thought of the old Latin adage—

"Pat teumus corvis, resat censurae columbarum"—

But I had not any time for classical quotation, for there was obviously a fray about to ensue, at which I desired myself insignificantly at the inhospitable insolence with which I was treated, I was totally indifferent, and unless on the balance of our numbers and qualities were ill qualified for such an adventure, started up, however, on seeing the others rise, and dropped my cloak from my shoulders, that I might have a chance of it.

"We are three to three," said the lesser Highlander, glancing his eyes at our party; "if ye be pretty men, draw!" and, unheeding his broadsword, he advanced on me. I put myself in a posture of defence, and, aware of the superiority of my weapon, or small-sword, was little afraid of the issue of the contest. The Balie behaved with unexpected merriment. As he saw the gigantic Highlander confront him with a weapon whose portent was as lurid as the lilt of his shabbie, as he called it; but finding it both to quoth the sheath, to which it had long been secured by rust and dimse, he seized, as a substitute, on the red-handled trowel or hammer, and being employed in arranging the fire by way of a poker, and brandished it with such effect, that at the first pass he set the Highlander's plaid on fire, and compelled him to keep a respectful distance till he could get it extinguished. Andrew, on the contrary, who ought to have faced the Lowland champion, had, I guess to say it, vanished at the very commencement of the fray. But I suppose, cry 'Fair play!' seemed courteously disposed to take no share in the scuffle. Thus we commenced our remonstrances on fair terms as to numbers. My own aim was, in possession of my antagonist's weapon; but I was deferred from closing for fear of the dirk which he held in his left hand, and used in parrying the thrusts of my rifle. Meantime the Balie, notwithstanding the success of his first onset, was sorely bested. The weight of his weapon, the corpulence of his person, the very effeminacy of his own person, were rapidly exhausting both his strength and his agility, and his desperate and secret anxiety might feel concerning the mode in which we were to be received by those whose privacy we had disturbed.

At length, the lesser Highlander, addressing himself to me, said, in very good English, and in a tone of great harshness, "Ye make yourself at home, sir. I see.

"I usually do so," I replied, "when I come into a house of public entertainment."

"And did she na see," said the taller man, "by the white wand at the door, that gentlemen had taken up the public-house on their own business?"

"I do not pretend to understand the customs of this country; but I am yet to learn," I replied, "how three persons should be entitled to exclude all other travellers from the only place of shelter and refreshment for miles round."

"There's nae reason for't, gentlemen," said the Balie; "we mean nae offence—but there's neither law nor reason for't—but as far as a stump of a guid brandy wad make up the quarrel, we, being peaceable folk, wad be willing."

"Darn your brandy, sir," said the Lowly, adding, with a nod, that carried wholly upon his head, "we desire neither your brandy nor your company, and up be rose from his seat. His companions also arose, muttering to each other, drawing up their plaid, and armfuls of the air being thrust in their manner of their countrymen when working themselves into a passion.

"If tauld ye what wad come, gentlemen," said the anldady, "an ye wad ha been tauld—get awa! wi" sider men gave up their contest with as much inference as they had entered into it.

"And now," said the worthy gentleman who set us up, "let us drink and glee like honest felkins. Lamb in the mouth, and不知不觉 in the head.

"And in to pay my new plonnie paid," said the iver Highlanders.—I am no coward. It's a ded by a decent gentleman, and I am by a brave! I am to put a new red and black flag up the ner Highlanders, who ad now recovered his breath, and was at once dis-ross the bairn, and not to put up with and doubtful arbritement;—" Gin I hae

"Conscience!" replied the Baillie, "every man perished, the Baillie, immediately when the brawl as ended, yet not bairn I had recognized, in his ill features and shaggy red hair, our acquaintance-ought to me. The blood of the Baillie com-structed this observation in a whisper to the ner, who answered in the same tone:—"Weli, weel, save that ye ken o' said very right. There on the solemn mind that and the eye of feature Douglas; I mean see and think o' something ill do him some good.

Thus saying, he sat down, and fetching one or two breathe away, by way of recovering his breath, and ed to the landlady:—"I think, Luckie, now that I and that there's no hole in my wane, which I had muckle reason to doubt from the lound o' yon house, be the better o' something to pit intill!"

The dame, who was all officiousness as soon as had blown over, immediately undertook to produce something comfortable for our supper. Indeed, beating surprised me too, in the course of the whole atter, than the extreme calmness with which she nd her household seemed to regard the martial ult that had taken place. The good woman was ly heard to call to some of her assistants.

"Seek he door—seek the door!—Kill or be killed, let noody pass out till they have paid the lawin."

And as the slumberers in those bars by the wall, which earned their bread, were making the best use of their hiltless bodies to look at the fray, circulating, "Ooh! ooh!
" in the tone suitable to their respective sex and age, and were, I believe, fast asleep again, our ness of unknown origin, signifies a peace offering.

soon began to prepare for us; in the frying-pan, a savery nice of venison collops, which she dressed in a manner that might well satisfy hungry men, if not epicures. In the meantime the brandy was placed on the table. And at this juncture, which ever partial to their native strong waters, showed no objection, but much the contrary; and the Lowland gentleman, after the first cup had passed round, became desirous to know our profession, and the object of our journey.

"We are bits o' Glasgow bodies, if it please your honour," said the Baillie, with an affection of great amity, "travelling to Stirling to get in some ale that is awing us."

I was so silly as to feel a little disconcerted at the unassuming account which he chose to give of us; but I recollected my promise to be silent, and also the Baillie to manage the matter his own way. And really, when I recollected, Will, that I had not only brought the honest man a long journey from home, which even in itself had been some inconvenience, (if I were to judge from the obvious pain and reluctance with which he took his seat or arose from it,) I had also put him within a hair's breadth of the losse of his life, and would not refuse any compli-iment. The speaker of the other party, suffocating up his breath through his nose, repeated the words with a sort of sneer.—"You Glasgow tradesfolk have naething to do but to be west o' Scotland to the other, to plague honest folk that may chance to be awaet the\nhand, like me."

"If our debts were, a sic honest gentlemen as I believe to you, the Baillie would not be so inconsciente! we might save ourselves a labour, for they wad come to seek us."

"Ah! what a man I excogimated the person whom he had addressed, "as I shall live by bread, (not forgetting beef and brandy,) it's my auld friend Nicol Jarvie, the best man that ever counted down orns on a band till a distressed gentleman. Were ye na coming up muir? But then, ye na coming up the Endrick to Garschattachin?"

"Truth no, Maister Galbraith," replied the Baillie.

"I had other eggs on the spit—and I thought ye wad be saying I am to look about the annual rent that's due on the bit heritable band that's between us."

"Damn the annual rent!" said the third, with an appearance of great heartiness.—"Deil a word of business well—just speak, now that we're near my country. To see how a trot-cosey and a Joseph can disguise a man—that I seldom ken my auld friend the deacon,"

"The baillie, ye please," resumed my companion;

"but I ken what cars ye mistak—the band was granted to my father that's happy, and he was decason; but his name was Nicol as weel as mine. I amna lin a notion o' the sum or annual rent on it in my day, and doubtless that has made the mistake."

"Weel, the devil take the mistake and all that occasioned it," replied Mr. Galbraith. "But I am blind ye are a baillie. Gentleman, fill a brimmer—this is my excellent friend, Baillie Nicol Jarvie's health—
I kend him and his father these twa years. An I be a cleared kelly I?—Fill another! Here's to his being sure provost—I say provost—Lord Provost Nicol Jarvie—and them that affirms thee's a man walks the High-street o' Glasgow that's fertile for the office, they will do well not to let me, Duncan Galbraith of Garschattachin, hear them say such—that's all." And then with Duncan Galbraith mutually cocked his hat, and placed it on one side of his head with an air of defiance.

The brandy was probably the best recommendation of these complimentary teas to the two Highlanders, who drank them without appearing anxious to compress the story, and on the contrary, they conversation with Mr. Galbraith in Glencly, which he talked with perfect fluency, being, as I afterwards learned, a near neighbour to the Highlanders.

"I kend the deacon—" replied Mr. Galbraith, very outsly," said the Baillie, in a whisper to me.

o' paying his debts? it will be long or he does it in common form. But he's an honest lad—and has a warm heart too; he dons come often to the Cross o' Glares to buy for his children and he sends us some free for the hills. And I can want my siller well enough. My father the deacon had a great regard for the family of Garschattuck.

"Now I'm ready. I looked round for Andrew Fairservice; but that traitorous follower had not been seen by any one since the beginning of the rentale. The hostess, however, said that she believed he went into the stable, and offered to light me to the place, saying that "no entries of the horses or hers could make him give any answer; and that truly she caredna to gang into the stable before the poppins. She was a lone woman, and it was well kent how the Brownie of Run-y-gask guided the gudewife of Arndagowan; and it was aye judged there was a Brownie in our stable, which was just what gart'd me gae ower keeping an hostler."

"As, however, she lighted me towards the miserable hovel into which they had crammed our unlucky steeds, to regale themselves on hay, every fibre of which was as thick as an ordinary goose quill, she plainly showed me that she had another reason for not drawing me aside from the company than that which her words implied. 'Read that,' she said, slipping into my hand a small brown envelope at the door of the shed; 'I bless God I am rid o' it. Between sorrows and Saxoners, and caterers and cattle-lifters, and herpens and bluidesh, an honest woman wad live aye and gang away than on the highland line.'

So saying, she put the pine-torch into my hand, and returned into the house.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Poppinies, not lynes, the highland hills adorn, MacLeod's loud hoolie, and MacGunrew's horn.

I dropped in the entrance of the stable, if indeed a place be entitled to that name where horses were stowed away along with geese, poultry, pigs, and cows, under the same roof with the mansio-house; although, by a degree of refinement unknown to the rest of the hamlet, and which I afterwards heard was imputed to an override on the part of Jeannie Mac-Alpine, our landlady, the apartment was accommodated with an entrance different from that used by her biped customers. By the light of my torch, I deciphered the following billet, written on a wet, crumpled, and much-torn sheet:

'The glorious hands of Mr. P. O. a. Saxon young gentleman—These.' The contents were as follows:

'Sir,

'The are night-hawks abroad, so that I cannot give you and my respected kinsman, B. N. J., the meeting at the Clachan of Aberfeil, which was my purpose. I pray you to avoid unnecessary communication with those you may find there; as it may give future trouble. The person who gives youthis is faithful, and may be trusted, and will guide you to a place where, God willing, I may safely give you the meeting, when I trust my kinsman and you will visit my poor house, where, in despite of my enemies, I can still promise such cheer as an Hielanman may give his friends, and where we will drink a solemn leu, like D. V., and look on whilk I hope to be your aide in; and I rest, as wont among gentlemen, your servant to command, (This signed) R. M. C.'

I was a good deal mortified at the purport of this letter, which seemed to adjourn to a more distant place and date the service which I had hoped to receive from this man Campbell. Still, however, it was as well to go, rather than out of the way, and so that there be in my interest, since without him I could have no hope of recovering my father's papers. I resolved, therefore, to obey his instructions; and, observing all caution before the guests, to take up the opportunity I could find to procure from the landlady directions how I was to obtain a meeting with this mysterious person.

My next business was to seek out Andrew Fairservice, whom I called several times by name, without receiving any answer, surveying the stable all round, at the same time, not without risk of setting the premises on fire, and having no luck in his search for it, I turned to the earth and mud so greatly counterbalanced two or three bunches of straw and hay. At length my repeated cries of 'Andrew Fairservice—Andrew, Pooh!—Are you there?—Are you not a daleful 'Bluid?—Is it not a woe to hear thee scream so?'—to which he replied, 'I am an honest lad, sir.'—'Who the devil questions your honesty?' said I; 'or what have we to do with it at present? I desire you to come and attend us at supper.'

'Yes,' reiterated Andrew, without apparently understanding what I said to him. 'I am an honest lad, whatever the Bailee may say to the contrary. I grant the world and the world's good, but they are far from my heart while, as it does to mony a one—But I am an honest lad; and though I speak o' leaving ye in the murn, yet God knows it was far frae my purpose, but I had to beg for a wey; but the west could not get as to their sin side as they can—and I like your honour weel for see young a lad, and I wadna part wi' ye lightly.'

'What are you doing at the Driving on now?' I replied.

'Has not every thing been settled again and again to your satisfaction? And are you to talk of leaving me every hour, without either rhyme or reason?'

'Ay, but I was only making fashion before,' replied Andrew; 'but it's come on me in a sort earnest now—Lose or win, I daur gae one farther with your honour than with my foolish self; and by a broken treaty, rather than gang forward yourself. I have a sincere regard for ye, and I'm sure ye'll be a credit to your friends if ye live to see out your wild aits, and get some man sense and attendance; I can follow ye nae farther, even if ye sull found and lesser from the way for lack of guidance and counsel—to gang into Rob Roy's country is a mere tempiing of Providence.'

'Rob Roy?' said I, in some surprise; 'I know no such person. What new trick is this, Andrew?'

'It's hard,' said Andrew, 'very hard, that a man canna fash his ait, and must stand by the ha' just because he's whiles overcome, and tells lesa little when there is necessary occasion. Ye needna ask what Rob Roy is, the reiving lifter that he is—God forbid! I hope nobody will have a letter a' his, but he has a letter frae his in your pouch. I heard ane o' his gillies bid that auld rudas jaud o' a gudewife gae that. They thought they didn't understand their gibberish; but, though I canna speak it muckle, I can give a guide guess at what I hear them say—I never thought to hae tauld ye that, but in a fright a thing comes out that sull be keepit in. O, Minister Frank, a' your uncle's folios, and a' your cousin's planks were naething to this!—Drink clean cap-out, like Sir Hildebrand; begin the blessed morning with brandy soaps, like Squire Percy; swaggers, like Squire Thornecliff; routs, like Squiers John: gamble, like Richard; win souls to the Pope and the devil, like Rashleigh; rye, rant, break the Sabbath, and do the pope's bidding, like them a' put thegither—But, merciful Providence take care o' your young bluid, and gang nae near Rob Roy!'

Andrew's alarm was too sincere to permit me to suppose he counterfeit. I contented myself, however, with expressing a wish that he would be over the alchohole that night, and desired to have the horses well looked after. As to the rest, I charged him to observe the strictest silence upon the subject of his alarm, and that he could not incur any serious danger without due precaution. He followed me with a defeated air into the house, observing between his teeth, 'My beast—I haen't a morsel in my mouth, we haen't rough legs o' that auld muircooch, this hail blessed day.

The harmony of the company seemed to have suffered some interruption during my departure, for I found Mr. Galbraith and my friend the Bailie high in dispute.

"I'll see nac sic language," said Mr. Jarvis, as I entered, "the Duke o' Argyll and the name o' Campbell. He's a worthy public-spirited nobleman, and a credit to the country, and a friend and benefactor to the trade o' Glasgow."

"I'll see nac the Mackallum More and the Sloch-nan-Diarmid," said the lesser Highlander, laughing. "I live on the wrong side of Glencoe to quarrel with Inverara."

"Our loch is far from the Cawmil lymphads,"* said the bigger Highlander. "She'll speak her mind and fear naebody—She doesna value a Cawmil mair as a Cowan, and ye may tell Mackallum More that Allan MacAllan, ye see—It's a far cry to Lochow."

Mr. Galbraith, on whom the repeated pledges which he had quaffed had produced some influence, slapped his hand on the table with great force, and said, "I'll see nac sic things as a stuck-up bairn, and I'll see nac that family, and they'll pay it one day—The banes of a loyal and a gallant Grahame has lang rattled in their coffin for vengeance on thee Duke of Guile and all his Money in Scotland but a Cawmil was at the bottom o'it; and now that the wrong side's uppermost, wha but the Cawmills for keeping down the right? But this will be no use, ye bairn, ye'll just have to sharpen the maiden's for shearing o' crags and thraipsies. I hope to see the auld rustie laas linking at a bluidy harrest again.

"Aye, and Garechattachin!* exclaimed the Bailie; "fy, for shame, sir; wad ye see sic things before a magistrat, and bring yourself into trouble?—How d'ye think to maintain your family and satisfy your creditors, with a husband on the run and a mess o' this wild way, which cannot but bring you under the law, to the prejudice of a' that's connected wi' ye?"

"D—n my creditors," retorted the gallant Galbraith, "and you, if ye were an o' them. I say there will be a new world wum—And we shall hae Cawmills cocking their bonnet sae his, and hounding their dogs whe they daurna come thairself, nor protecting thieves, nor murdurers, and oppressors, to harry and spoil better men and marry their clansmen that themselves.

The Bailie had a great mind to continue the discourse, but we were carried away by the wisp o' a venison, which was already ready to eat, and we lost our place before we proved so powerful a medulla, that he betook himself to his trencher with great eagerness, leaving the strangers to go on among the venison.

"And tat's true," said the taller Highlander, whose name I found was Stewart, "for we suldna be plagued and worried here wi' meetings to sit down Rob Roy, if the Cawmil dinna gie him rest. I was ano' thurry o' my ain name—part Glenfinlas, and part man that came down frae Appine. We shossed the Macgregors as ye wad shose rac-deer, till we came into Glenfinlas's country, and the Cawmills raise and wad let us pursue our fencing, and we lost our labour; but her wad gie twae and a plack to be as near Rob as she was tat day.

It seemed to happen very unfortunately, that in every branch of the navy both these warlike gentle- men introduced, my friend the Bailie found some matter of offence. "Ye'll forge me speaking my mind, sir; but ye wad maybe hae gien the best bowl o your bonnet to hae been as far a'ssa frae Rob ye are e'en now—Oid, my het plough-cutter had been naething to his claymore.

Sloie had better speak nae mair about her culter, or, had she dared, I would have cut her words, and twae hands o' could steel to drive them o'er wi'!

with a most unsuspicious and menacing look, the mountaineer laid his hand on his dagger.

"We'll hae nae quarrelling, Allan," said his shorter companion, "and if the Glasgow gentleman has any regard for Rob Roy, he'll maybe see him in cauld irons the night, and playing tricks on a tow the morn; for this country has been ower lang plagued wi' him, and his race o' hand-runners. And it's time, Allan, we were ganging to our lads."

"Hout awa, Inverashallloch," said Galbraith.—"Mind the auld saw, man—it's a bauld moon, quoth Bennygrask—'another print, quoth Lesley—we'll no start for another chappin."

"I hae had chappings enough," said Inverashallloch; "I'll drink my quart of usquebaugh or brandy w' ony honest fellow. An I canna del a drop maik, when I hae wark to do in the morning. And, in my pair think- ing, Garechattachin, ye had better be thinking to bring up your horsemen to the Clichan before day, that we may a' start fair."

"What the deevil are ye in sic a hurry for?" said Garechattachin; "meat and maeve never hindered wark. An it had been my directing, del a bit o' me was had, but a strong old man had to help us. The garrison and our ain horse could hae taken Rob Roy easily enough. There's the hand," he said, holding up his own, "should lay him on the green, and never a gill o' brandy or usquebaugh."

"Ye might hae loot us bide still where we were, then," said Inverashallloch. "I didna come sixty miles without being sent for. But an ye'll have my opinion, I rekit ye keest o' your ain time and paid for it by speed. Shored folk live lang, and sae may hie yu ken o'. The way to catch a bird is no to fling your banner at her. And also these gentlemen have heard some things they hae heard, and the brandy hadna been ower bauld for your brain, Major Gal- brath. Ye needna cock your hat and bully w' me, man, for I will not bear it.

"I hae said," said Galbraith, with a solemn air of drunken gravity, "that I will quarrel no more this night either with broadcloth or tartan. When I am off duty, I'll quarrel with you or ony man in the High- lands or Lowlands, but not on duty—no.—I wish we heard o' these red-coats. If it had been to do any thing against King James, we wad hae seen them lang sync—but when it's to keep the peace o' the country, they can lie as loud as their neighbours."

As he spoke we heard the measured footsteps of a body of infantry on the march; and an officer, followed by two or three files of soldiers, entered the apartment. He spoke in an English accent, and was very pleasant in his manner, and was if you please, the varying brogue of the Highland and Low- land Scottich.

"You are the supos, Major Galbraith, of the equa- dron of Lennox Militia, and these are the two Highland gentlemen with whom I was appointed to meet in this place?"

They assented, and invited the officer to take some refreshments, which he declined.

"I have been too late, gentlemen, and am desirous to make up time. I have orders for search for and arrest two persons guilty of treasonable practices."

"We'll wad wi' our hands o' that," said Inver- ashallloch. "I came here wi' my men to fight against the red MacGregor that killed my cousin seven times removed, Dunbar Mac Laren in Inverness; and I will hae nothing to do with touching a Gentlem- man that may be gau through the country on their ain business."

"Nor aither," said Iverach.

Major Galbraith took up the matter more solemnly, and, première his oration with a hiccup, spoke to the following purpose:

"I shall say nothing against King George, Captain, because, as I have for my connection unskin in his name—but one commission being good, sir, does not make another bad; and some think that James may be just as good a name as George. There's the raw.

* This, as appears from the introductory matter to this Tale, is an anacronym. The whole title of the MacGregors, after the chief of Appine, by the MacGregors, did not take place till after Rob Roy's death, since it happened in 1746.
that is—and there's the king that said of right be—I say, an honest man may and shall be loyal to them both, Captain. But I am of the Lord Lieutenant's opinion for the time, as it becomes a militia officer and a deputy—lieutenant, and about treason and all the rest that comes to speak of it—last said is almost mended."

"I am sorry to see how you have been employing your time, sir," replied the English officer, as indeed the honest gentleman's reasoning had a strong relics of the liquor he had been drinking, "and I could wish, sir, it had been otherwise on an occasion of this consequence. I would recommend to you to try to think a little more wisely. Do these gentlemen belong to your party?"—looking at the Bailie and me, who, engaged in eating our supper, had paid little attention to the officer on his entrance.

"Travelers, sir," said Galbraith—"lawful travelers by sea and land, as the prayer-book hath it."

"My instructions," said the Captain, taking a light to survey us closer, "are to place under arrest an elderly and a young person, and I think these gentlemen answer nearly the description."

"Take care what you say, sir," said Mr. Jarvis; "it shall not be your red coat nor your face that shall prevent either the continuance of your convene ye baith in an action of scandal and false imprison—"I am a free burgess and a magistrate o' Glasgow; Nicol Jarvis is my name, see was my father's as well as a faithful servant for the honour, and my father was a deacon."

"He was a prick-eared cur," said Major Galbraith, "and fought agane the King at Bothwell Brigs."

He said what he ought and what he thought, Mr. Galbraith, said the Bailie, "and was a honest man than over stude on your shanks."

"I have no time to attend to all this," said the officer, "and I positively demand you, gentlemen, unless you can produce some respectable security that you are loyal subjects.

"I desire to be carried before some civil magistrate," I said, the sheriff or the judge of the bounds—I am not obliged to answer every red-coat that speers questions at me."

"Well, sir, I shall know how to manage you if you are silent. And you, sir, (to me) "what may your name be?"

"Francis Obaldiston, sir."

"What, a son of Sir Hildebrand Obaldiston, of Northburgh?"

"No, sir," interrupted the Bailie: "a son of the great William Obaldiston, of the House of Obaldiston and Treham, Crano-Alley, London."

"I am afraid," said the officer, "your name only increases the suspicions against you, and lays me under the necessity of requesting that you will give up what papers you have in charge."

I remained looking anxiously at each other when this proposal was made. "I had none," I replied, "to surrender."

The officer commanded me to be disarmed and searched. To have resisted would have been madness. I accordingly gave up my arms, and submitted to a search, which was conducted as civilly as an operation of the kind well could. They found nothing except the note which I had received that night through the hand of the landlady.

"This is different from what I expected," said the officer, "but it affords us good grounds for detaining you. Here I find you written communication with the outlawed robber, Robert MacGregor Campbell, who has been so long the plague of this district—How do you account for that?"

"Spies of Rob. and Invershalloch—"we wad serve them right to strap them up till the nest true."

"We are soon to see after some gear o' our ain, gentlemen," said the Bailie, "that's a'en to his hands by accident. There's no law again a man looking after his ain, I believe."

"How did you come by this letter?" said the offi-cr, addressing himself to me.

"I could not think of betraying the poor woman who helped me, and runnd me, and remained silent."

"Do not know any thing of it, fellow?" said the Bailie.

"O, ye ken a' about it—It was a Hieland loosed the letter to that lang-tongued jadie the godslaves here—'t'll be my master that printed it. But he's wir's to gang up the hills and speak wi' Rob; and O, sir, it wad be a charity just to send a weenie o' your red-coats to see him safe back to Glasgow again whether he's for or no. And ye can keep Mr. Jarvis as long as ye like—He's responsible enough for any fine ye may lay on him—and so's my master for that matter—for me, I'm just a poor gard-dner lad, and no worth your streeke."

"I believe," said the officer, "the best thing I can do is to send these persons to the garrison under escort. They seem to be in immediate correspondence with the enemy, and I shall be in no respect answerable for suffering them to be at liberty. Gentlemen, you will consider yourselves as my prisoners. So soon as dawn approaches I will send you to a place of security. If you be the persons you describe yourselves, it will soon appear, and you will sustain no great inconvenience from being detained a day or two. I can hear no remonstrances," he added, and without further address continued to speak to the Bailie, whose mouth was open to address him, "the service I am on gives me no time for idle discussions."

"Aweel—aweel, sir," said the Bailie, "you're welcome to a' that—A weel is your ain fault, but see if I dinna gae ye dance till a' dune."

An anxious consultation now took place between the officer and the Highlanders, but carried on in so low a tone that it was impossible to catch the sense. So soon as it was concluded they all left the house. At their departure, the Bailie thus expressed himself:

"These Hielandmen are o' the westland clans, and just as light and active as they are hardy, but I would be true, and yet ye see they line brought them frae the head o' Argyleshire to make war wi' pur Rob for some auld ill—will that they has at him and his stachie—this is an ill time for the Grahames, and the Be-chans, and the Lennox gauty, s mounted and is in order.—It's weel kent their quarrel—and I dinna blame them—nobody likes to lose his kye—and then there's sodgers, pur things, hoyed out frae the garrison at a' body's bidding—Puir Rob will hae his hands fu' by the time the sun comes over the hill. Well—it's wrang for a magistrate to be wishing anything against the house o' justice, but I deel o' me still had break my heart to hear that Rob had gien them a' their pails."

CHAPTER XXX.

We were permitted to slumber out the remainder of the night in the best manner that the miserable accommodations of the alchoose permitted. The Bailie, fatigued with his journey and the subsequent scenes, less interested also in the excitement which to him could only be a matter of temporary inconvenience, perhaps less nice than habit had re-} dered me about the cleanliness or decency of his couch, tumbled himself into one of the cribs which I have already described, and soon was heard to snore soundly. A broken sleep, enlaced by intervals, while I rested my head upon the table, was my only refreshment. In the course of the night I had oc-cassion to observe, that there seemed to be some doubt and hesitation in the motions of the soldiery. Men were sent out as if to obtain intelligence, and returned apparently without having any inflammatory information to their commanding officer. He was ob-

}ously energer and anxious, and again dispatched small parties of two or three men, some of whom as I could understand, from the express orders trans-

}pected to each officer, did not return again as de-

{chap. xxx.
The morning had broken, when a corporal and two men rushed into the hut dragging after them, in a sort of triumph, a Highlander, whom I immediately recognized as the excruciatingly grim-looking Bagpipe Buillie, who started up at the noise with which they entered, immediately made the same discovery, and exclaimed: "Merceon ut! They have gripped the pair and are carrying them off in bail—solemn bail, for that Dougal creature.

To this offer, dictated undoubtedly by a grateful recollection of the late interference of the Highlander in the personal affairs of the family, I replied respectfully urging Mr. Jarvie to "mind his own affairs, and remember that he was himself for the present a prisoner."

"I take you to witness, Mr. Oabaldistone," said the Buillie, who was probably better acquainted with the proceedings of the civil than that he has refused sufficient bail. It is my opinion that the creature Dougal will have a good action of wrongful imprisonment and damages against him under the Act seventy-one hundred and one, and I'll see the creature righted.

The officer, whose name I understood was Thornton, paying no attention to the Buillie's threats or exulting in the triumphal entry into the Dougal's life and conversation, and compelled him to admit, though with apparent reluctance, the success of facts—that he knew Mr. Boyd and the Buillie was present, and that within these six months—within this month—within this week; in fine, that he had parted from him only an hour ago. All this detail came like drops of blood fall upon the heart, and in a short time, only urged by the threat of a halter, and the next term, which Captain Thornton assured him should be his doom, if he did not give direct and special information.

"And now, my friend," said the officer, "you will please inform me how many men your master has with him at present."

I looked in every direction except at the aerist, and began to answer, "She can't just be sure about that."

"Look at me, you Highland dog," said the officer, "and remember your life depends on your answer. How many rogues had that outlawed scoundrel with him when you left him?"

"Oh, no aboon six rogues when I was gane."

"And they are the rest of his banditti?"

"Gane wi' the Lieutenant—He's a smart carle."

"Against the westland clans?" said the Captain, "Umph—that is likely enough; and what rogue's end were you dispatched upon?"

"Get you to what white troops and the gentlemen red-coats were doing down here in Clachan?"

"The creature will prove false-hearted after all," said the Buillie, who by this time had planted himself close to me, and said, "It's lucky I didn't pit myself to expenses on him."

"And now, my friend," said the Captain, "let us understand each other. You have confessed yourself a spy, and should string up to the next tree—but come, if you will do me one good turn, I will do you another. You, Donald—you shall just in the way of kindness carry me and a small party to the place where you have been to speak a few words with him on serious affairs; and I'll let you go about your business, and give you five guineas to boot."

"Oigh! Is that?" exclaimed Dougal, in the extremity of distress and perplexity. "She canna do tae—she canna do tae—that she'll rather be hanged!"

"Hanged, then, shall you, my friend," said the officer, "and sworn to be resuming upon your own head. Corporal Cramp, do you play Provost-Marshal—away with him!"

The corporal had confronted poor Dougal for some time, and then, after flouring a piece of cord which he had found in the handle of the bagpipe, and taking the form of a bundle, he now threw it about the culprit's neck, and, with the assistance of two soldiers, had dragged Dougal as fast as they could carry him. In this bargain, with the terror of immediate death, he exclaimed, "Shentlemen, it's no wits! She'll do his honour's bidding—stages!"

"Awa wi' the creature!" said the Buillie, "he deserves hanging now more than ever—awa wi' him, corporal—why dinna ye tak him awa?"

"It's my belief and opinion, as the Captain himself told me, said the corporal, "that if we were going to be hanged yourself, you would be in no such d—d hurry."

This by-dialogue prevented my hearing what passed between the Buillie and Corporal Cramp in bail—sufficient bail, for that Dougal creature.

The soldiers bustled about, and were ready to move. We were led out, along with Dougal, in the capacity of prisoners. As we left the hut, I heard our companion in captivity remind the Captain of "te have kineers."

"Here they are for you," said the officer, putting gold into his hand; "but observe, that if you attempt to meddle with it, I will blow your brains out with your own hand."

"The creature," said the Buillie, "is warier than I wished it—warier that it is a wily and a perfidious creature; I pecked into the sly fellow's head and fished out the fish."

The landlady now approached, and demanded payment of her Eckton, including all that was given to the Major by Major Galbraith and his Highland friends. The English officer remonstrated, but Mrs. MacAlpine declared, if she "limah trusted to his honour's name being in his own company, she never would have drawn him a stoup o' liquor; for Mr. Galbraith she might see him again, or she might no, but what did she want she had sma' chance of seeing her siller again—and she would ne'er widow, had nothing but her custom to rely on."

Captain Thornton put a stop to her remonstrances by paying the charge, which was only a few English shillings, though the amount sounded very formidable in Scottish denominations. The generous officer would have included Mr. Jarvie and me in this general acquittance; but the Buillie, disregarding an intimation from the landlady, to "make as if you're the English officers," and offered to give us plague enough, went into a formal accounting respecting our share of the reckoning, and paid it accordingly. The Captain took the opportunity of leaving us some slip of his for details in our accounts. "If we were loyal and peaceable subjects," he said, "we would not regret being stopped for a day, when it was essential to the king's service; if otherwise, he was acting according to the laws of the country."

We were compelled to accept an apology which would have served no purpose to refuse, and we saluted out to attend him on his march. I shall never forget the delightful sensation with which I exchanged the dark, smoky, smothering atmosphere of the Highland hut, in which we had passed the night so uncomfortably, for the refreshing fragrance of the morning air, and the glorious beauty of the rising sun, which, from a tabernacle of purple and golden clouds, were darted full on such a scene of natural romance and beauty as had never before greeted my eyes. To the left lay the valley, down which the Forth wandered on its easterly course, surrounding the beautiful detached hill, with all its garland of woods. On the right, amid a profusion of thistles, knolls, and cresses, lay the bed of a broad mountain lake, lightly curled into tiny waves by the breath of the morning breeze, each glittering in the course of the sunbeams. High hills, rocks, and banks, waving were the遗迹 of this enchanting sheet of water; and, as their leaves rustled to the wind and twinkled in the sun, gave to the depths of the valley a solitude a sort of life and vivacity, to be placed in a state of insensibility, in a scene where all the ordinary features of nature were raised and exahed. The miserable little bourocks, as the Baillie termed them, of which about a dozen formed the vil-lege called the Claschan of Aberfoill, were composed of a few cottages, and a large clump of turfs, and thatched by turfs, laid rudely upon rafters formed of native and unhewn birches and oaks from the woods around. The roofs approached the ground so nearly that a much improved at observed we might have ridden over the village the night before, and never found out we were near it, unless our horses' feet had "gone through the riggin."

From all we could see, Mrs. Macalpine's house, miserable as were the quarters it afforded, was still yet the best in the hamlet; and I dare say (if my description gives you any curiosity to see it) you will hardly find a more unpleasant and frequent spot in all the present day. For the Scotch are not a people who generally admit innovation, even when it comes in the shape of improvement.

The inhabitants of these miserable dwellings were disturbed by the noise of our departure; and as our party of about twenty soldiers drew up in rank before marching off, we were reconnoitred by many a bal-dian from the half-opened door of their cottage.
As these sybils thrust forth their grey heads, imperfectly covered with close caps of flannel, and showed their shriveled brows, and long skinny arms, with various gestures and half-proposed questions in Gaelic addressed to each other, my imagination recurred to the witches of Macbeth, and I imagined I read in the features of these crones the malvolence of the word side. I am not such a witch as to begin with forth some, quite naked, and others very imperfectly covered with tatters of tartan stuff, clapped their tiny hands, and grinned at the English soldiers, with an expression of national hate and malignity, which seemed beyond their years. I remarked particularly that there were no men, nor so much as a boy of ten or twelve years old, to be seen among the inhabitants of such a spot. I mention this to bear proportion to its extent; and the idea certainly occurred to me, that we were likely to receive from them, in the course of our journey, more effectual tokens of ill-will than those which lowered on the villages, and dictated the murmurs, of the women and children.

It was not until we commenced our march that the malignity of the elder persons of the community broke forth into expressions. The last file of men had left the village, to pursue a small broken track, formed by the sleeves in which the natives transported their tents and turfs, and which led through the woods. The colspan was passed by the lake, where a shrilly sound of female exclamation broke forth, mixed with the screams of children, the howling of boys, and the clapping of hands with which the Highlanders in many parts of the island, express their joy, wonder, or satisfaction. I asked Andrew, who looked as pale as death, what all this meant.

"I doubt we'll ken that ither smin," said he.

"Means?—It means that the Highlanders are cursing and banning the red-coats, and wishing ill-luck to them, and ilka that ever spoke the Saxon tongue. I have heard wives flye in England and Scotland—it's nae marvel to hear them flye oot gae

I do not know how this might stand in Mr. Obadiahstone's day, but I can assure the reader, whose curiosity may lead him to a perusal of these remarkable adventures, that the Clus-ian of Aberfoill now affords a very comfortable little inn.
If he were not a little too far from the sea, he might be recommended to him, that he will find himself in the vicinity of Mr. Dr. Patrick Graeme, minister of the gospel at Aberfoill, whose knowledge and information, on the subject of national antiquities, is scarce exceeded even by the stoutest fellow in the island, who is much more able. Dr. Graeme is also a relation of the Adding Andrew's information to what I had read observed from the trains of fire, through marshy meadow ground, overgrown with copsewood, now traversing dark and close thake that would have admitted an ambush or sheltered within a few yards of our line of attack, and frequently, for a few minutes, the noise of some of which took the soldiers up to the knees, ran with such violence, that their force could only be strengthened by the strength of two or three men fast by each other's arms. It certainly spread me, though altogether unacquainted with minor affairs, that a sort of half-savage warfare, as I had heard the Highlanders asserted to be, might not pass as these, attack a party of regular

"Make yourself easy, sir," replied Captain Tar-you say you are a friend to King George, you will glad to learn, that it is impossible that this great raffuss, whose licence has disturbed the quiet of press them. The horse squadron of militia, commanded by Major Galbraith, is already joined by two or three regiments of infantry, under the two gentlemen you saw at the inn, in possession of the upper part, and various seaparties from the coast, that are prophesied, that, finding himself surrounded on all sides, he had dismissed the greater part of his forces with the purpose either of lying concealed, or making his escape through his superior knowledge of the passes.

Appropriately enough, it seems like a would-be-thrown away on Captain Thornton. He refers his line of march, commanded his soldiers to use the best means to fix their bayonets, and form an advanced and secure position, on the commissioned officer and two soldiers, who were strict orders to keep an alert lookout. Dugald sort of testiness that seemed very natural, "Her maimess didn't make it easy on us—shameless like grand roads, she said. I'm pined at Glascow."

We passed off well enough, and we resumed our progress.

Our route, though leading towards the lake, had hitherto been so much shaded by wood, that we only from time to time broke through a glade. But what a delightful sheet of water. But the road now suddenly emerged from the forest ground, and, winding close by the margin of the loch, afforded us a full view of its expanse, which now, the trees having vastly subsided, reflected in still magnificence the high dark heathland mountains, huge gray rocks, and shaggy banks, by which it is encircled. The hills now sunk on either side, and we were again in loose, precipitous, as to afford no passage except just upon the narrow line of the track which we occupied, and which was overhung with rocks, from which we might have been destroyed merely by rolling down stones, without much possibility of offering resistance. Add to this, that, as the road winded round every promontory and bay, that indentured the lake, there were always a probability of seeing a hundred yards before us. Our commander appeared to take some alarm at the nature of the pass in which he was engaged, which displayed itself in repeated orders to his advance guard to take all possible care and hasten forward to bring us under a better prospect of safety, and instant death to Dougall, if he should be found to have led them into danger. Dougall received these threats with an air of stupid impenetrability, which might arise rather from conscious innocence, or from dogged resolution.

"If shameless were seeking to Red Gregarach," he said, "to be sure they couldn't expect to find her where without some wondrously fine and fine eyes about us. Just as the Highlander uttered these words, a halt was made by the corporal commanding the advance, who sent back one of the file who formed it, to overtake Capt. Thornton, who was occupied by Highlanders stationed on a commanding point of particular difficulty. Almost at the same instant a soldier from the rear came to say, that, they heard the sound of a bagpipe in the woods through which we had just passed. Capt. Thornton, a man of conduct as well as courage, instantly resolved to force the pass in front, without waiting till he was assured from the rear; and, assuming his soldiers that the bagpipes which they heard were those of the friendly Highlanders, who were advancing to their assistance, he stated to them the importance of advancing to the attack with all possible speed, before these auxiliaries should come up to divide with them the honour, as well as the reward which was placed on the head of this celebrated freebooter. He therefore ordered the great pike to make a sortie, as well both to close up to the advance, doubling his files, as to occupy with his column the whole practicable part of the road, and to present such a front as its breadth admitted. Dougall, to whom he said in a whisper, "You dog, if you have deceived me you shall die for it!" was placed in the centre, between two grenadiers, with positive orders to shoot him if he attempted an escape. The same situation was assigned to us, as being the safest, and Capt. Thornton, taking his half-pike from the soldier who carried it, placed himself at the head of his little detached column, and, with a loud shout, rushed in.

The party advanced with the firmness of English soldiers. Not so Andrew Fairservice, who was frightened out of his wits; and not so, if truth must be told, either the Bailie or myself, who, without feeling the same degree of trepidation, could not with stoical indifference see our lives exposed to hazard in a quarrel with which we had no concern. But what would we have done if Mr. Wray had not干涉ed the question?

We approached within about twenty yards of the spot where the advanced guard had seen some appearance of an enemy. It was one of those prominent trees which enliven the aspect of which the road had hitherto wended in the manner I have described. In the present case, however, the path, instead of keeping the water's edge, scaled the promontory by one or two rapid zigzags, carried in a broken track along the precipitous face of a slaty gray rock, which would otherwise have been absolutely inaccessible. On the top of this rock, only to be approached by a broken track, stood a corporal declared he had seen the bonnets and long-barrelled guns of several moun- teiners, apparently coiling along the long heath and brushwood which crested the eminence. Capt. Thornton ordered him to move forward with three files, to dislodge the supposed ambush, while at a more slow but steady pace, he advanced to his support with the bulk of his party.

The attack which he meditated was prevented by the unexpected apparition of a female upon the summit of the rock. Stand!" she said, with a commanding tone, and tell me what ye seek in Mac Gregor's country?"

I have seldom seen a finer or more commanding form than this woman. She might be between the term of forty and fifty years, and had a countenance which must once have been of a masculine cast of beauty; though now, imprinted with deep lines by exposure to rough weather, and perhaps by the wasting influence of grief and passion, its features were only strong, harsh, and expressive. She wore her plaid, not drawn around her head and shoulders, as is the fashion of the women in Scotland, but displayed around her neck and fastened with its tassels at her throat. She had a man's bonnet, with a feather in it, an unsheathed sword in her hand, and a pair of pistols at her girdle.

"It's Hebrides Campbell, Rob's wife," said the Bailie, in a whisper of considerable alarm; "and there will be broken heads among us or it's lang."

What seek ye here?" she asked again of Capt. Thornton, who, turning himself aside to communicate.

"We seek the outlaw, Rob Roy Mac Gregor Campbell," answered the officer, "and make no war on women; therefore offer no vain opposition to the king's troops, and assure yourself of civil treatment."

"Ay," retorted the Amazon, "I am no stranger to your tender mercies. Ye have left me neither name nor fame—my mother's bones will shrinl aside in their grave when mine are laid beside them—Ye have left me and mine neither house nor hold, blanket nor bedding, cattle to feed us, or fleeces to clothe us—Ye have taken from us all—all!—The very name of my ancestors have ye taken away, and now ye come for our lives."

I seek no man's life," replied the Captain; "I only execute right as the law enjoineth. If ye are a good woman, ye have nought to fear—if there are any with you so rash as to offer useless resistance, their own blood be on their own heads—Move forward, surrounded."

"Forward—march," said the non-commissioned officer. "Huzzza, my boys, for Rob Roy's head and a purse of gold!"

He quickened his pace into a run, followed by the six soldiers; but as they attained the first traverse of the ascent, the flash of a dozen of firelocks from various parts of the pass parted in quick succession and deliberate aim. The winged shot through the body, still struggled to gain the ascent, raised himself by his hands to clamber up the face of the rock, but relaxed his grasp, after a desperate effort, but fell, and, like a quiver, fell down the deep lake, where he perished. Of the soldiers three fell, slain or disabled; the others retreated on their main body, all more or less wounded.

"Grenadiers, to the front!" said Capt. Thornton.

"You are to recollect, that in those days this description of soldiers actually carried that destructive spee of fire-work from which they derive their name and present power. The four grenadiers, with a well-aimed carbine ball, fell the prisoner at once. The officer commanded the rest of the party to be ready to support them, and only saying to us, "Look to your safety, gentlemen," gave, in rapid succession, the word to "fix your bayonets—go to your pockeenthandle your grenadiers—blow your matches—fall on."" lay, and the musketeers to support them by an instant and close assault. Dougall, forgotten in the scuffle, wildly crept into the thicket which overhung the banks of the river, and lost track of his companions, of whom he had heard the activity of a wild cat. I followed his example, instinctively re-collecting that the fire of the Highlanders would sweep the open track. I was before the fire had cleared the clearing, and was still in a cloud of spattering fire, in which every shot was multiplied by a thousand echoes, the hissing of the kindled facets of the granades, and the excessive explosion of those minute chips of wood and of the pieces of the soldiers; and the yells and cries of their Highland antagonists, formed a contrast which added—I do not shame to own it—within to my desire to reach a place of safety. The difficulties of the ascent were so much that I despised of reaching Dougal, who seemed to singing himself from rock to rock, and stumped to stump, with the facility of a squire, and I turned down my eyes to see what had become of my other companions. Both were brought to a very awkward standstill.

The whole advanced with a shout, headed by Capt. Thornton, the grenadiers preparing to throw theirgrenadiers among the bushes where the ambuscade.

The Balie, to whom I suppose fear had given a true sense of danger, had advanced without twenty feet from the path, when his foot slipping, as he strolled from one huge fragment of rock to another, he would have slumbered with his father the deacon, whose name was no secret, and he certainly was no more, but for a projecting branch of a ragged thorn, which entangled the skirnels of his rCamouflage coat, supported him in mid air, where he dangled not unlike the statue of a deer over the door of a mercer in the Trongate of his native city.

As for Andrew Fairiservice, he had advanced with better success, until he had attained the top of a bare cliff which, rising above the wood, exposed him, at least to the view of his friends, to the neighbouring skirmish, while, at the same time, it was of such a precipitous and impracticable nature, that he dared neither to advance nor retire. Footing it on the top was almost too much for the strength of the cliff afforded, (very like a fellow at a country-fair dancing upon a trampoline,) he roared for mercy in Gaelic and English alternately, according to the side on which the scale of victory seemed to predominate, while his exclamations were only answered by the groans of the Balie, who suffered much, not only from apprehension, but from the pelilous posture in which he hung suspended by the cords.

On perceiving the Balie’s precarious situation, my first idea was to attempt to render him assistance, but this was impossible without the concurrence of Andrew, whose name and other command, nor command, nor exposition, could inspire with courage to advance the descent from his painful elevation, where, like an unskillful and obstinate mule, he endeavored to escape the imminent danger to which he had presumptuously ascended, he continued to pour forth piteous prayers for mercy, which no one heard, and to skip to and fro, writhing his body in all possible attitude shapes to avoid the balls which he conceived to be whistling around him.

In a few minutes this cause of terror ceased, for the fire, at first so well sustained, now sunk at once, a sure sign that the conflict was concluded. To claim some spot from which I could see how the day had gone was now my object, in order to appeal to the mercy of the victors, who, I trusted, (whichever side must be the victor,) would not fail to respect the request of a friend to remain suspended, like the coffin of Mahomet, between heaven and earth, without lending a hand to discourse him. At length, by dint of scrambling, I found a spot which commanded a view of the field of battle. It was indeed ended; and, as my mind already urged, from the place and circumstances accompanying this contest, it had terminated in the defeat of Captain Thain. The Balie, to the majesty of Highloe in the art of disarming that officer, and the scanty remains of his party. They consisted of about twenty who, of whom I met with, surrounded by treble the number of whom were wounded, who, surrounded by treble the number of whom were wounded, belonged to the party of the Balie. It was an easy matter for either to advance or retreat, exposed to a murderous and well-aimed fire, which they had no means of returning with effect. had at length laid down their arms by the order of their officer, when he saw that the road in his rear was occupied, and that increased resistance would be only wasting the lives of his brave party. By the happy chance which the under cover, the victory was cheaply bought, at the expense of one man slain and two wounded by the grenades. All this I learned afterwards. At present I only wish to fix the attention from seeing the English officer, whose face was covered with blood, stripped of his hat and arms, and his men, with sullen and dejected countenances, which were not regret, undismayed, the same wild and martial figures which the severe measures to which the laws of war subjected the vanquished for security of the victors.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"Was he the vanquished?" was the first question. When sunk proud Rome beneath the Gothic sword—

"Was he the vanquished?" when his massive blade

Bore down the scale against her rammed weight; and on the field of death, the battle raged.

We know no limit save the victor's will. The Conquered.

I anxiously endeavoured to distinguish Dougall among the victors. I had little doubt that the part he had played was assumed, on purpose to lead the English towards their destruction. I was admiring the address with which the innocent, and apparently half-brutal savage, had veiled his purpose and the affected reluctance with which he had refused to receive a present from the English officer, which it must have been his purpose from the beginning to communicate. I foresaw we should incur some danger on approaching the victors in the first rush of our success, which was not unsmitted with cruelty, for one or two of the Balie’s followers prevented them from rising, were poniarded by be victors, or rather by some ragged Highland boys who had mingled with them. I concluded, therefore, it would be unsafe to present ourselves without some mediator; and as Campbell, whom I now could not but identify with the celebrated freebooter Rob Roy, was nowhere to be seen, I resolved to claim the protection of his emissary, Dougall.

After gazing everywhere in vain, I at length retraced my steps to see what assistance I could individually render to my unlucky friend, when, to my great joy, I saw Mr. Jarvis delivered from his state of suspense, and though very black in the face, and much deranged in the garments, safely seated beneath the rock, in front of which he had been so lately suspended. I hastened to assure him of my assurances, which was at first far from receiving in the spirit of cordiality with which they were offered. A heavy fit of coughing so prevented him breath enough to express to a man who had once hinted which he threw out against my sincerity.

"Uhh! uhh! uhh!—they say a frieee—uhh! uhh!—a friend sticketh closer than a brother—uhh! uhh!—When I came up here, Mr. Oubun-dun, to this country, cursed of God and man—uhh! uhh!—Heaven forgive me for swearing—on one man's errand but yours, I don't think it was fair—uhh! uhh!—to leave first, to be shot or drowned among redcoats and Highlanders and redcoats; and next, to be hung up between heaven and earth, like an old potato-hog, without see muckle as trying—uhh! uhh!—sae muckle as trying—uhh! uhh!—no!"

I made a thousand apologies, and laboured so hard to represent the imposibility of my affording him relief by my own unassisted exertions, that at length I succeeded in persuading him to mount as hastily as possible on his horse, and I hasted to good shelter in the shelter of a high and broad, as it was a place, with as much as possible, in the shelter of the horse, and I hasted to good shelter in the shelter of a high and broad hill, where the victors left him in safety. I remained at his side as long as I was able, and then returned to the spot where he had, in the hope of effecting, placed his horse, and I hasted to good shelter in the shelter of a high and broad hill, where the victors left him in safety. I remained at his side as long as I was able, and then returned to the spot where he had, in the hope of effecting, place any o' yer rotten French gamlets now, or yer drab-de-berrys, it would have shreded like an auld rag was stripped from a dairymaid's back. I'd thought it was but the west o' I—swung and bobbed yonder as safe as a gabbart* that's moorded by a three-plicable cable at the Broomielaw.

I've heard what had become of his preserver.

"The creature," so he continued to call the Highlandman, "contrived to let me ken there wad be danger in gair near the chilly till he came back, and baith staid as if it o' his mind," he continued, "that he's seeking after you—it's a considerable creature—and truth, I wad swear he was right about the chilly as he ca's her, too—Helen Campbell was nane o' the twain.* I've heard of wretched outlaws, aither, as the folk say that Rob himself stands in awe o' her. I could a' sworn she ken me, for it's many years since we met—I am clear for waiting for theDougal creature or we sung near her.

*I signified my acquiescence in this reasoning; but it was not the will of fate that day that the Bailie's prudence should profit himself or any one else.

Andrew Fairservice, though he had ceased to caper on the pinnacle upon the cessation of the firing, which had given occasion for his whimsical exercises, continued, as perched on the top of an exposed cliff, too cognizant of his reputation or the customs of the Highlanders, when they had time to look a little around them. We were apprised he was discovered by a wild and loud hollowness set among the assembled we, the air there being charged with the fumes from the copsewood, and ascended the rocky side of the hill in different directions towards the place where they had discovered this whimsical apparition.

Those who stood within gammut of poor Andrew, did not trouble themselves to offer him any assistance in the ticklish posture of his affairs, but levelling their long Spanish-barrelled guns, gave him to understand, by signs which admitted of no construction, that he must contrive to come down and submit himself to their mercy, or he marked at from beneath, like a regimental target set up for half-p燣enges* upon his lungs in the fervor of our pretended protection, or at least his interference, to procure restoration of his shoes.

"Na, na," said Dougal in reply, "she's no gentle body. I trow; this pet was ganged rode into her like she's muckle mist'hen." And, leaving Andrew to follow at his leisure, or rather at such leisure as the surrounding crowd were pleased to indulgence him with; he hurried us down to the pathway in which the skirmish had been fought, and hastened to present us as additional captives to the female leader of his band.

We were dragged before her accordingly, Dougal fighting, struggling, screaming, as if he were the party most apprehensive of hurt, and repulsing by threats and shouts, all those who attempted to take a nearer inspection of the criminal himself. I cannot believe, nothing but fear of instant death could have moved him to attempt. The awkward mode of Andrew's descent greatly amused the Highlanders below, who fired a shot or two while he was engaged in it, without the purpose of injuring him, as I believe, but merely to enhance the amusement they derived from his extreme terror, and the superstitious exactions of agility to which it excited him.

At length he attained firm and comparatively level ground, or rather, to speak more correctly, his foot slipping at the last point of descent, he fell on the earth in his fall, but his length, and was raised by the presence of the Highlanders, who stood to receive him, and who, ere he gained his legs, stripped him not only of the whole contents of his pockets, but of his wig, hat, coat, doublet, stockings, and shoes, performing the feat with such admirable celerity, that, although he fell on his back a well-covered and decent burgher—seeking serving-man, he arose a forked, maddened monster, a creature no more. Without respect to the pain which his undamaged toes experienced from the sharp encounter of the rocks over which they hurried him, those who had handled Andrew in his descent were led by the rays which formed her head-dress, seemed all to intimate that she had taken an immediate share in the conflict. Her keen black eyes and features expressed an imagination inflamed by the pride of gratified revenge, and the triumph of victory. Yet there was nothing positively sanguinary, or cruel, in her deportment; and she reminded me, when the immediate excitement of the quarrel was over, of fables I had seen of the inspired heroines in the catholic churches of France. She was not, indeed, sufficiently beautiful for a Judith, nor had she the inexpressible expressiveness of the hair which Deborah, or to the wife of Heber the Kenite, at whom the gentle Christian of Israel, who dwelt in Harosheth of the Gentiles, bowed down, fell, and lay a dead man; we have therefore no right to enquire how she was begat, gave her consequences.
ROB ROY.

I was uncertain in what terms to accost a person so uncommon, when Mr. Jarvis, breaking the ice with the utmost courtesy, inquired if I had any business with him. I assented, and he introduced himself, and asked me to the house, which he had been brought into her presence had again impeded her respiration,” addressed her as follows:—

"What is the matter, ma’am?"—"I am very happy to have this joyful opportunity,—a queer in your voice strongly betokened the anguish which she studiously laid on the word joyful)—"this joyful opportunity," he resumed, trying to give the adjective a more suitable accentuation than my kinsman Robert’s usual treatment;—

"Good morning,—How’s a wi’ ye?" (by this time he had talked himself into his usual jog-trot manner, which exhibited a mixture of familiarity and self-importance)—"How’s a wi’ ye this long time?—Ye’ll have forgotten me, Mrs. Mac Gregor Campbell, as your cousin,—uh! uh!—but ye’ll mind my father, Deacon Nicol Jarvis, in the Snout Market of Glasgow?—an honest man he was, and a sensible, and respecti, and yours, too, as I said before, I am right glad to see you, Mrs. Mac Gregor Campbell, as my kinsman’s wife. I was crave the liberty of a kinsman’s of your father’s grace to see such a droll’s fast haud o’ my arms; and, to speak Heaven’s truth and a magistrate’s, ye wadna be the waor of a coo’s o’ water before ye welcomed your friends.

"This is the case of this introduction which ill suited the exalted state of temper of the person to whom it was addressed, then hushed with distributing dooms of death, and warm from conquest in a penulous strain,—

"What fellow are you," she said, "that dare to claim kindred with the Mac Gregor, and neither wear his dress nor speak his language!—What are you, that have the hound and the hag of the hound, and yet seek to lie down with the deer?"

"I dinnan ken," said the undaunted Bailie, "if the kindred has ever been well red out to you yet, cousin—but it’s kind and can be proved. My mother, Elspeth Mac Farlane, was the wife of my father, Deacon Nicol Jarvis—peace be wi’ them both—and Elspeth was the daughter of Farlane Mac Farlane, at the Shoking o’ Loch Sloy. Now, this Farlane Mac Farlane, as his surviving daughter, Maggy Mac Farlane, alias Mac Nab, who married Duncan Mac Nab o’ Snuckavanlachan, can testify, stood as near your guardman, in Rob Roy, Mac Gregor, as in the fourth degree of kindred, for—"

The virago lopped the genealogical tree, by demanding haughtily, "If a stream of rushing water acknowledgements there is, I have probably position for it for the mean domestic uses of those who dwelt on its banks?"

"Vera true, kinswoman," said the Bailie; "but for a’ that, the burn wad be glad to haud the midbeam back again in summer, when the chuckle stane are white in the sun. I ken weel enough you Hieland folk haud us Glasgow people light and cheap for our language and our class; but every body speaks their native tongue that they learned in infancy; and it would be a daft-like thing to see me wi’ my fat wame in a short Hieland coat, and my purr short houghs gathered below the knee, like ane o’ you long-legged gillies—Mair by token, kinswoman," he continued, "in defiance of various intimations by which Dougal seemed to recommend silence, as well as of the marks of impatience which the Amazon evinced at his loquacity,—"I wad ha’e ye to mind that the king’s errand whiles comes in the cadger’s gate, and that, for as high as ye may think o’ the gudeman, it’s as it roun’ weel—I’ll say it here. Here’s Scripture warrant for that,—yet as high as ye ha’e bade him, as I was saying, I have been serviceable to Rob ere now;—forbye a set o’ permain. I sent yourself when ye was gane to Miss Mather’s. Rant it was an honest, a well-doing drover, and none o’ this unlawful work, wi’ fighting, and flashes, and flit-gibs, disturbing the king’s peace and disarming his soldiers."

"And yet she is a woman who could not brook. She drew herself up, to full height, and betrayed the acuteness of her feelings by a laught of mingled scorn and bitterness."

"Yes. And, if you, and she—"

"And did you learn this, you false-hearted traitor," said the wife of MacGregor, "and not instantly rush to your father's rescue to bring him off, or leave your body on the plains?"

The young MacGregor modestly replied, by representing the very superior force of the enemy, and stated, that they made no preparation for leaving the country, he had fallen back on the glen with the purpose of collecting a band such as could rescue with some tolerable chance of success. At length he said, "The militiamen would quarter, he understood, in the neighbouring house of Gartaran, a little to the east of Glencoe; and the other stronghold, which, although strong and defensible, was nevertheless capable of being surprised, could they but get enough of men assembled for the purpose."

I understood afterwards that the rest of the freebooter's followers were divided into two strong bands, one destined to watch the remaining garrisons of Inverness, a party of which, under Captain Thornton, had been defeated; another to show front to the Highland clans, who had united with the regular troops and Lowlanders in this hostile and combined invasion of that mountainous and desolate territory, which, lying between the lakes of Loch-Lomond, Loch-Katrine, and Loch-Ard, was at this time currently called Rob Roy's, or the MacGregor country. Messengers were dispatched in great haste, to concentrate, as I supposed, their forces, with a view to the proposed attack on the Lowlanders; and the dejection and despair, at first visible on every countenance, gave place to the hope, with which the brave heart of Galt- lert; but, to distinguish him from his father, glanders added the epithet, Oig, or the young, hair, and dark features, with a ruddy glow of and animation, and a form strong and well- rounded his years, completed the sketch of the mountaineer.

At length, when her bent appeared in some degree to subsaise, the speech was all too huge to kiss the hem of her plaid. I was understood by their followers, endeavoured fully to vindicate himself and his brother from their reproaches. I was so near him as to bend much of what he said; and, as it was of consequence to me to be possessed of information this strange crisis, I failed not to listen as at y as I could.

It is impossible to describe the scorn, the loathing, and contempt, with which the wife of MacGregor regarded the wretched petitioner for the poor boon of existence.

"I could have had you live," she said, "had life been to you the same weary and wasting burden that it is now to me. But you are not worthy another's kiss, and every woman's pity. But you—wretch! you could waken the world unaffected by its various disarrangements, its inferior miseries, its constantly accumulating masses of horror and misery, if you could only take one bite of the noble-minded and bereaved—by nameless and birthless villains truant on the neck of the brave and the long-descended; you could enjoy yourself if you could only taste the bitterness, bating on garbage, while the slaughter of the oldest and best went on around you! This enjoyment you shall not live to partake of; you shall die, base dog, and that before your clothes have passed over the sun."

She gave a brief command in Gaelic to her attendants, two of whom seized upon the prostrate suppliant, and hurried him to the brink of a cliff which overhung the flood. He set up the most piteous and dreadful cries that fear ever uttered—I may well term them dreadful, for they haunted my sleep for years afterwards. As the murderers, or executors, called them, dragged him away, his blood gushed on me even in that moment of horror, and exclaimed, in the last articulate words I ever heard him utter, "O, Mr. Ossballidine, save me!—save me!"

I was so moved by this horrible spectacle, that although I expected no express order of sharing his fate, I did attempt to speak in his behalf, but, as might have been expected, my interference was sternly disregarded. The victim was held fast by some, while others binding a large stone in a piece of cloth tied round his neck, and others again eagerly stripped him of some part of his dress. Half-naked, and thus manacled, they hurled him into the water, there allowed to struggle with a large sword and a large stone; a combat in which the victorious triumph, above which, however, his last death-shriek, the yell of mortal agony, was distinctly heard. The heavy burden splashed in the dark-blue waters, and the heavy stone brought it to the bottom; the swords watched an instant, to guard, lest, extricating himself from the load to which he was attached, the victim might have struggled to regain the shore. But the knot had been securely bound; the wretched man sunk without effort; the waters, which his fall had disturbed, settled calmly over him, and the unit of that life for which he had pleaded so strongly, was for ever withdrawn from the sum of human existence.

CHAPTER XXXII.

And he was restored ere evening went—

"Most excellent in his presence is an iniquitous heart."

And power to wreak it (as an armed hand, your land shall ache for'it)."

Old Play.

I knew nearly it was that a single deed of violence and cruelty affects our nerves more than when these are exercised on a more extended scale. I had seen that day several of my brave countrymen fall in battle—it seemed to me that they met a lot appropriate to human—; and, as the minutes, though thrilling with interest, was affected with nothing of that sickening horror with which I beheld the unfortunate Morris put to death without resistance, and in cold blood. That showing appeared in his face reflected the feelings which were painted in mine. Indeed, he could not so suppress his horror, but that the words escaped him in a low and broken whisper.

"I take up my protest against this deed, as a bloody and cruel murder—it is a cursed deed, and God will avenge it in his due way and time."

"But will it ever follow?" said the vizier, bending on him a look of death, such as that with which a hawk looks at his prey ere he pounces.

"Kinswoman," said the Ballie, "I will willingly witness the life of one of the miserable intruder. If he avenges the misery of the land, and becomes again, after all he has suffered, their agent—their tool—their slave."

"Add, madam," said I, "and their benefactor."
Be it so, she said; for it is the emptiest title of them all, since he has uniformly sown benefit to himself without making a return. But enough of this.—I shall cause you to be guided to the enemy's outposts—ask for their commander, and deliver him this message from me, Helen MacGregor, the son of the nobleman who is now here. And if they do not set him at liberty within the space of twelve hours, there is not a lady in the Lennox but shall before Christmas cry the coronach for them, she will, be faith to me. If there is not a farmer but shall sing a-w-a over a burnt barnyard and an empty byre;—there is not a lord nor heritor shall lay his head on the pillow at night with the assurance of his wife and family's safety. Do as you are to end, so soon as the term is expired, I will send them this Glasgow Bailie, and this Saxon Captain, and all the rest of my prisoners, each bundled in a plaid, and chipped into as many pieces as there are chieftains in the tartan.

As she paused in her denunciation, Captain Thornton, we, was within hearing, added with great courteousness, "I present my compliments—Captain Thornton’s, of the Royals, compliments—to the commanding officer, and tell him to do his duty and secure his prisoner, and not waste a thought upon me. If I have been of late any inconvenience to you, the abominable, by these—unspeakable savages, I am wise enough to know how to die for it without disgracing the service. I am only sorry for my poor fellows," he said, "that law has thus dealt with them.

"Whist! Whist!" exclaimed the Bailie; "are ye weary o’ your life?—Ye’ll no serve my service to the commanding officer, Mr. Osbaldestone—James Nicol Jarvie’s service, a magistrate of Glasgow, as his father the deacon was before him—and tell him, here are a whom honest men in great trouble, and like to come to naught; and the best thing he can do for the command, I dare say, is to let the King’s soldiers have their way through the glen, and me nae air about—it. There’s been some ill done here already, but as it has lighted chiefly on the snagger, it winta be muckle worth making a stir about.

With these very opposite injunctions from the parties chiefly interested in the success of my expedition, and with the reiterated charge of the wife of MacGregor, to remember and detail every word of her injunctions, I was at length obliged to depart; and Andrew Fairweather, chiefly, I believe, to get rid of his clamorous supplications, was permitted to attend me. We took leave of Mr. Dougal, his Eyes, and a means of escape from my guides, or desires to retain a prize of some value, I was given to understand that I was to perform my journey on foot, covering the remainder of the way with two followers, attended, as well to show me the way, as to reconnoitre the strength and position of the enemy. Dougal had been at first undetermined on this party, but he contrived to divest the service, with the purpose, as we afterwards understood, of watching over Mr. Jarvie, whom, according to his wild principles of fidelity, he considered as entitled to his good offices, from having once acted in some measure as his patron or master.

After walking with great rapidity about an hour, we arrived at an encinnure covered with bruswood, with a commanding prospect down the little valley, and a full view of the post which the militia occupied. Being chiefly cavalry, they had judiciously avoided any attempt to penetrate the pass which had been so unsuccessfully essayed by Captain Thornton. They had taken up their situation with some military skill, on a rising ground in the centre of the little valley of Aberfoel, through which the river Forth with much force was deflected by two chains of hills, faced with barricades of limestone rock, intermixed with huge masses of bresica, or pebbles imbedded in sooty substance which has hardened into an indurated mass, and surrounded by the more lofty mountains in the distance. These ridges, however, left the valley of breadth enough to secure the cavalry from any sudden surprise by the mountain men; and they had stationed sentinels and outposts at proper distances from this main body, in every direction, so that they might secure full time to mount and get under arms upon the least alarm. It was not, indeed, to be supposed that they would attack cavalry in an open plain, though late events have shown that they may do so with success. When I first knew the Highlanders, they had almost by force of arms taken the surrender of a chief, the horse being so much more fierce and imposing in his appearance than the little skeletons of their own hills, and moreover being trained, as the more ignorant mounted men believed, to fight with his feet and his teeth.

The appearance of the piquetted horses, feeding in this little vale; the forms of the soldiers, as they sat, stood, or were lying upon their knees at the side of the beautiful river, and of the bare yet romantic ranges of rock which hedge in the landscape; on either side, formed a noble fore-ground, while far to the eastward the eye caught a glance of the Lake of Menteith; and Stirling Castle, dimly seen along with the blue and distant line of the Ochil Mountains, closed the scene.

After crossing on this landscape with great earnestness, young MacGregor intimated to me that I was to descend to the station of the militia and execute my errand to their commander, engaging me at the same time to inform them who had guided me to that place, nor where I had parted from my escort. Thus tutored, I descended towards the military post, followed by an old man, who, directing his attention to his own description of the English costume, without a hat, bare-legged, with brogues on his feet, which Dougal had given him out of compassion, and having a tattered plaid to supply the want of all upper clothing, looked as if he had been playing the part of a Highland Tom-of-Balmain. We had not proceeded far before we became visible to one of the violets, who, riding towards us, presented his carbine and commanded me to stand. I obeyed, and when the soldier came up, desired to be conducted to his commanding officer. I was immediately brought within a circle of officers, sitting upon the grass, assembled in attendance upon one of superior rank. He wore a guirnas of polished steel, over which were drawn the insignia of the ancient Order of the Thistle. My friend, Garschanthin, and many other gentlemen, some in uniform, others in their ordinary dress, but all armed and well attended, seemed to receive their orders from this person of distinction. Many servants in rich livery, apparently a part of his household, were also in waiting.

Having paid to this nobleman the respect which his rank appeared to demand, I acquainted him that I had been here to deliver a message from the officers having suffered a defeat from the Highlanders at the pass of Loch-Aird, (such I had learned was the name of the place where Mr. Thornton was made prisoner,) and that the victors threatened every species of extremity to those who had fallen into their power, as well as to the Low Country in general, unless their Chief, who had that morning been made prisoner, were returned to them uninjured. The Duke (for he whom I addressed was of no lower rank) listened to me with great composure, and then replied, that he should be extremely sorry to expose this gentleman, but that he must next day go to the cruelty of the barbarians into whose hands they had fallen, but that it was folly to suppose that he would deliver up the very author of all these disorders and offences, and so encourage his followers in their license. "You may return to those who sent you," he proceeded, and inform them, that I shall certainly cause Rob Roy Campbell, whom they call MacGregor, to be executed by two men, and his property taken in arms, and deposing by a thousand acts of violence; that I should be most justly held unworthy of my situation and commission did I act otherwise; and that I had to beseech the King’s country against their insolent threats of violence, and that if they injure a hair of the head of any of the unfortunate gentlemen whom an unlucky accident has thrown into their power. I will take such ample vengeance, that the very stones of their dwellings shall sing for one hundred years to come!

I humbly beg leave to renounce respecting the prize, if I may be so bold as to call it, which I had the good fortune to lose last spring, and touched upon the obvious danger attending it, when the noble commander replied, "that, such being the case, I might send it away."

"The devil be in my foot," said Andrew, without either having respect to the presences in which he stood, or waiting till I replied — "the devil be in my foot, if I gang my toon's bath. Do the folk think I kens the place? I put my name after the Highlander's snicket this ane wi' his jestical? or that I shall dive down at the side of a Highland loch and rise at the other, like a seaside drake? Na, no ilk awe for hand, and God for us a'. Folk may just mark a page o' their annals, and serve themselves till their hairs grow up, and gang their ain errands for Andrew. Rob Roy never came near the parish of Doune, to steal either pippin or near brace me whin."

Shelmynge my follower with some difficulty. I represented to the Duke the great danger Captain Thornton was in. "I think, sir, that was a near escape," I exclaimed, and entreated he would make me the bearer of such modified terms as might be the means of saving the lives. I assured him I should decline no danger if it saved the lives of my hand and head, and had seen, I had little doubt they would be instantly murdered should the chief of the outlaws suffer death.

"The Duke was obviously much affected. "It was a bold and brave deed, " and he felt it as such, but he had a paramount duty to perform to the country — Rob Roy must die!"

It was without emotion that I heard this from my tongue, and, as I marched north to Edinburgh, I met Mr. Campbell, who had so often testified his good-will towards me. Nor was I singular in the feeling, for many of those around the Duke ventured to express themselves in suitable terms, "I would be responsible," the Duke said, "to send him to Stirling Castle, and there detain him as close prisoner, as a pledge for the submission and disbanding of his gang. It was a great pity to expose the country to be plundered, which, now that the long nights approached, it would be found very difficult to prevent, since it was impossible to guard every point, and the Highlanders were sure to select those that were least exposed. They added, that there had been recent outbreaks in leaving the unin- cent prisoners to the almost certain doom of massacre denounced against them, which no one doubted would be executed in the first burst of revenge.

Garschattachin ventured yet further still in the honour of the nobleman whom he addressed, although he knew he had particular reasons for disin- gaging his persons. "Rob Roy," he said, "though a little neighbour to the Low Country, and particularly obnoxious to his Grace, and though he perhaps carried the catherine carcass farther than any man o' his day, was an odd-far-rain earl, and there might be some means found of making him bear reason; whereas his wife and sons were reckless friends, without either fear or mercy about them, and, at the head of a' his limmer loons would be a worse plague to the country than a dozen.

"Poo! pooh!" replied his Grace, "it is the very sense and cunning of this fellow which has so long maintained his reign — a mere Highland robber would have been put down in as many weeks as he has flourished years. His gang, without him, is no more to be dreaded as a permanent annoyance — it will no longer exist — than a wisp without its head, which is not dangerous perhaps, but is instantly crushed into annihilation."

Garschattachin was not so easily silenced. "I am sure, my Lord Duke," he replied, "I have no favour for your noble client, but he has twice cleaned out my ain byres, beside skaith among my tenants; but, however,"

"But, however, Garschattachin," said the Duke, with a significant look, "I assure you, my Lord, that such a freedom may be pardoned in a friend's confidence, and Rob's supposed to be no enemy to Major Galbraith's friends over the water."

"If it be so, my lord," said Garschattachin, in the same tone of peculiarly, "it's no the worst thing I have heard of him. But I wish we heard some news from the Low Country about our men there. I vow to God they'll keep a Highlandman's word wi' me — I never lend them better — it's all drawing bows upon trowsers.

"I cannot believe it," said the Duke; "these gentlemens are known to be men of honour, and I must necessarily suppose they are to keep their appointment. Send out two more men-servants to look for our friends. We can make for the attack the place where Captain Thornton has suffered himself to be surprised, and which, to my knowledge, a man on foot might make good against a regiment of the best horses in Europe. Meanwhile let reinforcements be given to the men."

I had the benefit of this last order, the more necessary and acceptable, as I had tasted nothing since our last meal at Aberfoyle the evening before. The victuallers who had been dispatched, returned without tidings of the expected auditors, and rusted was approaching, when a Highlandman belonging to the Low Country came in expectation, and brought the bearer of a letter, which he delivered to the Duke with a most profound curtsy.

"Now will I read a thousand of care," said Garschattachin, and, opening the letter, he read aloud the cursed Highlanders, whom we have fought here at the expense of so much plague and vexation, are going to draw off, and leave us to do our own business, as we see fit.

"It is even so, gentlemen," said the Duke, redoubling with indignation, after having praised his letter, which was written upon a very dirty paper, and written by the much-honoured hands of And High and Muddy Prince, the Duke, &c. &c. &c. "Our allies," continued the Duke, "have deserted us, gentlemen, and have made a clean get away. It's the fate of all alliances," said Garschattachin: the Dutch were: "to serve us the same" if we had not started to them at Utrecht." You are facetious, sir," said the Duke, with a frown which showed how little he liked the pleasantness of our business is rather of a grave cast just now. — I suppose no gentleman would advise on this occasion to go and seek aid from this county, unsupported either by friendly Highlanders, or by infantry from Inverness?"

A general answer announced that the attempt would be made in readiness.

"Nor would there be such great wisdom," the Duke added, "in remaining exposed to a night-attack in this place. I therefore propose that we should retreat to the house of Duchray and that of Gardotter, and keep safe and sure watch and ward until morning. But before we separate, I will examine Rob Roy before you all, and make you sensible, by your own eyes and ears, of the extent, ultgesses, and of anything else that may be of use for further advantage. He gave orders accordingly, and the prisoner was brought before him, his arms being tied down below the elbow, and secured to his body by a horse-shoe buckled tight behind him. Two naked, well-armed officers sat before them, one on each side, and two file of men with carbines and fixed bayonets attended for additional security. I had never seen this man in the dress of his country, which set in a striking point of view the peculiarities of his form. A shock of red hair, which the hat and periwig of the Lowland costume had in a great measure concealed, was seen beneath the Highland bonnet, and trims of the Red or Red, by which he was much better known in the Low Country than by any other, and is still, I suppose, best remembered. The justice of the application was not known, but he has two red plaits from part of his limbs, from the bottom of his kilt to the top of his short hose, which the fashion of his country dress left bare, and which was covered with a fall of the same, especially around his knees, which resembled in this respect, as well as their sinewy appearance of extreme strength, mids of a red-coloured Highland bull. Upon the one, betwixt the effect produced by the change of place, and by having become acquainted with his usual formidable character, his appearance had much stronger, and much more striking than before presented, that I could not recognize him to be the same person.

A man of such build, uncomparable unless by such bulls, haughty, but not so dignified, led to the Duke, nodded to Garschattachie and me, and showed some surprise at seeing me at the party.

'Twas some time since we met, Mr. Campbell,' said Duke.

'It is so, my Lord Duke; I could have wished it better, looking at the fastening on his arm, and I could have better paid the compliments to your Grace—but there's a time coming now,'

'No time like the present, Mr. Campbell,' said the Duke; 'for the hour is fast dawning that time will have its last account at all mortal affairs, that you must adjust it; that you draw near the end of your career. Do not delay that you may sometimes have some leisure, that you may occasionally have exhibited madness, and even of a disposition which promised things. But you are aware how long you have this time; and with the excess of the tone of your confidence, and with what acts of violence you have gained and extended your unjust authority, know, in short, that you have deserved death, that you can never escape. My Lord,' said Rob Roy, 'although I may well envy you at your Grace's door, yet I will say first you yours. If I be a villain and out with me you are, Out with me if you think your Grace would not this day have been sitting dormant on me; for you have been three times in good right distance of me when you were kind, and did not use me with kindness and love; now I miss my aim. But forasmuch as you have defaced your Grace's ear, and set you up against that, that was once as peaceful a man as any in the country, and made your name the warrant for driving out of extremity,—I have had some amends of, and for a that your Grace now says, I expect to be heard upon.

'Know, Sir,' said the Duke, in rising anger, 'that a dunghill and impudent villain, who will his oath if he swears to mischief; but it shall never prevent you. You have no enemies your own wicked actions.'

And called myself Graham, instead of Campbell, I might have heard less about them,' answered Rob Roy, with dizzied resolution.

You will do well, Sir,' said the Duke, 'to warn wife and family and fellows; to beware how you use the gentlemen now in their hands, as I will do for you, and their kin and allies, the last injury done to any of his majesty's liege vassals.'

'My Lord,' said Rob Roy in answer, 'none of my enemies will allege that I have been a bloody, obstinate man, which I now will not; I fear this grand Highlanders as easy as your Grace those ten, or twenty, or fifty, that are of the people. But if your Grace will take the head away from a house, ye may your account there will be murmur among the owners—However, come o'that what, there is an at man, a kinsman of my ain, main come by skilful—Is there any body here wad do a good for MacGregor—he may repay, though his Lord be now tied.'

Rob Roy, who had delivered the letter to the last, 'I'll do your will for you, MacGregor; I'll go home and put you to the front at the last,' advanced, and received from the prisoner a letter to his wife, which, being in Gaelic, I did not understand; but I had little doubt it referred to measures to be taken for the safety of Mr. MacGregor.'

'Was there the fellow's impudence?' said the Duke; 'he confesses in his character of a messenger. His conduct is of a piece with his master's, who invited us to make common cause against these freebooters, and have deserved us as MacGregor, to Fother, they were窗户 about the matter.'

'No truth in that, no faith in that, then,' answered Major Gally, 'and, with submission, neither would your Grace have occasion to say it, wad ye be for beginning justice at the wellhead, or else the honest man his man again. Let every head wear its hat button, and the district men of the Lannacard wad be mend'd if thee wad the land.'

'Here's hust! hust! Garschattachie,' said the Duke; 'this is a language dangerous for you to talk now on, and especially in,' but I presume you reflect yourself a privileged person. Please to draw off your party towards Clarranton; I shall myself see the prisoner secured to Durness, and send you orders tomorrow. You will please grant no lack of absence to any of your troops.'

'Here's an ordering and counter-order, Rince, matter of Garschattachie between his brother. Not pleasant. This motion perished immediately. I am to say play at Change catts, the king's coming.'

The two troops of cavalry now formed, and prepared to march on the ground, that they might avoid themselves of the roads and Returns of the evening quarters. I received an intimation, neither an invitation, to attend the party; and I perceived, that, though no longer consider. I was to be a prisoner, I was not yet unpunished for the sort of suspicion. I was indeed so dangerous—the great party questions of Jacobite and Hanoverian divided the country so effectually—and the constant dispute and jealousies between the Highlanders and Lowlanders, which was a number of inexplicable causes of feud which separated the great leading families in Scotland from each other, occasioned much general suspicion, that a solitary and unexpected visit would be sure to meet with something disagreeable in the course of his travels.

I acquiesced, however, in my destination with the best grace I could, consulting myself with the hope that I might obtain from the captive freebooter some information concerning Ralheigh and his machinations. I should do myself injustice did I not add, that my wishes are not not much interested in my present acquaintance, but to desires of rending him such services as his unfortunate situation might demand, or admit of his receiving.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

And when he came to broken bridge, the head of the way was shown, and when he came to grass green; Gill Morrie.

The echoes of the rocks and ravines on either side, now rang to the trumpets of the cavalry, which, forming themselves into two distinct bodies, began to move down the valley at a slow trot. That command, commanded by Major Gallah, soon took to the right hand, and crossed the Firth, for the purpose of taking up the quarters awaited them for the night, when they were to occupy, as I understood, an old castle in the vicinity. They formed a lively object while crossing the stream, but were soon lost in winning up the bank on the opposite side, which was clothed with wood.

We continued our march with considerable good order. To ensure the safe custody of the prisoner, the Duke had caused him to be placed on horseback behind one of his retainers, called, as I was informed, Ewan of MacGregor, one of the largest and strongest men who were present. Horseback occupied round the bodies of both, and housed before the woman's breast, rendered it impossible for Rob Roy to free himself from his keeper, or to escape, to keep close beside him, and accommodated for purpose with a troop-horse. We were no danger.
ROB ROY. [CHAP. XXXIII

rounded by the soldiers as the width of the road I would permit, and had always at least one, if not two, on every side of them. He had instructed his men to march in a line, and it was his object to get them into the ranks of the more regularly trained troops.

In this manner we travelled for a certain distance, until we arrived at a place where we also were to change horses. For this purpose, being the cock of a biw, is of considerable depth, even more so in the centre, and increasing in point of width, and the descent to the ford was by a broken precipice ranging, which only permitted to descend by the use of the hands. The centre and centre of our small body halted on the bank, while the front file passed down in succession, produced a considerable delay, as is usual on such occasions, and even some confusion; for a number of their horses, which had no proper part of the squadron, crowded to the ford without prudence, and made the military cavalry, although tolerably well drilled, face in the street of their own accord.

It was while we were thus huddled together on the bank, that I heard Rob Roy whisper to the man behind, whom he was placed on horseback. "Your father, Ewan, wishes has carried an ambuscade to the skir of the town of the Ewen."

Ewan returned no answer, but shagged, as one would express by that sign that what he was then doing was none of his own choice.

"Shaq a," he continued, "we shall have the water in the glen, and the sea toom fields, a blunder-stone, and the fire rushing out between the raths of your house, we may be thinking then, Ewan, that your friend Rob to the core, you would wish to have the safety that will make your heart weep."

Ewan of Briglands again shagged and groaned, but remained silent.

"Is the Duke on the other side, by the waning light, engaged in commanding his people to get into order, as they landed desperately, some higher, some lower. Many had crossed, some were in the water, and the rest were preparing to follow; when a sudden splash warned me that MacGregor's cavalry had prevailed on Ewan to give him freedom and a chance for life. The Duke also heard the sound, and instantly guessed its meaning. Being, he exclaimed to Ewan as he landed, "where is your prisoner?" and, without waiting to hear the apology which the terrified vessel began to offer forth, he fixed a pistol at his head, whether faintly I know not, and exclaimed, "Gentlemen, disperse and preserve the villain—An hundred guineas for him that seizes Rob Roy!"

All became an instant scene of the most lively confusion. The noise of the approaching horsemen, the noise of the horses, the noise of the approach of horsemen. Errors and accidents had also happened among the pursuers, whose task the approaching morning required every moment more hopeless. Some had been lost in the stream, and required the assistance of their companions to save them from drowning. Others, hurt by shots or blows in the confused melee, implored help or threatened vengeance, and in one or two instances such accidents led to actual strife. The trumpets, therefore, sounded the retreat, announcing that the commanding officer, with whatever hopes or wishes, had foreseen the extremity that had thus unexpectedly escaped his grasp, and the troopers began slowly, reluctantly, and brawling with each other as they retired, again to assume their ranks. They could see them darkening, as they formed on the southern bank of the river, whose murmurs long drowned by the louder cries of venal pursuit, were now heard hoarsy, by mingling with the deep, disconnected, and reproachful voices of the disappointed horsemen.

Hitherto I had been as a more spectator, though far from an uninterested one, of the singular scene which had just passed. Forthwith, without suddenly exclaimed, "What is the English stranger?" It was he gave Rob Roy the knife to cut the belt." "Clear the rock-pudding to the chase!" cried the voice.

"Wea a brace of balls through his hurn-pun," said a second.

"Drive three inches of coals a small into his break-" said a third.
And I heard several horses galloping to and fro with the kind purpose, doubtless, of executing these lamentations. I was immediately awakened to the smell of the perfume, and the noise of the armored men, having no restraint whatever on their irritated and inflamed passions, would probably begin by shooting or cutting me down, and afterwards vexed me by the lash. The idea of finding myself thus at sea, leaped from my horse, and turning him over, plunged into a bush of elder-trees, where conceiving the advancing obscurity of the night, I thought that any expectation of finding in the mist the least intervention to have afforded protection, in case of my surroundings, I thought there was no point of which I might require, in such circumstances, my present situation, to be apparent, and the clas-ture of the horse's feet was heard less frequently in the immediate vicinity of my hiding-place, was set off to facilitate my reflections in the dark, and join myself up to him, as a large subject, who had nothing to fear from his justice, and a stranger, who had every right to expect protection and hospitality.

The twilight had now melted into darkness;

and the wailing and prolonged sound of their trum-peters, which run through the woods to recall strag-gers. Here, therefore, I was left in a situation of considerable difficulty. I had no horse, and the dead wheeling stream of the river, rendered turbulent by the late tumult of which its channel had been the scene, and seeming yet more so under the doubtful light of the moon, caused great difficulty and inconvenience to a pedestrian by no means accustomed to wade rivers, and who had lately seen horsemen riding in the dangerous passage up to the very shingle.

well as surprise. The ride did not speak with the deep mechanics of Rob Roy's career. And there was nothing but a pleasing and commanding; he was taller, more heavy, more in himself, than his first-rate object of my hate and suspicion. Neither did the stranger's address resemble that of any of my other companions, excepting only to the momentary moment in which we recognize a man of sense and breeding, even in the first-draw sentences he speaks.

The object of my anxiety seemed decisive to get rid of my inspection. "Diana," he said, in a tone of mingled kindness and authority, "give your cousin his property, and let us not spend time here."

I listened in the meantime taken out a small case, and leaning down from her horse to me, she said, in a tone in which an effort at her usual quietness of expression carried with it a deepened, fearful fear. I was born to be your better angel.

Rob Roy has been compelled to yield up his spoil, and had we reached this same village of Aberfoyle last night, you and I, finding every Highland shill to have wafted to you all these representatives of commercial wealth. But there were guilds, and dragons in the way; and errant knights and foreign tenants, but they thought they must not, as of yore, run into useless danger. Do you do so either, my dear cousin?"

"Diana," said her companion, "let me once more warn you, the taxes may come late, and we are still distant from our own home."

"I am coming, sir, I am coming—consider," she added, with a sigh; "how lately I have been subjected to travel and hurry, and given my cousin the packet—and bid him farewell—far, far away."

"For ever," she said, "for ever!—there is a gulf between us—a gulf of absolute perdition—where we go, you must not think what we do, you must not share in whatsoever befall us."

In the attitude in which she bent from her horse, which was a Highland pony, her face, not perhaps altogether unwillingly, touched mine. She pressed my hand to her cheek, and the moment when it has this feeling, I found its way to my cheek instead of her own. It was a moment never to be forgotten—inexpressibly bitter, yet mixed with a sensation of pleasure so deeply affecting and affectionate, as at once to mingle all the flood-gates of the heart. It was but a moment, however; for, instantly recovering from the feeling to which she had involuntarily given way, she cast her glance from me, and turned aside, and laid her hand on a horse's bridle, and putting their horses to a brisk pace, they were soon far distant from the place where I stood.

Heaven knows, it was not apathy which shielded me, for I was charmed, and made me forget him; but it was a heart which, in order to forget him, had put his horse to a brisk pace, they were soon far distant from the place where I stood.

Heaven knows, it was not apathy which shielded me, for I was charmed, and made me forget him; but it was a heart which, in order to forget him, had put his horse to a brisk pace, they were soon far distant from the place where I stood.

In my imagination, however, the sound of their words, to the mutual expression so common in their native tongue, and they usually speak with a good deal of emphasis. To the national peculiarities Rob Roy added a sort of hard indifference of accent and manner, expressive of a mind neither to be cheated, nor surprised, nor affected, by what passed before him, however dreadful, however sudden, however unexpected. Habitual danger, with unbounded confidence in his own strength and sagacity, had rendered him indifferent to fear; and the lawless and passionate life he had led had by degrees, however cruel it had been, softened, his feelings for others. And it was to be remembered, that I had very lately seen the following of this man commit a cruel slaughter on an unarmed and suppliant individual.

Yet such was the state of my mind, that I welcomed the company of the outlaw leader as a relief to my own overstrained and painful thoughts; and I was not without hope, that through his means I might obtain a view of guidance through the maze in which my fate had involved me. I therefore answered his greeting cordially, and congratulated him on his late escape in circumstances when escape seemed improbable."

"Ay," he replied, "there is as much between the crew and the wood, as there is between the cup and the bottle. Twigs of willow, such as..."
ROB ROY.

The lip. But my peril was less than you may know, being a stranger to this country. Of those who were summoned to take me, and to keep me, to retake me again, there was a money, as cousin Jervis, at Clachan um, and I, and one other, or two, or three, or four, or five, or six, or seven, or eight, or nine, or ten, or keep fast, or retrace and of other party, there was as half was feared to stir one; and had only like the fourth part of fifty or sixty men with what.

And enough too, I should think," replied I.

"I dinna ken that," said he; "but I ken, that every ill-will that I had among men out upon me, was put to me at Clachan um, and, I say, they would play with sword and target. One play another down come on,

"To make a raggy hackock of a woman, or theretoo, or keep fast, or retrace, and of other party, there was as half was feared to stir one; and had only like the fourth part of fifty or sixty men with what.

And enough too, I should think," replied I.

"I dinna ken that," said he; "but I ken, that every ill-will that I had among men out upon me, was put to me at Clachan um, and, I say, they would play with sword and target. One play another down come on,
"I am thinking," said MacGregor, "that since ye dinna ken them already, they canna be o' muckle consequence to you, and I shall say naething on that score, for the letter is in my hand, or, having a sort of business of my own on my hands, being, as ye well may see, just as much as I can fairly manage, I canna say I wad hae fashed my life, thir, when ye put that question about a quarter ago.

I now recollected the lights seen in the library—the various circumstances which had excited my jealousy—the glove—the narrative of the tapestry which conveyed the secret message from Rashleigh's apartment—and, above all, I recollected that Diana retired, in order to write, as I then thought, the billet to which I was to have recourse in case of last necessity. Her leaving then, and not returning, I was resolved to inquire about the matter, but in listening to the addresses of some desperate agent of Jacobitish treason, who was a secret resident within the mansion of her uncle! Other young women have sold themselves for gold, or suffered themselves to be reduced from their first love by vanity; but Diana had sacrificed my affections and her own to partake the fortunes of some desperate adventurer—to seek titles of freeroam through midnight deserts, with no better hopes of rank or fortune than that ministry of both which the muck court of the Stewards at St. Germaines had in their power to bestow.

It is true I was determined it be possible, once more. I will arm with her as a friend—as a kinsman—on the risk she is incurring, and I will facilitate her retreat to France, where she may, with more propriety, her family, for safety, above the issues of the turmoils which the political tempest, to whom she has united her fate, is doubtless destined to put into motion.

I conceived I should need about five minutes' silence on both sides, "that his Excellency, since you give me another name for him, was residing in Osbaldistone Hall at the same time we played?"

"To be sure—to be sure—and in the young lady's apartment, as best reason was," this gratifying information was added call to bitterness. "But few," added MacGregor, "tend he was demul все—save Rashleigh and Sir Hilblander; for you, eye were out of the question, and the young lady herself was not up to the spirits of the cat to the cream—But it's a brav' old-fashioned house, and what I specially admired is the abundance of holes and boxes and cellars—ye could put twenty or thirty men in a corner, and a family might live a week without finding nothing but the last mouthful, as an occasion for a special convenience. I wish we had the like of Osbaldistone Hall on the banks of Craig Rosston—But we must have roads and canals serve the like of us poor people!"

"I suppose his Excellency," said I, "was busy to the first accident which was?"

"Ye were going to say Morris," said Rob Roy coolly, for he was too much accustomed to deeds of violence for the agitation he had at first expressed to be of long continuance. "I used to laugh heartily at that jest, but I'll hardly have her heart to do anything since the ill-fated accident at the Lochar—"in his Excellency 'knew not of that jest—"it was a managed between Rashleigh and myself. But the sport the sacrifice of Rashleigh and nothing but Rashleigh and turning suspicion off himself upon you, that he had me the least favour to frame the beginning—and then Miss Dickie, she many hue we sweep up a' our spiders' webs again, and set you out o' the Justice's clasp—and then the frightful event. Morris, that was scared out o' his senses by seeing the real man when he was chargin' the innocent stranger—and the gowk o' a clerk—and the drunk'n carse of a justice—Oh! o' course, it is a that I can do for the pair devil is to get some messes said for his soul."

"May I ask," said I, "how Miss Vernon came to have so much influence over Rashleigh and his acompañyees, as to drag your projected plan?"

"Mine? it was none of mine. No man can say or had my burden on other folk's shoulders—" me cannot expect to carry off the Saint-Market at this tail, as a snail does his caup— and I am blythe that ye hae got out o' the hands o' your uncleanse.

"Woe, woe, then," answered Roy, "what's this?— ye haud us for the wear o' God, and that was a naught that we fast last us day—come, take a cup o' brandy—your—ther the deacon could tak ane at an orra time.

"It might be he might do saw, Robin, after fatigue— which has been my lot many ways ane this day. But—" he continued, slowly filling a little wooden stoup which might hold about three glasses, "he was a moderate man of his beaker, as i am myself—Here's wath ye haud langer (a sip) and your woold forse here and hereafter," (another taste), "and also to my cousin Helen—and to your twa hopeful lads, of whom man an.

"This, this, will not stir up the contents of the cup with great gravity and deliberation, while MacGregor winked aside to me, as if in ridicule of the air of wisdom and superior authority which the Baillie assumed towards me. As I had seen upon the 23rd of March, I was as likely as the Baillie to my stranger, to understand that if he submitted to the tone which his kinsman assumed, it was partly out of deference to the rights of hospitality, but still more for the sake of his wine.

As the Baillie set down his cup he recognised me, and giving me a cordial welcome on my return, he waived further communication with me for the present."

I will speak to your matters anon; I mean begin, 1 in reason, w' the few of your kinsman. I presume, Robin, there's nowhere here will carry aught o' what I am gien to say, to the town-council or elsewhere, to my prejudice or to yours."

"Make yoursel' easy on that head, cousin Nicol," answered MacGregor; "the tae half of the gillies wanna ken what ye say, and the tither wanna ken—whether the three toot o' the hermit yon o' them that said presum to say ower again any speech held w'te in their presence.""

"Aweel, cousin, sic being the case, and Mr. Osbal- liston here being a prudent young man, and a safe friend— I s'ean't tell you, you are breeding up your family o' gans an ill-gate. — "Then clearing his voice with a preliminary huff, he addressed his kinsman, check- ing the tone which had so far kept him in his usual quietude, his familiar smile with an austere regard of control. — "Ye ken yourself ye haud right by the law— and for my cousin Helen, farybe that her reception o' an ill-gate, she is not likely but into the bubble. — Except that they're the names ane another chance to see in the inscriptions at the Western Circuits for cow- lick, at the intercourse of his majesty's advocate for his majesty's interest—aweel, but the twa lads, as I was saying, they haie saw me suckle as the ordi- nary grands, man, of liberal education— they denken the w' was in me, but they were no fit to see the w' unfold, for I was an unlearned man, and the roll of the mea- s' believed in a Christian land."

"If they could, kinsman," said MacGregor, with great indifference, "the learning must have come o' an early age, for the devil was I to get ten a teacher?—wad ye hae had me put on the gate o' your Divinity—Hall at Glasgow College. 'Wanted, a tutor for Rob Roy's bairns?'

"Na, kinsman," replied Mr. Jarvie, "but ye might hae sent the lads where they could ha' learned the say o' God, and that was a naught that they were an ignominy as the kylkys ye used to drive to market, or the very English charlies that ye said them to, and we can do nothing whatever to purpose."

"Umph!" said Mac Gregor; "Hannah can bring down a black-cock when he's on the wing wi a single bullet, and Rob can drive a dirk through a two-inch board."

"Sae muckle the war for them, cousin! Sae muckle the war for them baith!" answered the Glasgow merchant in a tone of great decision; "an' they ken no more than the better that they had better no ken that war."

"The better, Rob; - the better, Robin. - I am go- ting, and stabbing, and shooting, and driving of dirks, whether through human flesh or fir deals, dune for yourself! And weren a ye a happier man at the tail o' an acceptable one?—" and Robin, lad, ye needin', than ever ye ha' been since, at the head o' your Hilland kerns and gally-glasses?"

I observed that MacGregor, while his well-meaning cousin was speaking, had drawn near me, and with a look which might be compared to that of a man who indeed suffers pain, but is determined no groan shall escape his lips; and I longed for an opportunity to interrupt the well- meaning, but, as it was obvious to me, quite mistaken strain, in which the stranger so correctly addressed himself to the person. The dialogue, however, came to an end without my interference."

And sae," said the Baillie, "I hae been thinking, Rob, that as you may be ower deep in the black book to win a pardon, and ower mad to send your self, that it would be a pity to bring up twa hopeful lads to sic a godless trade as your ain, and I wad nae blithely talk them for prentices at the loom, as I began myself and my father the deacon afore me, though, praise to the Giver, I only trade now as wholesale dealer—And—"

He saw a man gathering on Rob's brow, which probably induced him to throw in, as a sweetener of an obnoxious proposition, what he had reserved to crown his own pance, that it had been embraced as an acceptable one—"and to ye, Robin, lad, ye needin', than over ye ha' been since, at the head o' your Hilland kerns and gally-glasses?"

"Cease millia diavol, hundred thousand devils!" exclaimed Rob, as I passed him. "My sons weavers!—Miltia mollarheart! but I wad see every loom in Glasgow, beam, traddles, and shuttles, burnt in hell-fire sooner!"

With some dignity, the Baillie, who was preparing a reply, comprehended the risk and improviding of pressing our host on this topic, and in a minute he recovered, or reassumed, his hermitage of speech.

"But ye mean weel—ye mean weel!" said he; "so gie me your hand, Nicol, and if ever I put my son's apprentice, I will gie you the refusal o' them. And, as you say, there's a thousand marks to be settled between us. Here, Euchen MacAulaster, bring me my sporran.

The person he addressed, a tall, strong mountainian, who seemed to be a great man, brought some sense of safety a large leather pouch, such as Highlanders of rank wear to fove them when in full dress, made of the skin of the sea otter, richly garnished with silver ornaments and beads."

"I advise no man to attempt opening this sporran till he has my secret," said Rob; and then twisting one button in one direction, and another in another, pulling one down, and releasing it, he put it to his breast, by the folding of the flap, which was bound with massive silver-plate, opened and gave admittance to his hand. He made me remark, as it to break shor: this the subject on which Willie Jarvie had spoken, that a small steel pistol was concealed within the purse, the trigger of which was connected with the mounting, and made part of the machinery, so that the weapon would certainly be discovered. There was probability in the contents lodged in the person of one.
one, who, being unacquainted with the secret, should tamper with the lock which secured his treasure. "Thus," said he, touching the pistol—"this is the keeper of my secrets." The simplicity of the contrivance to secure a furled pouch, which could have been ripped open without any attempt on the spring, reminded me of the verses in the Odyssey, where Ulysses, in a yet ruder age, is content to secure his property by casting a curious and involved complication of cordage around the sea-chest in which it was deposited.

The Bailie put on his spectacles to examine the mechanism, and where he had done so, returned it with a smile, and a sigh, observing—"Ah! Rob, had either folk's purses been as well guarded, I doubt if your sporran would have been as well filled as it kythes to be,"

"Never mind, kinsman," said Rob, laughing, "it will yet open for a friend's necessity, or to pay a just debt, and here," he added, pulling out a souleau of gold, "and count them, and see that you are full and justly paid."

Mr. Jarvie took the money in silence, and weighing it in his hand for an instant, and it on the table, and then, just as the sun began to sink in the west over the level the day what sort of a gate your gord was made in—ill-not wear ye a prosperity; and, to bluid it, the souleau muckle will—it looks as there might be bluid in it."—"True enough," said the outlaw, affecting an indifference which, perhaps, he did not altogether feel, "it's guid stuff, and money to boot, but I think the landlord's wife in full flow, or all tae herself, but the money being unspilt, accorded to attract at one classic and fragrant. Cloaks, and such bedding as could be collected, stretched over this vegetable couch, made it both soft and warm. The Bailie seemed exhausted by fatigue. I resolved to adjourn my communication to him until next morning; and therefore asked him to betake himself to bed as soon as he had finished a plentiful supper. Though tired and much occupied, he did not make the same disposition to sleep, but rather a restless and anxious anxiety, which led to some further discourse between me and MacGregor."

CHAPTER XXXV

A hopeless darkness settled over my fate;—I've seen the last look of her heavenly eyes,—Two last tears were the sound of her lips' lamentation,—I've seen her fair form from my sight depart:—

My dear, my friend, my own sweet RASHIEL."

"I ken not what to make of you, Mr. Osbalstone," said MacGregor, as he pushed the flask towards me. "You cast not, you show no wish for reaf; and yet you drink not, though that thief of Broulard might have come to Sir Hildebrand's nae sel's."

"I had been always abstinent, you would have escaped the deadly hatred of your cousin Rashleigh."

"Had I been always prudent," said I, blushing at the scene he recalled to my recollection, "I should have escaped a worse evil—the reproach of my own conscience."

MacGregor cast a keen and somewhat fierce glance on me, as if to read whether the reproof, which he evidently felt, might have been intended. I saw that I was thinking of myself, not of him, and turned his face towards the fire with a deep sigh. I followed his example, and remained for a few minutes wrapt in his painful reverie. All in the hut were now asleep, or at least silent, excepting ourselves.

MacGregor first broke silence in the tones of one who takes the lead in conversation to enter on a new subject. "My cousin Nicod Jarvie means well," he said, "but he presses over hard on the temper and situation of a man like me, considering what I have gone through in the course of the day. Nicod Jarvie stood in his turn, but his kinsman continued. "That's a Highland settlement of accounts—the time might come, cousin, were I to keep a these charges and discharges, that friends might be brought into trouble for having dealt with me."
must be most unpleasant to his feelings. 'I should be happy to learn,' I added, 'that there is an omens of chance of your escaping from this.'

The tone of the corner of MacGregor, in a ow tone that growled like distant thunder—like a joy, who thinks the small gnarled oak can be twisted is easily as the young sapling. Can I forget that I purpose into the Bailie's man, coming—not, as ye may believe, from Aberfoyle or Rob Roy's country, but on a quit journey from Stirling.—See, here he is.'

'I wanna live hame the creature,' said Mr. Jarvie;

nor indeed was it easy to recognise the wild

Highlander, when he appeared at the door of the cottage, attired in his ordinary and riding-cout, that which had once called Andrew Fairweather master, and mounted on the Bailie's horse, and leading mine.

He received my guests from certain places where he thought he was expected to suspicion to collect what intelligence he could in the course of his journey, and to await our coming at an appointed place, near the Ferry of Balloch.'

That the same evening invited me to accompany him upon our own road, assuring us that we must necessarily march a few miles before breakfast.

and recommending a dram of brandy; as a proper introduction to the journey, in which he was pledged by the Bailie, who pronounced it, "an unlawful and perilous habit to begin the day wi' spirituous liquors, whether in the morning or against the morning mist; in whilk case his father the deacon had recommended a dram by precept and example."

"Very true, kinsman," replied Rob, "for which reason we, who are Children of the Mist, have a right to drink brandy from morning till night."

The Bailie, thus reassured, was most rusted on a small Highland pinte; another was offered for my use which, however, I declined, and we resumed, under very different attendance and auspices, our journey of the preceding day.

Our party consisted of MacGregor, and five or six of the hand-same, best armed, and most athletic mountaineers of his band, and whom he had generally in immediate attendance upon his person.

When we approached the pass, the Bailie, with a smile of triumph, said the winds were against him, and that it would be impossible to proceed; but I said—"I, who have been brought up in the Highlands, where the wind changes from day to day, and who am as much accustomed to change of weather as to change of name in my own country,

"You must think harshly of us, Mr. Ochilidstone, and expect that it should be otherwise. But remember, at least, we have not been unprovoked—"we are a rude and ignorant, and it may be a violent and passionate, but we are not a cruel people—the laws have been so modified for our sake that if you will not allow us to enjoy the blessings of peaceful law, we have been a persecuted generation."

"And persecution," said the Bailie, "maketh wise men mad."

"What must it do then to men like us, living as our fathers did a thousand years since, and possessing scarce more lights than they did?—Can we view their bland effects against us—our brawling, heading, and breaking of the laws?—for Grant and MacGregor showed they were very cordially by the hand, and detaining me, so as to permit Mr. Jarvis to proceed, a circumstance for the narrowness of the road served as an excuse, he said to me:"

"You are a kind-hearted and an honourable youth, and understand, doubtless, that which is due to the feelings of a man of honour. But the heather that I have trod upon when living, most bloom o'er me when I am dead—my heart would sink, and my arm would shrink and wither like fern in the frost, were I to lose sight of my native hills; nor has the world a scene that would console me for the loss of the rocks and crags wild as my heart, that you saw around us. And Helen—what could become of her, were I to leave her the subject of new insult and horror?—or how could she bear to be removed from the scenes, which for some time she was so sweetly by the recollection of her revenge?

"I was once so hard put at by my Great enemy, as I may well call him, that I was forced even to give way to the tide, and remove myself and my people and family from our dwellings in our native land, and withdraw for a time into MacCallum More's country—and Helen made a Lament on our departure, as we were leaving the residence of the chief, and so pitifully sad and wretched, that our hearts amain broke as we sat and listened to her;—like the wailing of one that mourns for the grave that bore him—the tears came down the cheeks of our sires as they hardened—and I wept the same as a man desolate, for the world, and the whole land that ever was a tender offering, against the morning mist; in whilk case his father the deacon had recommended a dram by precept and example."

"And you should be content," he replied, "as he pushed their fortune in the French or Spanish war, as is the wont of Scottish cavaliers of his time. Last night your plan seemed sensible enough, given his Excellency this morning last; and it is now thought that he might be found near us, and we should be able to cross the border without much anxiety."

"Not so," I thought, "was MacGregor; but he never crossed the border in sound health, and so spoke to the young lady, and so spoke:

"There was no occasion for it already, I teased with some htghight;—I should not have been so mad as to leave my country for such a purpose."

"But ye must not be offended, or look on among your curs then, like a wildcat out of season, for we are to understand that he was not in such a condition as we thought, and that his Excellency is at the gate to do to us as he pleases."

"I have no occasion for that, said I, "I do not understand you.

"Why?" said MacGregor. "ye ken that woman and gear are at the bottom of all our chief in this world—there you are in the middle of the best and abstracted of our military men, who have been so much the despair of his Excellency mainly on that score. But then came the sphere about the surrender of papers—and we have now more evidence that it was by his Excellency to yield the town of Stirling, and that the Governor of that town, all that was done during the time, was ordered by Lord Stirling and Lord Ochilidstone, his Excellency, and that all that was done during the time was ordered by Lord Stirling and Lord Ochilidstone, his Excellency, and that he was the last and best of his nation: granting that and I ever forget again, I go down my way with a bare blakie, and not in my red and his best blakie to acquainted with the other man."

He pronounced the last threat with an exultation, and the appropriate gesture of his hand, his face, and his eyes, that only a man who has lived a hard life and has had the hard lessons of that life, could produce such an effect; and then

"I should almost rejoice at what has happened, I said, "I could hope that Rashleigh's death might prove the means of preventing the excommunication of the rash and desperate intrigues, in which we long suspected him to be a prime agent."

"How ye na that," said Rob Roy, "till ye are never yet hurt honest cause. He was overthrust our secrets, that's true; and had it not been for the skill of our lads, and his best lad in this acquaintance theretofor."
James is as good a man as any of them, and has the best right to Hanish and Rob, being his natural-born son.

I early comprehended that these words bored a general national convulsion; and, as it would have been alike useless and dangerous to have contradicted the assumptions, I thought it best to make a plain and momentous observation, so that, in case of a possible outcome of all I had said, my conscience was clear with regard to the promotion of a scene of confusion and distress likely to arise from any general exertion in favour of the exiles to all family.

"Let it come, maam—let it come," answered MacGregor; "we never saw dull weather clear without a change, and if the world is turned upside-down, why, both men have the better chance to cut bread out of it.""

I was at fault to bring him back to the subject of the two men; but although on most occasions and subjects he was not a man of much of conversation which I had not brought great delight in listening to, yet upon that alone, which was most interesting to me, he kept a degree of emotions reserved, and continued himself with inwardness. I was not to be content with this answer; and to proceed in the hope that accident might, as a Gentlemans, moderate, and allow me at least the gratification of bidding farewell to the object who had occupied such a share of my affections, so much beyond even what I had supposed, till the last, I eagerly asked him that I might see the two sons.

We pursued the margin of the lake for about six miles, through a delightful and beautifully scenically-paved path, until we attained a sort of Highland farm. There the carriage stood, and the footman of the carriage, which had seemed so much smaller than the house we were going to, in the manner of country, when once we were reached, and our horses were fed. Excuse the redness that gave you a rough welcome, and lay it upon the evil times and not upon us." All this was said with the manner of a princess, and the tone and style of a count. Nor was there the least tincture of that vulgarity, which we naturally attach to the Lowland Scotch. There was a strong provincial accentation, but, otherwise, the language rendered by Helen MacGregor, out of the native and poetical Gaelic, into English, which she had acquired as we do learned tongues, but had probably never heard applied to the mean purposes of everyday life, was flowing, and declamatory. Her husband, who had in his time played many parts, used a much more elevated and emphatic dialect—but even his language was a purity of expression, which I should feel if I had been accurate in recording it, when the affairs which he discussed were of an agitating and important nature; and it appears to me in his case, and in that of some other Highlanders whom I have known, that, when familiar and facitious, they used the Lowland Scottish dialect,—which serious and impassioned, their thoughts arranged themselves in the idiom of their native language; and in the latter case, as they uttered the corresponding ideas in English, the expressions sounded wild, elevated, and poetical. In fact, the language of passion is almost always as pure as the feelings themselves, and in no more common thing to hear a Scotchman, when overwhelmed by a countryman with a tone of bitterness and fluent upbuilding, reply by way of taunt to his adversary, "You have gotten to your English." But this as it may, the wife of MacGregor invited us to a refreshment spread out on the grass, which abounded with all the good things that their mountains could offer. We were enabled to partake of this turbid gravity which sat on the brow of our hostesses, as well as by our deep and anxious recollection of what had taken place on the preceding day. It was in vain that we would have parted in haste. A chill hung over our minds as if the storm had been funereal; and every bosom felt light when it was ended.

"Alicu, cousin," she said to Mr. Jarvis, "we are ready.
rose from the entertainment; " the best wish Helen MacGregor can give to a friend is, that he may see him no more."

The lieutenant struggled to answer, probably with some common-place maxim of morality; but the calm and melancholy sternness of her countenance, her downcast eyes, her mechanical and still motion of the magistrate, he coughed,-bumped,-bowed,-and was silent. "Feroy, strang-\quad\text{er,}\quad\text{she said,}\quad\text{I have a token, from one whom you}

"Before," interrupted MacGregor, in a loud and strong voice, "what means this?—have you forgotten the dinner?"

"I have forgotten nothing that is fitting for me to remember. It is not with hands as these," and she stretched forth her rigid, icy, and bare arm, "that are fitting to con-\quad\text{vey joy and love}, when the gift connected with such feelings is given by a young man," she said, presenting me with a ring, which I well remembered as one of the tokens that Miss Vernon sometimes wore, "this comes from one whom you will never see more. It is a token of love, a token that is well fitted to pass through the hands of one to whom joy can never be known. The last words were,—Let him forget me for ever."

If I had, almost with astonishment, expressed the feeling that I spoke, "I suppose that is possible."

"All may be forgotten," said the extraordinary face, "the extraordinary face," who addressed me,—"all, but the sense of dis-\quad\text{tinction}, the sense of belonging; afterward, the sense of being isolated."

"And what is it for?" cried the MacGregor, stamping with impatience. The bagpipes sounded, and, with its fluttering and jarring tones, cut short our conference.

Our leave of our host was taken by silent departure; and we resumed our journey, with an additional proof on my part, that I was beloved by Dinah, and was separated from her for ever.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

From the land where the clouds have to dwell,
To the shore where the blue sea reigns;
And where the sun's last beam expires in the sky.

Our route lay through a dreary, yet romantic country, which the distress of my own mind prevented me from remarking particularly, and which, therefore, I will not attempt to describe. The lofty peak of Ben Nevis, the noiseless and distant voices of the most retreating bents, lay on our right hand, and served as a striking landmark. I was not awakened from my sparsity, until, after a long and toilsome walk, we emerged from the trees, and beheld the track before us. I will spare you the attempt to describe what you would hardly comprehend without going to see it. But certainly this noble lake, boasting innumerable beautiful islands, of every varying form and out-\quad\text{line which fancy can frame,—its northern extremity} narrowing until it is lost among dusky and retreating mountains,—while, gradually widening as it extends to the southward, it spreads its base around the in-\quad\text{dustries and promontories of a fair and fertile land,} affords one of the most surprising, beautiful, and sub-\quad\text{lime spectacles in nature. The eastern side, parcularly rough and rugged, was at this time the chief seat of MacGregor and his clan, to curb whom a small garrison had been stationed in a central position between Loch Linnhe and another lake. The river Arrochar, of the country, however, with the numerous passes, marshes, caverns, and other places of concealment or defence, made the establishment of this little fort seem rather an acknowledgment of the force than an effectual means of securing against it.

On more than one occasion, as well as on the occasion on which I witnessed, the garrison suffered from the inroads of the enemy. But the rugged and isolated position of their abode, the river and the mountains which surrounded it, the wide extent of water which separated it from our country, and the distance of some miles between them, were all to their advantage. These advantages were never sullied by forcery when he himself was in command; for, equally good,\quad\text{good-natured and sagacious, he understood it the desirre of incurring unnecessary harm. I learnt with pleasure that he had caused the captives of the previous day to be liberated in safety; and many of us had been assisted by his extraordinary generosity, on similar occasions.

A boat waited for us in a creak beneath a rock, manned by four lusty Highlanders, of our host's acquaintance; and we left, with a few words of affection. Between him and Mr. Jarvis, it seemed to exist a degree of mutual respect, which formed a strong contrast to their repugnances and habits. After kissing each other lovingly, and when they were lost in the retreating, the Balle, in the fullness of his heart, was a faltering voice, assured his kinsman, "the man who should set his hand on his family in a settled way, had need but to put a line to the Saint-Market;" and Rob grasped his basket-hilt with one hand, and shaking his heartily with the other, protested, "that if a body should affront his kinsman, an he would in his turn, he would show his flag and go out of the way he was the best man in Glasgow.

With these assurances of mutual aid and good will, we bore away from the shore, and our course for the south-western angle of the lake which gives birth to the river Leven. Rob had maintained that we should make the right shore for the north which we had departed, conspicuous long range, waiting tartsans, and the single hand of his cap, which in those days denoted the Highland chief. The sense military taste has decorated the Highlands, with a quantity of black plumage, such that which is borne before funerals. At last the distance increased between us and the hill, and we slowly go up the side of the hill, followed by immediate attendants or bodyguard.

We performed our voyage for a long time intercepted only by the Gaelic chant which our rowers sung in low irregular measure, resonantly into a wild chorus, in which the others joined.

My own thoughts were and enough; yet I was a thing soothed in the magnificent serenity which I was surrounded; and thought, in the midst of my soul, that the birth of Rome, I could have consented to live and slowly return in one of the romantic remote islands amongst which our boat glided.

The Balle had also his speculations, but the very thoughts of somewhat a different complexion; as I looked to the west, I thought, that the moon, which was reflected in the sea, would be covered, as by a cloud, in the middle of the night, a few hours hence, and that the stars would begin to bedeck the heavens. The ship would not be able to proceed; and on the other hand, the crew and cargo would be moved by the current, and so a dish of perch now and then.

Amidst a long discussion, which he "crammed," to mine ear against the stomach of my seat, he remembers that it was part of his project to pass a portion of the lake, just deep enough and level enough for the purposes of water-carriage; once that the lands and gables should pass as air between Dunbarton and Glenfalloch as between Gower and Greencock.

At length we neared our distant place of landing, adjoining to the runs of an ancient town, where the lake discharges its superfluities waters into the Leven. There we found Dougal with the crew.

The Balle had formed a plan with respect to "his creature," as well as upon the draining of the lake and, perhaps, in both cases, with more regard to utility than to the practical possibility of his scheme. Dougal," he said, "ye are a kindly creature as thee that has a pretty feeling of understanding and I'm e'en was for you, Dougal, for it come right but that in the life ye lead you could see a saint in the day, sooner or later. Trust, confidence, and service are the first things, and I mistake not, for I have interest enough in the council to make them wince a week or two the way you, and I have been thinking of what ye are going to do. Now we are here, being a while, you see, "as a picture."
As there was something of justice in Andrew's plea of loss in my service, his finesse exceeded, and he came by a good suit of mourning, with a beaver and all things conforming, as the exterior signs of wo for a master who was alive and merry.

Mr. Jarvis, for whose kindness he entertained the most grateful sentiments, which he expressed in very few but manly and nervous terms. He explained the altered state of his affairs, and desired the Bailie, on such terms as could not but be both advantageous and acceptable, that part in his concerns which had been hitherto managed by MacVitte and Company. The Bailie, who was not unacquainted with Jarvis and Owen, and the changed posture of their affairs, and, without affecting to disclaim that he had done his best to serve them, when matters looked otherwise, he said,

"He had long been acquainted with them, and had acted as the Bailie, at the instance of their correspond-ence, he frankly accepted with thanks. Had MacVitte's folk behaved like honest men, he said, "he had been liked and valued accordingly; but, as aforesaid, this gate. But it's otherwise, and they mean not to stand the loss."

The Bailie then pulled me by the sleeve into a corner, and, considering I proved during the day to be in an embarrassed tone,

"I wish the best for you, Master Francis, there shall be as little said as possible about the queer things we saw at the Jockey Club. There's undoubted truth about that business of the Jockey Club, and the thoroughbred folk there. But I think I have heard a man in one of their bodies to be unkindly disposed toward MacVitte and his ilk, and is an absolute monster, when I am on my right end, I can't help but think I have seen a queer sight—without my hat and my peruke, hanging by the middle like a bow-don't, or a cloak flung over a clack-pin. Bailie Graham said he had an unco hair in my neck he got that tale by the end."

I could not suppress a smile when I recollected the Bailie's situation, although I certainly thought it no laughing matter at the time. The good-natured merchant was a little confused, but small also when he shook his head. "I see how it is— I see how it is. But something about it—there's a glind callant—and charge that long-tongued, conceited, upsurping serving-man o' yours, to say nothing of hangman, I warn you for ever see muckle that even the lassock MacVitte, whom you mentioned, and what I was at the Jockey Club. He was obviously relieved from his impending fears of ridicule, when he told him it was his father's intention to leave Glasgow almost immediately. Indeed he had no wish to keep the man for any valuable part of the papers carried off by Rashleigh had been recovered. For that portion which he had converted into cash and expended in his own or on private business, and the no mode of recovering it but by a suit at law, which was forthwith commenced, and proceeded, as our law-agents assured us, with all deliberate speed.

We had then a most enjoyable day with the Bailie, and took leave of him, as this narrative now does. He continued to grow in wealth, honour, and credit, and actually rose to the highest civic honours in the city, and was made a burgess. I have mentioned, he tired of his bachelor life, and promoted Mattie from her wheel by the kitchen fire, to the upper end of her table, in the character of Mrs. Jarvis. Bailie Graham, the MacVitties, and others, (for all men have their enemies, especially in the council of a royal burgh,) ridiculed this transformation. But, said Mr. Jarvis, "let them say their say. I'm for myself, and for what I like. It's not a matter as a man's days can last. Honest father the deacon had a byword,

"Great brow and lily skin, In life and death I'm a free man."

Besides, as he always concluded, "Mattie was no ordinary lassock-queen; she was akin to the Laird o' Lassockhead."

"Whether it was owing to her descent or her good gifts, I do not presume to decide; but Mattie behaved excellently in her exaltation, and relieved the apprehensions of some of the Bailie's friends, who had deemed his experiment somewhat hazardous. I do not know that there was any other incident of his quiet and useful life worthy of being particularly recorded.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

"Come ye hither, my good sons, and men I know ye,"

"How many of you, my dear Stewart, in England,"

"Every of them did answer nay—"

"Every of them said elsewise, strangely, in the day we said."

"We'll stand by that good Earl and there."

On the morning when we were to depart from Glasgow, Andrew Fairbairn brought into my apartment, as usual, a newspaper, and sang with more volubility than usual,

"The kins' o' the kin— the kins' o' the kin—"

"The kins' o' the kin— she's in a kins' o' the kin."

With such a cordial invitation to him to cease his confounded clamour, and explain to me what the matter was, he was pleased to inform me, as if he had been bringing the finest news imaginable. "That the Highlanders and the Lowlanders, and that Rob Roy, and a' his breakless bands, were on the way up Glasgow, or twenty-four hours of the clock round."

"Hold your tongue, said I, "you rascal! You must be drunk or mad; and if there is any truth in your news, is it a singing matter, you scoundrel?"

"Drunk or mad? none doubt," replied Andrew, laughingly; "one's as drunk as another and what grit folks daunna like to hear— singing? gold, the class will make us sing on the wrang side o' our mouth, if we are drunk or mad as to hide their coming, rose in great haste, and found my father and Owen also on foot, and in considerable alarm.

Andrew's news proved but too true in the main. The great rebellion which agitated Britain in the year 1715 had already broken out, by the unfortunate Earl of Mar setting up the standard of the Stewart family in an ill-mannered hour, to the ruin of many honourable families, both in England and Scotland. The treachery of some of the Jacobite agents (Rashleigh's), which amounted to open assassination, had made George the First's government acquainted with the extensive ramifications of a conspiracy long prepared, and which at last exploded prematurely, and in a part of the kingdom too disgraceful to the country, and effect upon the country, which, however, was plunged into much confusion.

This great public event served to confirm and obviate the obscurant explanations I had received from MacGregor; and I could easily see why the westland clans, who were brought against him, should have waived their private quarrel, in consideration that they were all about to be engaged in the same public cause. It was a more melancholy reflection to my mind, that Diana Vernon was the wife of one of those who were most active in turning the world upside down and that she was herself exposed to all the privations and perils of her husband's hazardous trade.

We held an immediate consultation on the measures we were to adopt in this crisis, and acquiesced in my father's plan, that we should instantly get the necessary passports, and make the best of our way to London. I acquainted my father with my wish to offer my personal services to the government in any volunteer corps, several being already spoken of. He readily acquiesced in my proposal; for, though he disliked war as a profession, yet upon principle, no man would have been allowed to lead a life more willingly in defence of civil and religious liberty.

We travelled in haste and in peril through Dumfries-shire and the neighbourhood counties of England. In this quarter, gentlemen aye on horseback, already in motion mounting men and horses, while the Whigs assembled themselves in the principal towns, seized the inhabitants, and prepared for war. We escaped by being stored on more occasions than one, and were often compelled to take circuitous routes to avoid the points where forces were assembling.

When we reached London, we immediately associated with those bankers and eminent merchants who agreed to support the credit of government, and to meet that run upon the funds, on which the conspirators had greatly founded their hopes of furthering their undertaking, by rendering the government, as it were, bankrupt. My father was chosen one of the members of this formidable body of the nation, and the whole debt of the household was assumed by his zeal, skill, and activity. He was also the organ by which they communicated with government, and contrived, from funds belonging to his own house, or over which he had command, to find purchasers for a quantity of the national stock, which was suddenly hung into the market at a deprecatory price when the rebellion broke out. I was not idle myself, but obtained a commission, and levied, at my father's expense, about two hundred men, with whom I joined General Carpenter's army.

The rebellion, in the mean time, had extended itself to Scotland, where the Saltire was recognized as the national flag, and a stormy and dangerous storm was brewing. The whole household was engaged in preparing for the worst. The household was easily persuaded to join that unfortunate standard. Before doing so, however, he exhibited a degree of precaution which no one could have suspected him of, or wished for his will.

By this document he devised his estates at Osbaldstone-Hall, and so forth, to his sons successively, and their male heirs, until he came to Rashleigh, whom, on his death, he had named as his successor in all his debts. He was solicited by his friends to remain, and to make his fortune in politics. He declined this offer, and retired to his seat, which he visited but once, and then with the least possible show of enjoyment. He was a man of few words, and a man of few actions.

There was an article, by which he bequeathed to the niece of his late wife, Diana Vernon, now Lady Diana Vernon Beauchamp, some disposition of his lands, but it was not acted upon, and a great part of it is said to have been used by his will.

But Heaven had decreed a more speedy extinction of his family lineage than, most probably, he himself had reckoned. He was the first master of the conspirators at a place called Green-Riggs. Throncsill Osbaldstone quarrelled about precedence with a gentleman of the Northumbrian border, to the full as fierce and intractable as himself. In spite of all remonstrances, they gave their commander a specimen of how far their discipline might be relied upon, by fighting it out with their rapiers, and my kinship was killed out the spot. His death was a great loss to Sir Hildebrand, for, notwithstanding his infernal temper, he had a grain or two of more sense than belonged to the rest of the brothers.

Parcell, the son, died also in his calling. He had a wager with another gentleman, who, from his exploits in that line, had acquired the formidable epithet of Brandy Scowlock, which should drink the largest cup of strong liquor when King James was proclaimed by the insurgents at Morpeth. The exploit was something enormous. I forget the exact quantity of brandy which he consumed. But it seems, that ever, and all the time, excepting the day after which he expired at the end of three days, with the word water, water, perpetually on his tongue. Dickson broke his neck near Warrington Bridge, in escaping from an attack of tertian ague, which he wished to palm upon a Manchester merchant who had joined the insurgents. He pushed the animal at a five-barred gate; she fell in the leap, and the unfortunate jockey lost his life.

Wilfred the fool, as sometimes behafls, had the best fortune of any of the party. He was sent to Newcastleton, in Lancashire, on the day that General Carpenter attacked the barricades, fighting with great bravery though I have heard he was never able exactly to comprehend the cause of quarrel, and did not uniformly return on which he was engaged. John also behaved very boldly in the same engagement, and received several wounds, of which he was not happy enough to die on the spot.

Old Sir Hildebrand, entirely broken-hearted by these successive losses, became by the next day's surrender, one of the unhappy prisoners, and was lodged in Newgate with his wounded son John.

I was not sorry, as it was a source of duty, and lost no time, therefore, in endeavouring to relieve the distresses of these near relations. My father's interest with government, and the general compassion excited by a parent who had sustained the successive loss of so many sons within so short a time, would have prevented my uncle and cousin from being brought to trial for high treason; but their doom was given forth from a greater tribunal. John died of his wounds in Newgate, recommending to me with his last breath, a cast of hawks which he had at the Hall, and a black spangled bitch called Lucy.

My grief was turned to anger when I beheld the two beaten down to the very earth by his family calamities, and the circumstances in which he unexpectedly found himself. He said little, but seemed grateful for such attentions as circumspection and humanity had been able to offer. I witnessed his meeting with my father for the first time for so many years, and under circumstances so melancholy; but judging from my father's extreme depression of mind, I must say it was in the last degree. Sir Hildebrand spoke with great bitterness against Rashleigh, now his only surviving child; had upon him the run of his house, and the estate of his father and uncle's, and declared, that neither he nor they would have plunged into political intrigue, but for that very member of his family who had been the first to desert them. He once or twice mentioned Diana, always with great affection; and once he said, while I sat by his bedside—"Never, since Throncsill and all of them are dead, I am sorry you cannot have her.

The expression affected me much at the time; for it was a usual custom of the poor old Baronet's, when joyously setting forth upon the morning's chase, to distinguish Throncsill, who was a favourite, while he summoned the rest more or less by name. The half tone of his voice increased till it was used to hallo, 'Call Throncsill all of them,' contrasted sadly with the woebegone and self-abandoning note in which he uttered the disconsolate words which I have above quoted. He mentioned Diana, always with great affection; and once he said, while I sat by his bedside—"Never, since Throncsill and all of them are dead, I am sorry you cannot have her.

The expression affected me much at the time; for it was a usual custom of the poor old Baronet's, when joyously setting forth upon the morning's chase, to distinguish Throncsill, who was a favourite, while he summoned the rest more or less by name.
the world which had least charms for him. But formally, he had been only the fox in the fable, containing what was beyond his reach; and, moreover, I doubt not that the execrable dislike which he entertained against Robsdrig (now Sir Robsdrig) Osbaldistone Hall, had in no small degree contributed to his dislike for the man, his heir, Sir Hind-brain's will and settlement, corroborated his nature's desire to maintain it. He had been too simply disposed, he said, and, indeed, his brother's will had repaid him the disbursements, but the injury, by leaving the wreck of his property to Frank, the natural heir, and he was detested, the beast should take effect.

As for Hind-brain, his action was unaccountable, proving altogether a contemptible presence an opponent. The information he had given to the government was critically valuable, and its extreme plausibility, with the extent of his influence, must not be drawn out beyond the period of all our natural lives. To avert these delays as much as possible, my father, by the advice of his counsel learned in the law, purchased, in person, the rights to certain large mortgages, affecting Osbaldistone-Hall. Perhaps, however, the opportunity to convert a great share of the large profits which accrued from the rapid rise of that title into a just satisfaction of the old man, and the experience he had so lately had of the evils of commerce, enabled him to realize, in this manner, a considerable part of his property. At any rate, I know, that instead of commanding me to the desk, as I fully expected, having intimated my willingness to comply with his wishes; however, during my absence, I received his directions to go to Osbaldistone-Hall, and inform the possessor of it as the heir and representative of the family. I was directed to apply to Squire Inglewood for the copy of my uncle's will deposited with him, and take all necessary measures to secure that possession, which seems my only interest points of the law. At another time I should have been delighted with this change of situation. But now Osbaldistone-Hall was accompanied with many painful recollections. Spring, however, I thought, that in that neighbourhood only I was likely to acquire some information respecting the fate of Diana Vernon. I had ever looked on it as a mystery into which I could have wished it. But I could obtain no precise information on the subject. It was in vain that I endeavoured, by such acts of kindness as their situation suggested, to consolidate the confidence of some distant relations who were among the prisoners in Newgate. A pride which I could not condemn, and a natural suspicion of the Whig, Frank Osbaldistone, coming to the double-distilled traitor Rashleigh, closed every heart and tongue, and I only received a cold and external, in exchange for such benefits as I had power to offer. The arm of the law was also gradually abrogating the numbers of those whom I endeavoured to preserve, and the hope of the survivors became gradually more contracted towards all whom they conceived to be concerned with the existing government. As they were led gradually, and by depositions to execute, those who suffered lost interest in mankind, and the desire of communicating with them. I shall long remember what one of them, Mr. Hind-brain, in his own words, inquired of me: "Mr. Frank Osbaldistone, I must suppose you mean me kindly, and therefore I thank you. But, by G—, I cannot be fattened like poultry, when they are in the habit of what is called a place of execution, and know that their own necks are to be twisted round in their turn."

Upon the whole, therefore, I was glad to escape from London, from Newgate, and from the scenes which had exhibited, to breathe the free air of Northumb-erland. Andrew Fairnservice had continued in my service, more from my father's pleasure than my own. At present there seemed a prospect that his local acquaintance with Osbaldistone-Hall and its vicinity might be useful; and, of course, he accompanied me. He was not only intimate with the master, in the respect of getting rid of him, by establishing him in his old quarters. I cannot conceive how he could prevail upon my father to interest himself in him, unless it were by the art which he possessed in so considerable a degree, of afflicting an extreme attachment to his master, which natural affiiction he made compatible in practice with playing all manner of tricks employment, and only against his master being cheated by any one but himself.

We performed our journey to the North without any remarkable adventure; and we found the country, so lately agitated by rebellion, now peaceful and in good order. The nearer we approached to Osbaldistone-Hall, the more did my heart sink at the thought of cutting that deserted mansion; so that, in order to postpone the evil day, I resolved first to make my visit at Mr. Justice Inglewood's. That venerable person had been much harassed with thoughts of what he had been, and what he should now be, with a zeal for King George and the Protestant succession, which, very different from the feelings of his old patron, Mr. Johnson had more occasion to restrain within the bounds of the law, than to stimulate me to the afair.

Old Justice Inglewood received me with great courtesy and readily exhibited his uncle's will, which seemed to be without a flaw. He was for some time in doubt as to whether I was in his presence; but when he found, that though a supporter of the present government upon principle, I was disposed to think with pity on those who had opposed it on a mistaken feeling of loyalty and duty, his discourse became a very diverting medley of what he had done, and what he had left undone, the pains he had taken to prevent some sources from joining, and to wank at the escape of others, who had been so unlucky as to engage in the affair.

We were tele-tete, and several bamped had been quaffed by the Justice's special desire; when, on one occasion, a sudden shock of pain seemed to almost overpower me. The justice guessed at the cause and the health of poor Miss Vernon, the rose of the wilderness, the health of Cheviot, and the blossom that's transplanted to an eternal convent. But I never saw Miss Vernon's face; I exclaimed, in great astonishment. "I thought his Excellency—"

"Pooch! pooch! his Excellency and Lordship's all a humbug now, you know—more St. German's titles—Earl of Beaufcho, and ambassador plenipotentiary from France, when the Duke Regent of Orleans scarce knew that he lived, I dare say. But you must have seen old Sir Frederick Vernon at the hall, when he paid the part of Father Vaughn?"

"Good Heaven! then Vaughn was Miss Vernon's father!"

"To be sure he was," said the Justice, coolly: "There's no use in keeping the secret now, for he must be out of the way by this time. Through no doubt, it would be my duty to apprehend him. Come, off with your bumpter to my dear lost Die!"

some of the bulky forms of my deceased kinsmen were, like the gigantic spectres of a romance, to appear in the gate-way, and dispute my entrance.

While I was engaged in these and thoughts, my follower, Andrew, whose feelings were of a very different nature, exerted himself in thundering alternately on every door in the building, calling, at the same time for admittance, In a tone so loud as to intimate, that at least, was fully sensible of his newly acquired importance, as enque of the body to the new lord of the manor. At length, timidly and reductively, Anthony Sydall, my uncle's aged butler, and major-domo, presented himself at a lower window, well fenced with iron bars, and inquired our business.

"We are come to take your charge off your my ald friend," said Andrew Footman, who your keys as soon as possible.
I'll take the plate and map of yours,

Checking with some difficulty the forwardness of my follower, I explained to Sydall the nature of my right, and the title I had to demand admittance into the Town Hall. The old man seemed much agitated and distressed, and testified manifest reluctance to give me entrance, although it was couched in an humble and submissive tone. I alluded to the nature of natural feelings which really did the old man honour; but continued peremptory in my demand of admittance, explaining to him that his refusal would obligate me to apply for Mr. Ingleswood's protection. He examined the threat of the law sounded dreadful to the old man's conscience, as he was of the suspicions under which he, himself, lay, from his religion and his devotion to Sir Hildebrand and his sons. He, indeed, with fear and trembling, one of the posterior entrances, which were covered with many a bolt and bar, and humbly hoped that some turn for the better might be made in the discharge of his duty. I reassured him, and told him I had the better opinion of him for his caution.

"Say have not I," said Andrew; "Sydall is an old sneak-dracher; he wadas looking as white as a sheet, and his knees knocking together, unless it were for something more than he's like to tell us."

"But I want you to explain the matter," replied the usher, "to say such things of an old friend and fellow-servant!—Where,—following me humbly along the passage, where would be your honour's pleasure to have a word with me? I can show you will find the house very dull and dreary—but perhaps you mean to ride back to Inglewood Place to dinner?"

"I light a fire in the library," I replied.

"I will step in. I have some trouble with that man; nobody has sat there this many a day, and the room smokes, for the daws have built in the chimney this spring, and there were no young men about the Hall to pull them down."

"Our sin reck's better than other folk's fire," said Andrew; "his honour likes the library. He's none of your Papishers, that delight in blinded ignorance, Mr. Sydall."

Very reluctantly, as it appeared to me, the usher led the way to the library, and, contrary to what he had given me to expect, the interior of the apartment looked like a lost and solitary place, and was more comfortable than usual. There was a fire in the grate, which burned clearly, notwithstanding what Sydall had reported of the vent. Taking up the tongue of the wood, I was rather perforce enabled to conceal his own confusion, the usher observed, "it was burning clear now, but had smoked wondrously in the morning."

Wishing to be alone, till I recovered myself from the first painful sensations which every thing around me recalled, I desired old Sydall to call the land-steward, who lived at about a quarter of a mile from the Hall. He appeared with obvious reluctance. I next ordered Andrew to procure the attendance of a couple of stout fellows upon whom he could rely, the population around being Papists, and Sir Rasilleigh, who was capable of any desperate enterprise, being in the house. Andrew Forsaswick undertook this task with great cheerfulness, and promised to bring me up from Trimley-Knowe, "two true-blue Presbyterians like himself, that would face and out-face bat, boar, beaver, the gods, and the Pretender, and olvthe will be o' their company myself, for the very first night that I was at Osbaldeston Hall, the blight be on ilk blossom in my bit yard, if I dina see that was." Andrew Forsaswick was very sly, so that the forms which stood before me were very real and true. It was Diana herself, though many.

There was a silence after these words, of which I well understood the mournful import. The father of Diana's was my guest; I trusted, my hope, or, being united to her now, as he had shown himself

"We will now," said he to his daughter, "intrude

I endeavored to abstract my mind from the singular circumstances in which I found myself; recovered my feelings which I had during the exciting object were removed, were asperated in my immediate impressions, and of whom I was so soon to part with for ever.

He was written in every book which I attempted read; and her image forced itself on me in the train of my reflection. He was like no other man like the officious slave of Prior's Solomon—

Aben was ready to namber her name.

I alternately gave way to these thoughts, and grumbled against them, sometimes yielding to a sense melting tenderness of sorrow which was sensu-tural to me, sometimes arming myself with the pride of one who had experienced what he regarded unmerited rejection. I paced the library until I chafed myself into a temporary frenzy. I then wept myself on the couch, and endeavored to disemlove myself; but it was in vain to make an effort to compose myself— that I lay without notice of finger or of muscle, as still as if I had become a corpse—that I endeavored to divert or banish quieting thoughts, by fixing my mind on some account of repetition or analytical process. My blood bed, to my feverish apprehension, in pulsations and fluctuated in my veins like boiling liquid fire.

At length I arose, opened the window, and breath ed for some time in the calm moonlight, receiving with part of the freshness of the air from the clear and calm scene, without which I had become beyond the command of my resolution. I resumed my place on the couch with less Heavenly tranquility, but with more solved for endurance. In a short time, a sudden enveloped over my senses; still, however, in senses blunted, my soul was awake to the true feelings of my situation, and my dreams were of terrestrial anguish and external objects of terror.

I remember a strange agony, under which I received myself and Diana in the power of MacGrig-or, and about to be precipitated from a peak on the lake; the signal was to be the discharge of a load, fired by Sir Frederick Vernon, who, in the
of a cardinal, officiated at the ceremony.

Nathaniel could be more lively than the impression which received of this imaginary scene. I could paint, at this moment, the mute and courageous submission expressed in Diana's features—the wild and ting of the executioners, who crowded me with "moping and boundless" arms outstretched, ting, and each more hideous than that which preced ed.

I saw the rigid and inflexible fanatic pass ed in the face of the father—I saw him lift the match—the signal light—be passed again and again, in violent thunders, by echoes of the surrounding cliffs, and I woke fas ced and overwhelmed with the sudden impression.

The sounds in my dream were not ideal. They were perceived, my waking ears, but it was three minutes ere I could collect my senses.
y to understand that they proceeded from a violent knocking at the gate. I leaped from my couched in great apprehension, took my sword under my arm, and I hastened to the admission of any one. But my route was necessarily circuitous, because the library looked not upon the quadrangle, but into the gardens. When I had reached a staircase, the window which opened upon the entrance, I cooled; I heard the feeble and intermittent sounds of Sydall ex-postulating with rough voices, which demanded admittance, by the warrant of Justice Standish, and in the King's name, and threatened the old domestic with the severest penal consequences, if he refused instant obedience. Ere they had ceased, I heard, to my unspeakable provocation, the voice of Andrew bidding Sydall stand aside, and let him open the door. I should have been in Kere 1995, nothing to fear—we have spent both blood and gild for him—We dehna need to durn ourselves like some folks, Mr. Sydall—We are neither Papists nor Jacobites, you know.

It was in vain I accelerated my pace down stairs; I heard bolt after bolt withdrawn by the overcome, while all the time he was boasting his own and our good faith to royalty to King George; and I could easily calculate that the party must enter before I could arrive at the door to replace the bars. Devoting the back of Andrew Fair service to the end that I might not be heard, I run back to the library, barricaded the door as I best could, and hastened to that by which Diana and her father entered, and begged for instant admission. So I found myself in a long body, you see. Diana was ready dressed, and betrayed neither perturbation nor fear.

"Danger is so familiar to us," she said, "that we are not afraid of it as much as you. My father is always up—he is in Sydall's apartment—We shall escape into the garden, and thence by the post gate (I have the key from Sydall in case of need) into the wilderness. If you keep it quiet, any one may now alive—Keep them a few minutes in play. And, dear, dear Frank, once more, fare thee well!"

She vanished like a meteor to join her father, and the intruders were rapping violently, and attempting to break open the library door by the time I had returned into it.

"You robber dogs!" I exclaimed, wildly mistaking the purpose of their disturbance, "if you do not immediately open the house I will fire my blunderbuss through the door.

"Fire a file's bauble!" said Andrew Fair service; "it is Mr. Clerk Johnson, with a legal warrant!"

"And I heard the voice of that execrable petitbourgeois, "the bodies of certain persons in my warrant named, charged of high treason under the 13th of King William, chapter third."

And the violence on the door was renewed. "I am rising gentlemen," said I, desirous to gain as much time as possible—"commit no violence—give me leave to look at your warrant, and, if it is formal and legal, I shall not oppose it."

"God save great George our King!" execrated Andrew. I could ye that ye would find nac Jacobite, nac Jew."

Spinning out the time as much as possible, I was at length compelled to open the door, which they would otherwise have forced.

Mr. Johnson entered, with several assistants, among whom I discovered the younger Wingfield, to whom, doubtless, he was obliged for his information, and exhibited his warrant, directed not only against Frederick Vernon, an attainted traitor, but also against Diana Vernon, spinster, and Francis Osbaldistone, gentleman, accused of miscarriage of treason. It was a case in which resistance would have been madness; therefore, after capitulating for a few minutes delay, surrendered myself a prisoner. I had next the mortification to see Johnson go straight to the chamber of Miss Vernon, and I learned, without the least hesitation or difficulty, he went to the room where Sir Frederick had slept. "The barn has stolen away," said the brute, "but her form is warm—the greyhounds will have her by the haunches yet."

A scream from the garden announced that he proclaimed to the dogs. In the course of a few minutes, Rashleigh entered the library with Sir Frederick Vernon and his daughter as prisoners. "The fox," he said, "knew his old earth, but he forgot it could stop when he stopped. I am sure that he had not forgot the garden gate, Sir Frederick—or, if that title suits you better, most noble Lord Beauchamp."

"Rashleigh," said Sir Frederick, "thou art a detestable villain! "I better deserved the name, Sir Knight, or my Lord, when, under the direction of an able tutor, I sought to introduce civil war into the bosom of a peaceful country. But I have done my best," said he, looking earnestly at me. "I could not help it." I hold no longer. I had designed to watch their proceedings in silence, but I felt that I must speak or die. "If hell," I said, "has one complexion worse than another, it is where villainy is masked by hypocrisy."

"He! my gentle cousin," said Rashleigh, raising a candle towards me, and surveying me from head to foot; "Is Charles Byron, I suppose, who can forgive your spleen—it is hard to lose an estate and a mistress in one night; for we shall take possession of this poor manor-house in the name of the law, for the sake of the young gentleman."

While Rashleigh braved it out in this manner, I could see that he put a strong force upon his feelings, both of anger and shame. But his state of mind was not more obvious than mine: and when he pressed me, "Rashleigh," she said, "I pity you—for, deep as the evil which you have laboured to do me, and the evil you have actually done, I cannot hate you so much as I would wish to."

"If this evil," said he, "be to make the world a better place, no evil be done may be the work of an hour, but will furn us, in reflection for your life,—of what nature I leave to your own conscience, which will not slumber for ever."

Rashleigh strode once or twice across the room, came up to the side-table, on which wine was still standing, and poured out a large glass with a trembling hand; but when he saw that he observed his tremor, he suppressed it by a strong effort, and, looking at us with fixed and daring countenance, carried the bumper to his head without spilling a drop. "It is my father's old burgundy," he said, looking to Johnson; "without being allowed to conclude his sentence."

"If this evil," said he, "be to get proper persons to take care of the house and property in my name, and turn out the honest old butler, and that foolish Scotch rascal. Meanwhile, we will conduct the Baron and the hoyden to ye of courtesy,—I have provided the old family coach for your convenience," he said, "though I am not ignorant that even the lady could brave the night air or horse or on horseback, were the errand more to her mind."

Andrew wrung his hands. "I only said that my master was surely speaking to a ghost in the library,—and the villain Lancelot to betray an old friend, that sang off the same Psalm-book with him every Sabbath for twenty years!"

He was turned out of the house, together with Sydall, without being allowed to conclude his lamentation. Its expulsion, however, led to some singular consequences. Resolving, according to his own story, to go down for the night where Mother Simpson would give him a lodging for old acquaintance's sake, he had just got clear of the avenue, and into the old wood as it was called, though it was now used as pasture-ground rather than woodland, where he suddenly lighted on a drover of Scotch cattle, which were lying there to pasture there after the day's journey. At this Andrew was in no way surprised, it being the well-known custom of his countrymen, who take care of those droves, to quarter themselves upon the stock, and on the grass-ground they can find, and despair before day to break escape paying for their night's lodging. But he was both surprised and astonished at the Highlanders, springing on, accosting him of dismount the cattle, and refusing him to pass forward till he spoke to his master. The mountaineer conducted Andrew into a thicket, where he found three or four men of his countrymen. "And," said Andrew, "I saw some they were o'er many men for the drove; and from the questions they put to me, I judged they had other tow on their rock." They quoted what was privately said about all that had passed at Osebladstone-Hall and seemed surprised and concerned at the report he made to them. "And truth," said Andrew, "I told them a' I kend; for dirks and pistols were what I could never observe among them."

They talked in whispers among themselves, and at length collected their cattle together and drove them close up to the entrance of the avenue, which might be half a mile from the house. The mountaineer proceeded to drag together some felled trees which lay in the vicinity, so as to make a temporary barricade across the road about fifteen yards beyond the avenue. It was now near daybreak, and there was a pale eastern gleam mingled with the fading moonlight, so that objects could be discovered with some distinctness. The lumbering sound of a coach, drawn by four horses, and escorted by six men on horseback, was heard coming up the avenue. The Highlanders listened attentively. The carriage contained Mr. Johnson and his unfortunate prisoners. The escort consisted of the jailer, two civil officers, and the officers and their assistants. So soon as we had passed the gate at the head of the avenue, it was shut behind the cabalado by a Highlandman, stationed there for the purpose. At the same time, the barricade was impeded in its further progress by the cattle, amongst which we were involved, and by the barricade in front. Two of the escort dismounted to remove the felled trees, which they might think were left there as an accident or carelessness. The others began with their whips to drive the cattle from the road.

"Who dare abuse our cattle?" said a rough voice.

—"Shoot him, Angus."—

Rashleigh instantly called out, "A rescue—a rescue!" and, firing a pistol, wounded the man who spoke.

"Claymore!" cried the leader of the Highlanders, and a scuffle instantly commenced. The officers of the law, surprised at so sudden an attack, and not usually possessing the most desperate bravery, made but an imperfect defence, considering the superiority of their numbers. Some attempted to ride back to the Hall, but on a pistol being fired from behind the gate, they conceived themselves surrounded, and at length fled in disorder. Rashleigh, meanwhile, had dismounted, and on foot had maintained a desperate and single-handed conflict with the leader of the band. The window of the carriage had induced him to witness it. At length Rashleigh dropped.

"Will you ask forgiveness for the sake of God, King James, and said friendship?" said a voice which I knew not well.

"No, never," said Rashleigh, firmly.

"Then, traitor, die in your treason!" retorted MacGregor, and plunged his sword in his prostrate antagonist.

In the next moment he was at the carriage-door—handled out Miss Verton, assisted her father and me to alight, and dragging out the attorney, head foremost, threw him under the wheels of the coach. "Mr. O'Beary," he said, in a whisper, "you have nothing to fear—I must look after those who have—Your friends will soon be in safety—Farewell, and forget not the MacGregor."

The whole of the curse of a dark countenance round him, and, surrying Diana and her father along with him, they were almost instantly lost in the glades of the forest. The coachman and—ostilion had abandoned their horses, and fled like the wind. The first shot at them had killed the whole of the mountaineers, but the animals, stopped by the barricade, remained perfectly still; and well for Johnson that they did so, for the slightest motion would have dragged the coachmen from his body. My first object was to relieve Mr. O'Beary, for such was the rascal's terror that he never could have risen by his own exertions. I next comwith the sole purpose of favouring Rashleigh's a, and removing me from Osbaldstone-Hall.

We were struck off the list of attorneys, as we were reduced to poverty and contempt.

I returned to London when I had put my affairs in at Osbaldstone-Hall, and felt happy to escape a place which suggested so many painful recollections. My anxiety was now acute to learn the fate of Diana and her father. A French gentleman came to London on commercial business, was seized with a letter to me from Miss Vernon;
and my mind at rest respecting their safety.

I gave me an opportunity of ascertaining the true state of affairs. The Scottish nobles and gentry engaged in revolution, as well as those of England, were alarmed and anxious to further the escape of Sir Fracis Vernon, who, as an old and trusted agent of King George, was regarded with equal matter of concern. The place of meeting was at Osbald-stone-Hall. You had already heard how nearly his escape had been discovered by the unhappy Rash-leigh.

It succeeded, however, perfectly; for when Sir Frederick and his daughter were again at that place, I was informed that they had been discovered through the knowledge of a man named Gregor, who had been a friend of Sir Frederick and his daughter. I was then sent to the western sea, and safely embarked for France. The same man told me, that Sir Frederick was not ex-declined to survive for many months a lingering disase consequent to his unwise and imprudent conduct.

The news reached me, and I frankly told the of my affection to my father, who was not a man to suffer such a disappointment, and

He was very desirous to see me "seen life," as he called it; and he was sensible

It is mighty well, said the priest; pray, landlord, bring me those books, for I have a mind to see them. With all my heart, answered the host; and going to his chamber, he brought out a little old cloak-bag, with a padlock and chain to it, and opening it, he took out three large volumes, and some manuscript papers written in a fine character.—Jarvis's Translation.
INTRODUCTION.

As I may, without vanity, presume that the name and official description prefixed to this Proem will secure it, from the sedate and reflecting part of mankind, to whom only I would be understood to address myself, such attention as is due to the sedulous exertion of youth, and the careful perusal of my Sabbath duties. I will forbear to hold up a candle to the daylight, or point out to the judicious those recommendations of my labours which they must necessarily anticipate from the precepts of the little page. Nevertheless, I am not unaware, that as Envy always dogs Merit at the heels, there may be those who will whatever, that albeit my learning and good principles cannot (I am told) be denied by any one, yet that my situation at Ganderleigh hath been more favourable to my acquisitions in learning than to the enlargement of my views of the ways and works of the present generation. To which objection, if, peradventure, any such shall be directed, my answer shall be threefold:

First, Ganderleigh is, as it were, the central part—the navel (πόλος τοῦ κόσμου) of this our native realm of Scotland; so that men, from every corner thereof, when travelling on their concerns of business, either towards our metropolis of Edinburgh, or towards our metropolis and mart of gain, whereby I insinuate Glasgow, are frequently led to make Ganderleigh their abiding stage and place of rest for the night. And it must be acknowledged by the most sceptical, that I, who have sat in the leathern arm-chair, on the left-hand side of the fire, in the common room of the Wallace Inn, winter and summer, for every evening in my life, during forty years bypast, (the Christian Sabbaths only excepted) must have seen more of the manners and customs of various tribes and people, than if I had sought them out by my own particular travel and bodily labour. Even so doth the toilman at the well-frequented turnpike on the Wellbrae-head, sitting at his ease in his own dwelling, gather more receipt of custom, than if, moving forth upon the road, he were to require a contribution from each person whom he chance to meet in his journey, when, according to the vulgar edage, he might possibly be greeted with more kicks than halfpence.

But, secondly, supposing it again urged, that Ithaca, the most wise of the Greeks, acquired his renown, as the Roman poet hath assured us, by visiting states and men, I reply to the Zulus who shall adhere to this objection, that, de Jure, I have seen states and men also, for I have visited the famous cities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, the former twice, and the latter three times, in the course of my earthly pilgrimare. And, moreover, I had the honour to sit in the General Assembly, (meaning, as an auditor, the galleries thereof) and have heard as much good speaking on the law of patronage, as, with the fructification thereof in mine own understanding, hath made me, as it were, an oracle upon that doctrine ever since my safe and happy return to Ganderleigh.

Again—and thirdly, if it be nevertheless pretended that my information and knowledge of mankind, however extensive, and however painfully acquired, by constant domestic inquiry, and by foreign travel, is, nay, likewise, incompetent to the task of recording the pleasant narratives of my Landlord, I will let those critics know, to their own eternal shame and confusion, as well as to the abashment and discomfiture of all who shall rashly take up a song against me, that I am not the writer, redactor, or compiler, of the Tales of my Landlord; nor am I, in one single iota, answerable for their contents, more or less. And, now, ye generation of critics, who raise yourselves up as if it were brazen serpents, to hiss with your tongues, and to smite with your stings, bow yourselves down to your native dust, and acknowledge that yours have been the thoughts of ignorance, and the words of vain foolishness. Lo! ye are caught in your own snare, and your own pit hath yawned for you. Turn, then, aside from the task that is too heavy for you; destroy not your teeth by gnawing a file; waste not your strength by yawning against a castle wall; nor spend your breath in contending in smoothness with a fleet steed; and let those weigh the Tales of my Landlord, who shall bring with them the sealed cask of sandown cleansed from the rest of prejudice by the hands of intelligent modesty. For these alone they were compiled, as will appear from a brief narrative which my zeal for truth compelled me to make supplementary to the present Proem.

It is well known that my Landlord was a pleasing and a factious man, acceptable unto all the parish of Ganderleigh, excepting only the Laird, the Exciemist, and those for whom he refused to draw liquor upon trust. Their causes of dislike I will touch separately, adding my own reflection thereof.

His honour, the Laird, accused our Landlord, deceased, of having encouraged, in various times and places, the destruction of hares, rabbits, foxes, black and grey, partridges, moor potts, roe-deer, and other birds and quadrupeds, at unlawful seasons, and contrary to the laws of this realm, which have secured, in their wisdom, the slaughter of such animals for the great of the earth, whom I have remarked to take an uncommon (though to me, so unintelligible) pleasure therein. Now, in humble deference to his honour, and in justifiable defence of my friend deceased I reply to this charge, that however the form of such animals might appear to be similar to those protected by the law, yet it was a mere captio sine causa; for what resembled hares were, in fact, klib kibs, and those pertaining of the appearance of moor-fowl, were truly dund eatures, and consumed and eaten as moose and not otherwise.

Again, the Exciemist pretended, that my deceased Landlord did encourage that species of manufacture called distillation, without having an especial permission from the Great, technically called a licence, for doing so. Now, I stand up to confront this falsehood; and in defence of him, his gauging,-stick, and pen and inkhorn, I tell him, that I never saw, or tasted, a glass of unlawful aqua vitae in the house of my Landlord; nay, that, on the contrary, we needed not such devices, in respect of a pleasing and somewhat seductive liquor, which was vended and consumed at the Wallace Inn, under the name of mousey ale. If there is a penalty against manufacturing such a liquor, let him show me the statute; and when he does, I'll tell him if I will obey it or no.

Concerning those who came to my Landlord for liquor, and went thirsty away, for lack of present coin, or future credit, I cannot but say it has grieved my bowels as if the case had been mine own. Nevertheless, my Landlord considered the necessities of a thirsty soul, and would permit them, in extreme need, and when their soul was impoverished for lack of moisture, to drink to the full value of their watches and wearing apparel, exclusively of their inferior habiliments, which he was uniformly inexorable in obliging them to retain, for the credit of the house. As to mine own part, I may well say, that he never refused me that modicum of refreshment with which I was wont to recruit nature after the fatigue of my school. It is true, I taught his five sons English and Latin, writing, book-keeping, with a tinier and more accurate hand, and that I instructed his daughter in psalmody. Nor do I remember of any fee or henta receive from him on account of those my labours, except the compositions aforesaid. Nevertheless this compensation suited my humour well, since it is a hard sentence to had a dry throat wait till quarter-day.
INTRODUCTION TO THE TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

But, truly, were I to speak my simple conceit and belief, I think my Landlord was chiefly moved to waive in my behalf the usual requisition of a symbol, or reckoning, from the pleasure he was wont to take in my conversation, which, though solid and edifying in the main, was, like a well-built palace, decorated with facetious narratives and devices, tending much to the enhancement and ornament thereof. And so pleased was my Landlord of the Wallace in his replies during such colloquies, that there was no district in Scotland, yes, and no peculiar, and, as it were, distinctive custom therein practised, but was discussed between us; insomuch, that those who stood by were wont to say, it was worth a bottle of ale to hear us communicate with each other. And not a few travellers, from distant parts, as well as from the remote districts of our kingdom, were wont to mingle in the conversation, and to tell news that had been gathered in foreign lands, or preserved from oblivion in this our own.

Now I chanced to have contracted for teaching the lower classes with a young person called Peter, or Patrick, Pattieson, who had been educated for our Holy Kirk, yes, and, by the license of presbytery, his voice opened therein as a preacher, who delighted in the collection of olden tales and legends, and in garnishing them with the flowers of poesy, whereas he was a vain and frivolous professor. For he followed not the example of those strong poets whom I proposed to him as a pattern, but formed verisation of a clumsy and modern texture, to the composing whereof was necessary small pains and less thought. And hence I have chid him as being one of those who bring forward the fatal revolution prophesied by Mr. Robert Canny, in his Vaccination on the Death of the celebrated Dr. John Donum:

Now these art gree, and by strict laws will be Too hard for libertines in poetry;
Till verse (by thee refined) in this last age
Turn naught but rayne.

I had also disputes with him touching his indulging rather a flowing and redundant than a concise and stately diction in his prose excursions. But notwithstanding these symptomes of inferior taste, and a humour of contradicting his betters upon passages of dubious construction in Latin authors, I did grievously lament when Peter Pattieson was removed from me by death, even as if he had been the offspring of my own loins. And in respect his papers had been left in my care, to answer funeral and death-bed expenses. I conceived myself entitled to dispose of one parcel thereof, entitled, "Tales of my Landlord," to one cunning in the trade (as it is called) of bookelling. He was a mirthful man, of small stature, cunning in counterfeiting of voices, and in making facetious tales and responses, and whom I have to laud for the truth of his dealings towards me.

Now, therefore, the world may see the injustice that charges me with incapacity to write these narratives, seeing, that though I have proved that I could have written them if I would, yet, not having done so, the counseil will deservedly fall, as at all due, upon the memory of Mr. Peter Pattieson; whereas I must be justly entitled to the praise, when any is due, seeing that, as the Dean of St. Patrick's witty and logically expresst in it,

That without which a thing is not,
Is Causa sine quae non.

The work, therefore, is unto me as a child is to a parent; as the which child, if it proveth worthy, the parent hath honour and praise; but if otherwise, the disgrace will deservedly attach to itself alone.

I have only further to intimate, that Mr. Peter Pattieson, in arranging these Tales for the press, hath more consulted his own fancy than the accuracy of the narrative; nay, that he hath sometimes blended two or three stories together for the new grace of his plots. Of which infidelity, although I disapprove and enter my testimony against it, yet I have not taken upon me to correct the same, in respect it was the will of the deceased, that his manuscript should be submitted to the press without diminution or alteration. A fanciful nicety it was on the part of my deceased friend, who, if thinking wisely, ought rather to have confounded me, by all the tender ties of our friendship and common pursuits, to have carefully revised, altered, and augmented, at my judgment and discretion. But the will of the dead must be scrupulously obeyed, even when we wesp over their pertinacity and self-deception. So, gentle reader, I bid you farewell, recommending you to such facts as the moun儘ains of your own country produce; and I will only further premise, that each Tale is preceded by a short introduction, mentioning the persons by whom, and the circumstances under which, the materials thereof were collected.

JEDEHIAH CLEISBROTHAM
THE BLACK DWARF.
INTRODUCTION TO THE BLACK DWARF.

David Ritchie, a native of Tweeddale. He was the son of Mr. Ritchie, a farmer of Stobo, and must have been the mis-shapen form which he exhibited, though he seems imputed to ill-use when in infancy. He was bred in Edinburgh, and had wandered about, playing at his trade, from all which he was chased by theable attention which his hideous singularity of form attracted wherever he came. One day, having gone to visit him with another lady, he took them through his garden, and was showing them, with much pride and good-humour, all his rich and tastefully assorted borders, when they happened to stop near a plot of cabbages which had been somewhat injured by the caterpillars. Throwing back his jealously as he was ushering her into his garden, he fancied he observed her spit, and exclaimed, with great ferocity, 'Am I a bond, woman! that ye spit at me—that ye spit at me!' and without listening to any answer or excuse, drove her out of his garden with imprumances and insult. When irritated by persons for whom he entertained little respect, his misanthropy displayed itself in words, and sometimes in actions, of still greater rudeness; and he used on such occasions the most unusual and singularly savage imprecations and threats...Nature maintains a certain balance of good and evil in all her works; and there is no state perhaps so utterly desolate, which does not possess some source of gratification peculiar to itself. Driven into solitude, he became an admirer of the beauties of nature. His garden, which he sedulously cultivated, and from a piece of wild moorland made a very productive spot, was his pride and his delight; but he was also an admirer of mon natural beauty: the soft sweep of the green hill, the bubbling of a clear fountain, or the complexity of a wild thicket were scenes on which he often gazed for hours, and, as he said, with inexpressable delight. It was perhaps for this reason that he was fond of Shemstone's pastoral, and some parts of Para...said Lost. The author has heard his muses unsual voice repeat the celebrated description of Paradise, which he seemed fully to appreciate. His other studies were of a different cast, chiefly polemical. He never went to the parish church, and was therefore suspected of entertaining heterodox opinions, though his objection was probably to the concourse of spectators, to whom he must have exposed his unwise behavior...He spoke of a future state with intense feeling, and even with tears. He expressed disgust at the idea of his remains being mixed with the common rubbish, as he called it, of the churchyard, and selected with his usual taste a beautiful and wild spot in the glen where he had his hermitage, in which to take his last repose. He changed his mind, however, and was finally interred in the common burial-ground of Manor parish. The author has invested W. Elphin with some qualities which made him appear, in the eyes of the vulgar, a man possessed of supernatural power. Common fame paid David Ritchie a similar compliment, for some of the poor and ignorant, as well...

crossing his means of giving terror or pain. But even in a rude Scottish glen thirty years back, the fear of sorcery was very much out of date.

David Ritchie affected to frequent solitary scenes, especially such as were supposed to be haunted, and valued himself upon his courage in doing so. To be sure he had little chance of meeting anything more ugly than himself. At heart, he was superstitious, and planted many rowans (mountain ash) around his hut, as a certain defence against necromancy. For the same reason, doubtless, he desired to have rowan trees set above his grave.

We have stated that David Ritchie loved objects of natural beauty. His only living favourites were a dog and a cat, to which he was particularly attached, and his bee, which he treated with great care. He took a sister, latterly, to live in a hut adjacent to his own, but he did not permit her to enter it. She was weak in intellect, but not deformed in person; simple, or rather silly, but not, like her brother, sullen or bizarre. David was never affectionate to her; it was not in his nature; but he endured her. He maintained himself and her by the sale of the produce of their garden and bee-hives; and, latterly, they had a small allowance from the parish. Indeed, in the simple and patriarchal state in which the country then was, persons in the situation of David and his sister were sure to be supported. They had only to supply to the next gentleman or respectable farmer, and were sure to find them equally ready and willing to supply their very moderate wants. David often received gratuitous visits from strangers, which he never asked, never refused, and never seemed to consider as an obligation. He had a right, indeed, to regard himself as one of Nature's paupers, to whom she gave a title to be maintained by his kind, even by that deformity which closed against him all ordinary ways of supporting himself by his own labour. Besides, a bag was suspended in the mill for David Ritchie's benefit; and those who were carrying home a molder of meal, seldom failed to add a groat or to the alms-bag of the deformed cripple. In short, David had no occasion for money; save to purchase such, his only luxury, in which he indulged himself liberally. When he died, in the beginning of the present century, he was found to have hoarded about twenty pounds, a habit very consistent with his disposition; for wealth is power, and power was what David Ritchie desired to possess, as a compensation for his exclusion from human society

CHAPTER I.
PRELIMINARY.

Hast any philosophy in thee, Shepherd? said the Farmer as You Left It.

It was a fine April morning (excepting that it had rained hard the night before, and the ground remained covered with a dazzling mantle of six inches in the) when two horsemen rode up to the Wallace Inn.

The first was a strong, tall, powerful man, in ray-finding coat, having a hat covered with wax, a large silver-mounted horsewhip, boots, and a surtout overalls. He was mounted on a large dark brown horse, in coat, but well in condition, with a saddle of the yeoman cut, and a doubled leather bridle. The man who accompanied him—it is apparent his servant; here rode a shaggy little pony, with a blue bonnet on his head, and a check napkin folded about his neck, wore a pair of blue worsted hose instead of boots, had his reins hands much stained with tar, and observed air of donnance and respect towards his master, but without any of those indications of precence and punctilio which are preserved between the try and their domestic. On the contrary, the travellers and passengers in the coach, including the sentence of the conversation which had a carrying on betwixt them was a joint ejaculacough, and, in the same breath, inquired, "What are ye from the south hielands?"

"News," said the farmer, "bad enough news, I tell ye—so we can carry through the town, it will as we can do; we mean e'en leave the lamb to Black Dwarf's care."

"Ay, ay," rejoined the old shepherd, (for such was his head,) shaking his head, "he'll be unco busy abov eer the coach." The Black Dwarf! I said my learned friend and I,* Mr. Jedediah Cleishbotham, "and what of a personage may he be?"

"Hout awa' man," answered the farmer, "you'll hear o' Canny Elsie of the Black Dwarf, or I am as tickle mista'en—A' the world telle tales about him, it's but daft nonsense after a—I dinna believe a d'ot frae beginning to end."

"Your father believed it unco stielly, though," said the old man, to whom the scepticism of his priest gave obvious displeasure.

"Ay, you dowie that was in the time he blackfaces—they believe a hantle queer things these days, that nobody heeds since the lang sheep in."

"The mair's the pity, the mair's the pity," said the man. "Your father, and sae I have aften told'd maister, wad ha' been sair vexed to hae seen the peel-house was a pu'd down to make park dykes; he having been a man of the books, sae I to sit at e'en, wi' his plaid about him, and look and kye as they cawn down the looing, ill wad he ha', in this and other instances, printed in Italy, some words which the very same Mr. Jedediah Cleishbotham seemed to have interpolated upon the text of his deceased friend."

"We may chance one or two, but such liberties only to have been taken by the learned gentleman where an character and conduct are concerned; and surely he's learned, and a博士 in moral and nowt else."

"Wussing your health, sir," said the shepherd, and having taken off his glass, and observed the whisky was the right thing, he continued, "It's no for the like o' us to be judging, to be sure; but it was a bonny knowe that broony knowe, and an unco braw shelter for the lambs in a severe morning like this."

"Ay," said his patron, "but ye ken we maun hae turns for the lang sheep, hulie, an' muckle hard work to get them, both wi' the pleugh an' the hoe, and that wad sort ill wi' sitting on the broomy knowe, and cracking about Black Dwarf, and sicc an clavering away, as was the case."

"Aweel, awesomest," said the attendant, "short sheep had short rents, I'm thinking."

Here the worthy patron again interposed, and observed, "that he could never perceive any material difference, in point of longitude, between one sheep and another."

This occasioned loud hoarse laugh on the part of the farmer, and an astonished stare on the part of the shepherd. "It's the wool, man,—it's the wool, and no the beasts themselves, that makes them be ca'd lang or short. I never know the men to be in their backs, the short sheep would be rather the longer-headed o' the twain, but it's the wool that pays the rent in these days, and it had muckle need."

"Odd, Beulie said very true—our sheep made short rents—my father paid four sheep's worth, just three score and twenty pounds, and it stands me in three hundred, plack and bawbee,—And that's very true—I hae been long time to be standing here clavering—Landlord, get us our breakfast, and see an get the yauth fed—"

"I am for doun to Christy Wilson's, to see if him and me can gree about the luck penny I am to give him for his year and a half. We had drank a cup of muckinna to the making the bargain at St. Boswell the other night, and o' some gate we can gree upon the particulars proceeds, for as muckle time as we took about it—I doubt we shall come to a piec—when ye hear ye, neighbour," addressing my worthy and learned patron, "if ye want to hear any thing about lang or short sheep, I will be back here to my kail against ane o'clock; or, if ye want any o' the world stories about the Black Dwarf, and sic-like, if ye'll wear a half-mutch, as I'll be there, he'll cracle y'e like a pon-pun. And th' o' ye a muckinna mysel, man, if I can settle weel wi' Christy Wilson."

The farmer returned at the hour appointed, and with him came Christy Wilson, their difference having been fortunately settled without an appeal to the gentlemen of the long robe. My learned and worthy patron failed not to attend, both on account of the refreshment promised to the mind and to the body, although he is known to partake of the latter in a very moderate degree; and the party, with which my Landlord was associated, continued to sit late in the evening, seasoning their liquor with many choice tales and songs. The last incident which I recollect, was my learned and worthy patron falling from his chair, just as he concluded a long lecture upon temperance, by reciting from the Gentle Shepherd, a couplet, which he right happily transferred from the vice of avarice to that of sloaths. He that has money has money and soundly sheep. The overcome only fetches folk to knees.
In the course of the evening the Black Dwarf had not been forgotten, and the old shepherd, Ballindoll, told of the legend of him that was a great duel of interest. It also appeared, though not till the third punch-bowl was emptied, that much of the farmer's seriousness on the subject was affected, as exceeding a theme of the coming events and freedom from ancient prejudices, becoming a man who paid three hundred pounds a-year of rent, while, in fact, he had a lurking belief in the traditions of his forefathers. As the last of the guests, I had the opportunity of inquiring of other persons connected with the wild and pastoral district in which the scene of the following narrative is placed, and I was fortunate enough to recover many many a thrilling tradition, and which almost account, at least in some degree, for the circumstances of exaggerated marvel with which superstition has adorned the more vulgar traditions.

CHAPTER II.

Will none out Huntsmen never your turn?

In one of the most remote districts of the south of Scotland, where an ideal line, drawn along the tops of lofty and bleak mountains, separates that land from England, a youth, called Holbert, or Hubbie Elliot, a substantial farmer, who boasted his descent from old Martin Elliot of the Preasin tower, noted in Border story and song, was one of the world's walkers of deer, once upon a numerous among these solitary wastes, were now reduced to a very few herds, which, sheltering themselves in the most remote and inaccessible recesses, rendered the task of punning them really toilsome and precarious. These were, however, found many youth of the country ardently attached to this sport.

“The Black Dwarf, now almost forgotten, was once held a formidable personage by the inhabitants of the Border, where he put forth his arms with a fiery bellow or gale of wind. He was,” said the chronicler, “an open, bold, and enterprising man, who made a considerable use of his in the border country. He was known as the King of the Lawless, and an inhabitant of the land, which was called Northerne Baker.” The best and most authentic account of this dangerous and mysterious being occurs in a communication to the author by that eminent antiquary, Hubert St. Vare, F.R.S., of Manxfoot, author of the History of the Border of Durham.

According to this well-authenticated legend, two young Northumbrians were out on a shooting party, and had planned to go among the mountainous districts which border on the border land. They started for a small village called Black Duff, by leaving the road just before the village. After the men had passed the village, the road they had come by now ended; so they went on in a new direction. They met with a party of men who were hunting. The two parties passed each other without speaking. Then they went on their way, not knowing of each other's presence. They continued their journey, passing through the forest and the mountains, until they reached the village where they had started from.

The population of the village was about 300, consisting of old men, women, and children. The younger inhabitants were engaged in the fields, while the older ones were sitting around the firesides, telling stories and singing songs. The village was surrounded by high mountains, which gave it a picturesque aspect. The soil was fertile, and the fields were well-cultivated.

The young Northumbrians were told by the inhabitants of the village that there was a great deal of danger in the wilderness, and that they should not go beyond a certain point. However, they were determined to continue their journey, and they set out again, determined to reach the place where they had planned to go. They continued their way, passing through the forest and the mountains, until they reached a place where there was a great deal of danger. They tried to turn back, but they were soon forced to continue their way.

The Black Dwarf.

bloody skirmish. The real cause of its existence had, however, passed away; and tradition, which is so wonderful, as a preserve of truth, had supplied its place with a complimentary legend of her own, which now came fully upon Hobtie's memory. The ground about the pillar was strewn or rather meandered, with many large fragments of stones of the several families which the county, from their appearance as they lay scattered on the waste, were popularly called the Gray Geese, the Bucklestone, or the Castle Colors. The legend accounted for this name and appearance by the encircling atmosphere of the old oak, which not only formed with the sorrows and labour of the inhabitants and was most frequent with those who frequented these hills in former days, causing the eves to be, and the knees to set their calves, and performing all the fatigues which the farmers were wont to bring on them. On this moor she used to hold her revels with her sister hags; and rings were still pointed out on which no grass nor heath ever grew, the turf being, as it were, calcined by the scourching heaps of their diabolical partners.

Once upon a time this old hag is said to have crossed the moor driving before her a flock of geese, which, after a few miles, set about advancing at a neighboring fair—for it is well known that the fiend, however liberal in imparting his powers of dancing mischief, ungenerously leaves his allies under the necessity of performing their own labors for subsistence. The day was far advanced, and her chance of obtaining a good price depended on her being first at the market. But the geese, which had hitherto been contented at the ostentation with which they deft all her efforts to collect them, and not remembering the precise terms of the contract by which the fiend was bound to obey her commands for a certain time (supposing her friendly, though neither I nor they ever stir from this spot now!),

The words were hardly uttered, when by a metamorphosis as sudden as any in Ovid, the fog and her refractory flock were converted into stone, the angel whom she served, being a strict formalist, grasping eagerly at an opportunity of completing the ruin of her body and soul by a literal obedience to her orders. It is said, that when she perceived, and felt the transformation which was about to take place, she exclaimed to the tremendous fiend, "Ah, thou false thief! Long hast thou promised me a gray gown, and now it is too late to bawl!"

The dimensions of the pillar, and of the stones, were often referred to, as a proof of the superior stature and size of old women and geese in the days of other years, by those who were wont to frequent the place. A tradition of the gradual degeneration of mankind.

All particulars of this legend Hobtie called to mind as he passed along the moor. He also remembered, that since the catastrophe had taken place, the scene of it has been avoided, at least after night-fall, by all human beings, as being the ordinary resort of kelpies, sprites, and other demons, once the companions of her witch's diabolical revels, and now continuing to rendezvous upon the same spot, as if still in attendance on their transformed mistress. Hobtie's natural hardihood, however, manfully combated with the fiend's sport; and he was not wont, in his own phrase, to fear neither dog nor devil; he looked at the prudence of his peace, and, like the clown in Hallowes, relied upon the warlike ditty of Jack of the Side, as a general cause his drums be beat to inspire the doubtful courage of his soldiers.

So it came to pass that when he was glad to hear a friendly voice shout in his rear, and to propose to him a partner on the road. He slackened his pace, and was quickly joined by a youth well known to him, a gentleman of some fortune that runs motors, and who looked, on the back seat on which he was seated, like a gentleman by himself. Young Ernshaw, "of that ilk," had lately come of age, and succeeded to a moderate fortune, a good deal dissipated, from the share his family had taken in the disturbances of the period. They were much and generally respected in the country; a reputation which this young gentleman seemed likely to sustain, as he was well educated, and of excellent dispositions.

"Now, Ernshaw," explained Hobtie, "I am glad to meet your honour on this lane, and company's blithe on a lark like this—it's an unco' bogily bit—Where hae ye been sportin' ?"

"Up the Glenhead, Hobtie," answered Ernshaw, "turning his greeting. "But will our dogs keep the peace, thank ye?"

"Dey a' fear o' mine," said Hobtie, "they hae scarce a lick to stand on. Oid! the deevil's fleed the country, I think! I have been as far as Inver-fell-foot, and deet be no fear o' them."

"Deid a' o' me, was care muckle, only I wanted some venison to our auld guise-dame. The carline, she sits in the neuk yonder, upbye, and cracks about the grand shooters and busters lang syne—Oid! I think they hae killed a' the deer in the country, for my part."

"Well, Hobtie, I have shot a fat buck, and sent him to Ernshaw this morning—you shall have half of him for your grandmother."

"Many thanks, Mr. Patrick," ye're kent to a' the country for a kind heart. It will do the auld wife's heart good—to be a buck, when she hams it comes frae you—and weel o' can ye'll come up and take it in your share, and puir Ernshaw and me, for we're auld together, and a' your folk at that weary Edinburg, I wonder what they can find to do amang a when ranks o' stane houses wis slate on the top o' them, that might live on yer ain pin."

"My education and my sisters has kept my mother much in Edinburgh for several years," said Ernshaw, "but I promise you I propose to make up for lost time."

"And ye'll rig out the auld tower a bit," said Hobtie, "and live hearty and neighbour-like wi' the auld family friends, as the Laird o' Ernshaw should I. I can tell ye, my mother, my grandmother I mean, but, since we lost our ain mother, we ca' her sometimes the tane, and sometimes the other—but, any gate, she conceits her self no distant connected wi' you."

"Very true, Hobtie, and I will come to the Heugh-foot in dinner to-morrow with all my heart."

"Wey, that's kindly said! We are auld neighbours, am we not?"

"I ken ye," answered Hobtie, "and I ken ye're a guid dame's fan to see you—she clavers about your father that was killed lang syne."

"Hush, hush, Hobtie—not a word about that—it's a story betwixt you and me.

"I dinna ken—if it hae chanced among our folk, we wad hae kept it in mind moly a day till we got some mends for't—but ye ken your ains weel best, you laird—I have heard say that Ellieslaw's friend stickit your sire after the laird himself had mastered his sword."

"Fy, fie, Hobtie; it was a foolish brawl, occasioned by wine and politics—many swords were drawn—it is impossible to say who struck the blow."

"At any rate, said Ellieslaw was siding and abetting; and I am sure if ye were was disposed as to take amends, that I'll try to make it right, for your father's blood is beneath his nails—and besides there's nobody else left that was concerned to take amends upon, and it's a prattler and aJacobite into the bargain—I'll tell thinking o' the country folk look for something awtween ye."

"O for shame, Hobtie!" replied the young Laird, "you, that profess religion, to stir your friend up to break the law! I'll be hanged if I'll have anything to do with ye, and in such a bogily bit too, where we know not what beings may be listening to us!"

"Hush, hush, Hobtie," said Hobtie, drawing nearer to his companion, "it's a good thing the two sets are now so well united, and in such a bogily bit too, where we know not what beings may be listening to us!"

"Hush, hush, Hobtie," said Hobtie, drawing nearer to his companion, "it's a good thing the two sets are now so well united, and in such a bogily bit too, where we know not what beings may be listening to us!"
"I assure you, Hobbie," said his companion, rather angrily, "I assure you I am mistaken; and it is extremely wrong of you, either to think of, or to utter such an idea; I have no idea of permitting free- lumbers to be carried so far as to connect my name with them by any means whatever."

"Why, there now—there now!" retorted Elliot; "did not I say it was necas' o' spunk that made you so min?—Well, weel, I meant necas' offence; but the authur's young fell'w' the lord's wid' him o' little and laying on, an' he's a whim o' his back too, and keeps them weel up in heart, and as fu' o' mischief as young colts. Where he gets the gear to do nae can say; he live's high, and far above his rent's here; however, he pays his way—Sae, if there's any outbroke in the country, he's likely to break out wi' the first—and weel does he mind the auld quarrels between ye. I'm surmising he'll be for a touch at the auld wower at Earsncliff."

"Well, Hobbie," answered the young gentleman, "if he should be so ill advised, I shall try to make the older fellow good against him, as it has been made good by many better men before him."

"Very right—very right—that's speaking like a man now," said the stout yeoman, "and, if a man shouldn't be that be he say, ye'll just gar your serv- vant—your bell in that case—there's me and my two brothers, and little Davie of the Steen- house, will be wi' you, wi' a' the power we can make, in the snapping of a rigid."

"Then, if that's possible," answered Earsncliff, "but I hope we shall have no war of so unnatural and un- christian a kind in our time."

"Hout, sir, hout," replied Elliot; "it wad be but a week before all the tartan and Head and Heart and Earth would make allowances for it in this uncultivated place—it's just the nature of the folk and the land—we canna live quiet like London folk—we hae nae seck to do with it."

"Well, Hobbie," said the Laird, "for one who believes so deeply as you do in supernatural appearances, I must own you take Heaven in your own hand rather naughtily, considering where we are walking."

"What needs I care for the Muckelstone-Moor o' neath ye do yourself, Earsncliff I?" said Hobbie, something offended; "to be sure, they do say there's a course or two of lang-neeb't things about the land, but what need I care for them? I have a good conscience, and little to answer for, unless it be about a rant among the lassies, or a spire at a fair, and then no seck to speak of. Though I say it myself, I am as true a man and as peaceable a song as ever vi'ed any one on this very bit."

"As is not unlikely," said young Earsncliff, "for there stands your old witch, Hobbie."

"I say," continued Elliot, "if indignant at this hint—"I say, if the auld clartine herself was to get up out o' the grund just before us, I would see nae ma—But, guie preserve us, Earsncliff, what can ye be!"

CHAPTER III.

Brown Dwarf, that over the moorland strides. "The name in Kooldar tells me."

Brown Dwarf, that over the moorland strides, Beneath the heather-belt.

JOHN LEYDEN.

This object alarmed the young farmer in the middle of his valorous protestations, started for a moment even his less prejudiced companion. The moon, which had arisen during their conversation, was, in the phrase of that country, wading or strug- gling with clouds, and shed only a doubtful and occasional light. By one of her beams, which streamed upon the great group of islands, they now beheld his idea of the motions of an apparition, that Hobbie Elliot, making a dead pause, while his hair erected itself upon his scalp, whispered to his companion, "Tis Auln Ailie here! Shall I gie her a shot, in the name of God?"

"For Heaven's sake, no," said his companion, holding down the weapon which he was about to raise to the aim—"for Heaven's sake; no; it's some poor distressed creature."

"Ye're distracted yourself, for thinking of going so near to her," said Elliot, holding his companion in his turn, as he prepared to advance. "We'll keep the pace till time, and mind a minute or two, before we discharge the weapon."

"Auln Ailie!" (this he added in a gentle whisper), "let us take a cast at, as if to draw the wind on a buck—the buck is not a man, at least, nor is it a buck-deep, and neither a soft road nor a bad company."

Earsncliff, however, in spite of his companion's resistance and remonstrances, continued to advance. They had got on the peak of the island, and their eye was next confronted the object of their investigation. The height of the figure, which appeared even to decrease as it approached it, seemed to be under four feet, and its form, as far as the imperfect light afforded them the means of discerning, was very nearly as broad as long, or rather of a spherical shape, which could only be occasioned by some strange personal deformity. The young sportsman hailed this extraordinary appearance twice, without receiving any answer, or attending to the pinches by which his companion endeavoured to intimate that their best course was to retire, and giving further dis- turbance to a being of such singular appearance than he was.
"Come, my friend," said Earnestiff, "you seem to suffer under some strong affection; compassion must not allow him to do himself justice.

"Common humanity!" exclaimed the being, with a scornful laugh that sounded like a shriek, "where got ye that catch-word—that noose for woodcocks—that tangle which is the only true quicksilver, that wretched idiot who swallows, will soon find covers a hook with bars ten times sharper than those you lay for the animals which you murder for your victuals!"

"I tell you, my friend," again replied Earnestiff, "you are incapable of judging of your own situation—you will perish in this wilderness, and we must, in consequence, renounce our o' lair way of living."

"I'll have neither hand nor foot in it," said Hobbie; "let the ghost take his ain way, for God's sake!"

"My blood be on my own head, if I prithee here," said the figure; and, observing Earnestiff meditating to lay hold on him, he add'd, "And your blood be upon yours, if you touch but the skirt of my garments, to infect me with the taint of mortality!"

"In our own home more brightly as he spoke thus, and Earnestiff observed that he held out his right hand armed with some weapon of offence, which glittered in the cold ray like the blade of a long knife, or sword. It was evident that he was in great danger—perhaps repressive in his attempt upon a being thus armed, and holding such desperate language, especially as it plain he would have little aid from his companions, who had fairly left him to settle matters with the wretch, and had proceeded a few paces on his way homeward. Earnestiff, therefore, turned and followed Hobbie, after looking back towards the supposed maniac, who, as if unused to frenzy by the interview, roamed wildly around the great stone, extinguishing his voice in shrieks and imprecations, that thrilled wildly along the waste heath.

The two sportmen moved on some time in silence, until they were out of hearing of these uncouth sounds, which was not at first they had gained a considerable distance from the pillar that gave name to the mound. Just as they were conversing on the scene, they had witnessed, until Hobbie Elliot suddenly exclaimed, "Well, I'll uphold that ye ghast, if it be a ghast, has both done and suffered enough evil in this world, and can cause him rampagen in that wayer after he is dead and gone."

"It seems to me the very madness of misanthropy," said Earnestiff, following his own current of thought. "I recollect it did emit such a preternatural creature, then?" asked Hobbie at his companion.

"Who? A—No, surely.

"Weel, I am partly of the mind myself that it may be the same. I do love a ghaste, I wadna wish to see any thing look like a bogle."

"At any rate," said Earnestiff, "I'll ride over to-morrow, and see what has become of the unhappy being.

"In fair daylight?" queried the reoman; "then, grace o' God, I'm the wi'. But here we are nearer to Hugh-foot than to your house by two miles,—hurra ye better for gae home at me, and we'll send the landlord on the moor to tell the thing that you are wi' us, though I believe there's nobody at home to wait for you but the servants and the cat."

"Have with you then, friend Hobbie," said the young man, much distressed; "I wene't willingly have either the servants be anxious, or pass forfeit her supper, in my absence, I'll be obliged to you to send the boy as you propose."

"Aye, the boy, I must say. And ye'll gae home to Hugh-foot? They'll be right bithie to see you, that will they?"

This affair ruffled, they walked briskly on a little further, and came to the edge of a pretty steep hill, Hobbie Elliot exclaimed, "Now, Earnestiff, I am aye glad when I come to this very bit—Ye see the light below, that's in the lat' window, where gramme, they think my father is sitting birking her wheel, and ye see on that other light that's gaun whiddin back and forth through among the windows? that's my cousin, Grace Armstrong,—she's twice as clever about the house as my sisters, and see they say themselves, for they're good-natured lasses as ever trode on heels; but I canna pu' all that on her, she's too much of a piece with her mamma, that has no matin action, and is the best goer about the town, now that gramme is off the foot herself. —My brothers, an' o'm, they're a-way to wait upon the chambermaid, Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss—Miss, an' our lad farm—he can see after the stock just as well as I can do."

"You are lucky, my friend, in having so many valuable relatives to hustle for you.""

"Troth am I—Grace makes me thankful, I've never deny it.—But will ye tell me now, Earnestiff, you that have been at college, and the high-school of Edinburgh, and the college of St John's, and our minister, bargaining about it at the house to fair, and truth they both spak very well. Now, the priest says it's unlawful to marry ane's cousin; but I cannot say I thought he brought out the Gospel authorities half so well as our minister.

"That minister is thought the best divine and the best preacher between this and Edinburgh—Dinna ye think he was likely to be right?"

"Certainly marriage, by all protestant Christians, is held to be against the law of God and the Levitical law: so, Hobbie, there can be no bad, legal, or religious, betwixt you and Miss Armstrong."

"Hot awa' wi' your joking, Earnestiff," replied his companion, "we're angry enough yourselves one uncivil bat in a bit, man, on the rest—No that I was asking the question about Grace, for ye maun ken she's no my cousin—german-out and out, but the daughter of my uncle's wife by her first marriage, so she's nee kith nor kin to me—only a connection like.

But now we're at the Shelving-hill—I'll fire off my gun, to let them ken I'm coming, that's aye my way; and if I ha' a deer I get them two shots, and ha' done wi' the deer and any for myself."

He fired off his piece accordingly, and the number of lights were seen to traverse the house, and even to gleam before it. Hobbie Elliot pointed out one of these to Earnestiff, which stood to ride round the house towards some of the out-houses—"That's Grace herself," said Hobbie. "She'll not meet me at the door, I've warrant her—but she'll be awa' for a distance, to see if my hounds' supper be ready, poor brutes."

"Love me, love my dog," answered Earnestiff.

"Ah, Hobbie, you are a lucky young fellow!"

This observation was uttered in a tone of shrill, which apparently did not escape the ear of his companion.

"Ho! glaar folk may be as lucky as I am—O how I have seen on Verc's lip the flash of somebody when they passed another at the Carlisle races! Who kens but things may come round in this world!"

Earnestiff muttered something like an answer; but whether in ascent of the proposition, or rebusking the application of it, could not easily be discovered; and it seems probable that the speaker himself was willing his meaning should rest in doubt and obscurity. He had now descended the broad looping, which, winding round the foot of the steep bank, or heath, brought them in front of the thatched, but comfortable farm-house, which was the dwelling of Hobbie Elliot and his family.

The doors was thronged with joyful faces; but the appearance of a stranger blunted many a gibe which had been prepared on Hobbie's lack of success in the deer-stalking. There was a little bustle among three handsome young women, each endeavouring to devote upon another the task of ushering the stranger into the apartment, while probably all were anxious to escape the attentions of a personal arrangement, before preventing themselves to a young gentleman in a dishabille only intended for other brother.

Hobbie Elliot, meanwhile, bestowing some hearty and general abuse upon them all, (for Grace was not of the party,) snatched the candle from the hand of one of the rustic accompanist, as she wound up an last with it in her hand, and ushered his guest into the family parlour, or rather hall; for the place having been built upon a piece of a tumulus, the siting of his apartment was a vaulted and paved room, damp and dismal enough compared with the lodgings of the yeomanry of our day, but which, when well lighted up or decorated by the glare of the dumb fire, while the thread of wool was winding round her coif and pinners, her close and decent gown of home-spun wool, but with a large gold necklace and ear-rings looked, what she really was the lady as well as the mistress, so that the fairies of wicker, by the corner of the great chimney, she directed the evening occupations of the young women, and of two or three stout serving wenches, who sat playful and their distaffs behind the backs of their young mistresses.

As soon as Earnscliff had been duly welcomed, and basty orders issued for some addition to the evening meal, the young man brought you a battery upon Hobbie Elliot for his lack of success against the door.

"Jenny ne'dna have kept up her kitchen-fire for a' that," said his master.

"Troth no, laws," said another; "the gathering peat,* if it was weel blown, was dress a' our Hobbie's venison.

"And for the low of the canny, if the wind wad let it blow steady," said a third; "if I were him, I would bring him a black crow, rather than come back three times without a buck's horn to blow on.

Hobbie turned from the one to the other, regarding them with a thoughtful look on his brow, the subtility of which was confuted by the good-humoured laugh on the lower part of his countenance. He then strove to propitiate them, by mentioning the intended present of his company.

"In my young days," said the old lady, "a man wad have been ashamed to come back the hill without a buck hanging on each side o' his horse, like as you, sir, your hunting calves.

"I wish they had left some for us then, grannie," retorted Hobbie; "they've cleared the country o' them, that auld friends o' yours, I'm thinking.

"I see ony folk can find game, though you can't, Hobbie," said the eldest sister, glancing a look at young Earnscliff.

Well, well, woman, hasna every dog his day, begins to say, for I'll pardon for saying—Mayna I hae his luck, and he mine, another time?

"It's a braw thing for a man to be out a' day, and frightened—na, I winna say that neither—but mistrysting wi' the dame, the dame and the dame, then hae to flyte wi' a wheen women that has been doing nothing a' the live-lang day, but whirling a bit stick, wi' a thread trailing at it, or baring at a clout.

"It's the exiles," exclaimed the females, one and all—for great was the regard then paid, and perhaps still paid, in these glens, to all such fantasies.

"I did not say frightened, now—I only said missett wi' the thing; and there was but sex, neither—Earnscliff, ye saw it as weel as I did?"

And he proceeded, without very much exaggeration, to detail, in his own way, the meeting they had had with the mysterious being at Mucklestone-Moor, concluding, he could make of nothing what on earth it could be, unless it was either the Enemy himself, or some of the auld Pegtha that hold the country lang ago.

"Auld Pegth!" exclaimed the grand-dame; "na, na—blesse thee free atace, my bairn, it's been nae Pegth that—it's been the Brown Man of the Moors! Or weary a' these evil days!—what can evil beings be coming about the moors in days as peaceful as this, peaceful, fully settled, and living in, love and law?—O weary on him! he never brought guide to these lands or the fancyatters. My father aften told me he was seen in the late part of the late body fight at Mearston-Moor, and then again in Montrose's troubles, and again before the rout o' Dunbar, and, in my ain time, he was seen about the town. And the second-sighted Laird of Benarrow had a commencin' wi' him some time afore Argyle's landing, but that I cannot speak to sae procercely—it was in the west—and while the smoke was still ill tide, sae mind ilk a' ye to draw to Him that can help in the day of troubl."

Earnscliff now interposed, and expressed his firm conviction that these were dressed in the dress of a poor maniac, and had no commission from the invisible world to announce either war or evil. But his opinion found a very cold audience, and all joined to deplore his purpose of returning to the spot the next day.

"O, my bonny bairn," said the old dame, (for, in the kindness of her heart, she extended her parental style to all in whom she was interested)—"You should beware mair than other folk—there's been a heavy breach made in your house wi' your father's bloodshed, and wi' law-plex, and losses sin-syne;—and the good-humoured share which so well becomes the one that will build up the auld bigging again (if it be His will) to be an honour to the country, and a safeguard to those that dwell in it—you, before others, are called upon to put a stop to it; and I hope that new auld man will keep o'er venturous a race, and muzzle harm they have got by it."

"But I am sure, my good friend, you would not want me to be afraid of going to an open moor in broad daylight?"

"I dinna ken," said the old dame; "I wad never bide son or friend o' mine laud their hand back in a guide cause, whether it were a friend's or near a friend—that should be by no biding of mine, or of any body that's come of a gentle kindred—but it wins gang out of a gray head like mine, than to gang to seek for evil that's no fashing wi' you, is clean against law and Science.

Earnscliff resigned an argument which he saw no prospect of maintaining with good effect, and the entrance of supper broke off the conversation. Miss Grace had by this time made her appearance, and Hobbie, not without a conscious glance at Earnscliff, placed himself by her side. Mirth and lively conversation, in which the old lady of the house took the good-humoured share which so well becomes the one that restored to the checks of the damsel the roses which their brother's tale of the apparition had chased away, and they danced and sang for an hour after supper as if there were no such things as goblins in the world.

CHAPTER IV.

I am Misanthropous, and hate mankind; For the part, I do wish they were all five. That I might love them something.

Earnscliff took leave of his hospitable friends, promising to return in time to partake of the venison, which had arrived from his house. Hobbie, who apparently took leave of him at the door of his habitation, slunk out, however, and joined him at the top of the hill.

"Ye'll be gan yonder, Mr. Patrick; I fear o' me will mistryst for you a' my mother says. I thought it best to slip out quietly though, in case she should mislipen you a' the same, and when you come mannua vex her at nae rite—wan aman the last word my father said to me on his deathbed."

"By no means, Hobbie," said Earnscliff; "she well merits all your attention.

Troth, for that matter, she would be as sair vexed amain for you as for me. But I d'ye really think there's nae presumption in venturing back yonder?—We have come very rare in our days, I am unwilling to keep a matter uninvestigated which may concern the life of a poor distracted being.
"Awed, awed, if ye really think that," answered Hobbie, doubtfully. "And it's for certain the very few the very few the very few there are amongst them (for they say folks baldina ca' then fairies) that used to be seen on every green knowe at e'en, are no half as commonly visible in our days. I cannot depone to having seen one myself, and I would undervalue and disbelieve anyone who should abrit me in the moss, as like a whaup or as a thing could be like another. And mony aye my father saw when he used to come: bare trae the faers at e'en close in a dead hollow wood."

Earsnacch was somewhat entertained with the gradual declension of superstition from one generation to another which was in fact in this last observation, and he continued to reason on such subjects, until they came to the margin of the upland stone which gave name to the moor.

"As I shall answer," says Hobbie, "yonder's the creature croaking about yet—but it's daylight, and you have your head gumbrunt, I think we ought to wait on his answer.

"By all manner of means," said Earsnacch; "but in the name of wonder, what can he be doing there?"

"That's the green grease, as they ca' these great loose stones—Ood, that passes a thing I 'e'er heard tell of!

As they approached nearer, Earsnacch could not help noticing the prodigious dimensions of the figure that it had seen the night before, seemed slowly and toilously labouring to pile the large stones one upon another, as if to form a small enclosure. Materials lay around him that he threw, and they thrived; the labour of even the most exacting and unostentatious artificer in the world would have set him to the task of building a small temple of the stones. He was struggling to move a fragment of great size when the two young men came up, and was so intent upon executing his purpose, that he did not perceive their approach. In straining and heaving the large stone to place it, he observed his visitors according to his wish, he displayed a degree of strength which seemed utterly inconsistent with his size and appearance. Indeed, it was from the colossal proportions of the stones with which he was engaged in the construction of the edifice. He was struggling to move a fragment of great size when the two young men came up, and was so intent upon executing his purpose, that he did not perceive their approach. In straining and heaving the large stone to place it, he observed his visitors.

"Thank you," exclaimed the Dwarf, with a motion expressive of the utmost contempt—"There—take them, and fatten upon them! Take them, and make your foundation for the temple of the stones. Thanks for the assistance!" he added, raising his eyes with a loftiness of countenance which was not unworthy of one who had, as he asserted, completed the adjustment of the rafters. He was struggling to move a fragment of great size when the two young men came up, and was so intent upon executing his purpose, that he did not perceive their approach. In straining and heaving the large stone to place it, he observed his visitors.

"Are you going to build a tabernacle for the devil, and precluding our sins into the bargain, for what we ken?"

"Our presence," answered Earsnacch, "seems only to irritate his frenzy; we had better leave him, and send some one to provide him with food and necessary.

They did so. The servant dispatched for this purpose found the Dwarf still labouring at his wall, but could not extract a word from him. The lad, infested with the superstitions of the country, did not long persist in an attempt to induce questions or advice on so singular a figure, but having placed the articles which he had brought for his use on a stone at some distance, he left them at the misanthrope's disposal.

The Dwarf proceeded in his labours, day after day, with an assiduity so incredible as to appear almost boundless; and, when the wall, which he had raised, was finished, it was composed of stones of the most unusual size. Indeed, so unusual was the size of the stones employed, an appearance of solidity very uncommon for a cottage of such narrow dimensions and rude construction. Earsnacch, attentive to his motions, as soon perceived to what they tended, than he sent down a number of spars of wood suitable for forming the roof, which he caused to be left in the neighbourhood of the spot, resolving next day to return and examine the work done. The Dwarf had continued his labour so hard, and with such ingenuity, that he had nearly completed the adjustment of the rafters. His next labour was to cut rushes and thatch his dwelling, a task which he performed with singular dexterity.

As he seemed averse to receive any aid beyond the occasional assistance of a passenger, materials suitable to his purpose, and tools, were supplied to him, in the use which he proved to be skilful. He constructed the rafters and the window, and finished the hut with a rude belled roof, and a few shelves, and appeared to become somewhat soothed in his temper as his commodations increased.

His next task was to form a strong enclosure, and to cultivate the soil; but he determined to leave it to the best of his powers, until, by transporting mould, and working up what was upon the spot, he formed a patch of garden.

quest was usually left at a distance from his dwelling; if it was or suffered it to remain when he was not at home. At no time was his manners rude and unsocial; and his words, in number, just sufficient to express his meaning as briefly as possible, and he shunned all communication that went a syllable beyond the matter in hand.

When winter had passed away, and his garden became to afford him herbs and vegetables, he confined himself almost entirely to those articles of food.
In receptacle which he filled with trap, which fed on the moor, and supplied him with milk.
When Earnshill found his gift had been received, he soon afterwards paid the honest visit. The old man was seated on a broad flat stone, near his garden door, which was the seat of science he usually occupied when disposed to receive his patients or de-
 His back was bent, but his head was erect, keeping his hands in his pockets, as if to uphold himself against the cold. He was a man of medium height, with a slight bend to his neck, and his face was long and thin, with prominent cheek bones and a high forehead. His eyes were deep-set and piercing, and his brown hair was cut short and close to his head, giving him a stern and dignified appearance.

"Dull a shadow has he," replied Hobbe Ellist, who was a strenuous defender of the general opinion; "he is, as far in wi' the Auld Man to have a shade, as 'e is a second master in the linn. He's heard of a shadow that can become a body and that.

These suspicions, which, in any other part of the country, might have been attended with investigations a little inconvenient to the supposed wizard, were here only productive of respect and awe. The reclusi, being somewhat gratified by the marks of timid veneration with which an occasional passer-by paid his tribute to the mark of strange surprise with which he surveyed his person and his premises, and the hurried step with which he passed his retreat as he passed the awful spot. The terror had to grow by its own force, and its own leisurely glance at the walls of his cottage and garden, and to apologize for it by a courteous salutation, which the inmate sometimes designed to return by a word or two. Earnshill offered to receive that word and listen, and seldom without inquiring after the solitary innate, who seemed now to have arranged his establishment for life.

It was impossible to engage him in any conversation on his own personal affairs; nor was he communicative or accessible in talking on any other sub-cject whatever, although he seemed to have considerably receded in the extreme ferocity of his misanthro-py, or rather to be less frequently visited with the fits of derangement of which this was a symptom. No argument could prevail upon him to accept any thing beyond the simplest necessities, although much more was offered by Earnshill out of charity, and by his more superstitious neighbours from other motives.
The benefits of these last he repaid by advice, when consulted (as at length he seldom was) on their dis-cases, or those of their cattle. He often furnished them with medicines also, and seemed possessed, not only of such as were the produce of the country, but of some that were not. He was an able and experienced and requested advice on other matters, upon which he delivered with an oracular shrewdness that greatly in their folly. Have you marked the young wild cat that has been domesticated, how, a few hours after he has tasted the game, his teeth breaks forth; he gripes, tears, ravages, and leaps about, as if he were in pain, his limbs convulsed, his eyes terrorized, and his ears opened like a drum, to a sudden noise, and as if the animal's instinct," answered Earnshaw.

"But what has that to do with Hobchib?"

"As his emblem—it is his picture," retorted the dwarf. "He is at present tame, quiet, and domes- tered for the exercise of his instincts; but let the trumpet of war sound—let the blood-bath again begin, and he will be as fierce as the wildest of his Border ancestors that served our peasant's sloop. Can you, or at present often urge you to take bloody Bill? for an injury received when you were a boy?"

"In a scull starved; the Recluse appeared not to ob- serve my play, but(/acked against his shinbones; the trumpet will he young blood-bound tell lap blood, and I say and sign, For this I have preserved thee," added, and continued, "Such are my curees;—"

"You might try it, if you like, Mr. Earn-

"But I do not think such a practice is necessary."

"I am not troubled by it," returned Earn-shaw. "We are wont here, in one sense, to bear and r; but, in another, to do and to enjoy. The day has its evening of repose; even patient in its alleviation, where there is a con- sense of duty discharged."

"Your marriage is the most fortunate event in the world, and when you remember that I saw you at the time of your distress, it will afford you no reason to regret the hour when you were rescued and restored to your friends."

"I am not surprised at this; I have been accustomed to such occurrences, and I know that all is for the best."

"Yes; this is the first time you have crossed my waking eyes, but I have seen you in my dreams."

"Ay, Isabel Vere. What hast thou, or thine, to do with my waking thoughts?"

"Your waking thoughts, sir," said the second of Miss Vere's companions, with a sort of mock gravity.

"I am free, indeed, to indulge my fancies, and to form designs; he should lack no means of vice at all; he should be the centre of a whirlpool—"

"I would rather that you should not suffer the slightest injury, but that you should be protected by the utmost care."

"Lord bless us!" said the lady, "he's a pro- phetic enough."

"As sure as," continued the Recluse, "as thou art a woman—A woman!—I should have said a lady—"

"Yes, it is simple one; an endless chase through life after folly wins not worth watching, and, when caught, succeeds through a secret throw of the chase, pursued from the days of tottering infancy to those of old age upon his crutches. Toys and merry-making in childhood—love and its absurdities in youth—are words in aged age, shall succeed each other as objects of general interest."

"It is no wonder," he said to himself, "that with such extent of information, such a mode of life, so uncooth a figure, and sentiments so virulently misanthropic, this unfortunate should be regarded by the vulgar as in league with the Enemy of Mankind."

CHAPTER V.

The blackest rock upon the loneliest heath Puts, in its barrenness, some touch of spring;
And, in the April dew, of May;
Its moss and lichen fresher and review;
And thus the heart, most sad to human pleasures,
Nods at the tear, joy in the smile, of woman.

As the season advanced, the weather became more sultry, and the Recluse was more frequently found occupying the broad flat stone in the front of his mansion. As he sat there one day, about the hour of noon, a party of gentlemen and ladies, well mounted, and numerous in appearance, were passing at some distance from his dwelling. Dogs, hawks, and led-horses, swelled the retinue, and the air resounded at intervals with the onrushing of the hunters, the whoop of the huntsman, and the voices of the attendants. The Recluse was about to retire into his mansion at the sight of a train so joyous, when three young ladies, with their attendants, who had made a circuit, and detached themselves from their party, in order to gratify their curiosity by a sight of the Wine Wagon of Muckleston-Moor, came suddenly up, ere he could effect his purpose. The first shrieked, and put her hands before her face at sight of an object so unus-ually deformed. The second, with a hysteric giggle, which she intended should disguise her terror, asked the Recluse, whether he could tell their fortune. The third, who was best mounted, bear dressed, and incomparably the best-looking of the three, advanced, as if to cover the incivility of her companions.

"We have lost the right path that leads through these morasses, and our party have gone forward without us," said the young lady. "Seeing you, father, at the door of your house, we have turned this way—"

"Hush!" interrupted the Dwarf; "so young, and already so artful? You came—you knew you came, to exult in the consciousness of your own youth, wealth, and beauty, by contrasting them with age, poverty, and deformity. It is a fit employment at the daugher of your father; but O how unlike the child of your mother!"

"Did you, then, know my parents, and do you know me?"

"Yes; this is the first time you have crossed my waking eyes, but I have seen you in my dreams."

"Your dreams?"

"Ay, Isabel Vere. What hast thou, or thine, to do with my waking thoughts?"

"Your waking thoughts, sir," said the second of Miss Vere's companions, with a sort of mock gravity.

"I am free, indeed, to indulge my fancies, and to form designs; he should lack no means of vice at all; he should be the centre of a whirlpool—"

"I would rather that you should not suffer the slightest injury, but that you should be protected by the utmost care."

"Lord bless us!" said the lady, "he's a prophetic enough."

"As sure as," continued the Recluse, "as thou art a woman—A woman!—I should have said a lady—"

"Yes, it is simple one; an endless chase through life after folly wins not worth watching, and, when caught, succeeds through a secret throw of the chase, pursued from the days of tottering infancy to those of old age upon his crutches. TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

—flowers and butterflies in spring—butterflies and thistle-down in summer—withered leaves in autumn and hoarded money in winter; all thing inside.

Stand apart; your fortune is said.

"All caught, however," retorted the laughing fair one, who was a cousin of Miss Vere's; "that's sounded with!"

"But you, the Southerner, can neither be bothered nor sold," and he pushed back her professed offering with moral disdain.

"Well, then," said the lady, "I will keep my money, Mr. McAndrew, to assist me in the chase I am to pursue."

"You will need it," replied the cynic; "without it, few pursue successfully, and fewer are themselves pursued. Experience teaches me in your hour of adversity, you are old; you are poor; your grudge is far from human, were you ill, or in want; your situation in many respects exposes you to the suspicions of the world, which are apt to break out into actions of brutality. Let me think I have minded the lot of one human being! Accept of such assistance as I have power to offer; do this for my sake, if not for your own, that when these evils arise, which you promise, perhaps is too true, I may have letters to read that the hours of my happier time have been passed altogether in vain."

The old man answered with a broken voice, and smiling without addressing himself to the young lad.

"Yes, 'tis thus you should think—'tis thus you should speak, if ever human speech and thought are harmonious.

They bade me stay; they bade me come; they bade me
—Alas! they cannot. And yet—wait here an instant—but not till my return." He went to his little garden, and returned with a half-blown rose.

"This was made me shed a tear, the first which has wet my eyelids for many a year; for that good deed receive this token of gratitude. It is but a common rose; preserve it, however, and do not part with it.
"Come to my chamber; look me in the face, and show me that now, or but one leaf of it, were it withered as my heart is—if it should be in my heart and darest movements of rage against a hateful world, still it will recall recollected thoughts to my bosom, and perhaps afford happier prospects to thine. But no message," he exclaimed, rising into his usual mood of misan-thropy,—no message—go between! Come thyself, and the heart and the door that are shut against every other earthly being, shall open to thee and to thy sorrow. And now pass on."

He let go the bridle-reins, and the young lady rode on, her fair curls and graceful being as well as her surprise at the extraordinary nature of his address would permit, often turning back to look at the Dwarf, who still remained at the door of his habitation, and watched her pass out the way through which her father's coach of Ellesburgh, until the crow of the hill hid the party from his sight.

The ladies, meantime, jostled with Miss Vere on the strange interview they had just had with the far-famed Wizard of the Moor. "Imbella has all the day at home and abroad! Her hawk strikes down the blacker with a chance for her companions and kinwomen; even the conjurer cannot escape the force of her charms. You should, in compassion, cease to be such an enemy, and cause the jemmery to open your shop, and sell off all the goods you do not mean to keep for your own use."

"You shall have them all," replied Miss Vere," and the conjurer to boot, at a very easy rate."

"No! Nancy shall have the conjurer," said Miss Ilderton, "to supply deficiencies; she's not quite with herself, you know."

"I have" answered the younger Miss Ilderton,
"what could I do with so frightful a monster? I rept my eyes shut, after one glancing at him; and,
I protest, I thought I saw him still, though I winked as long as I could, but must open them again, that I need not be afraid."

"That's a pity," said her sister; "ever while you live, Nancy, choose an admirer whose faults can be hid by winking at them. Well, then, I must take him myself, and put him into mamma's dressing-cabinet, in order to show that Scotland can produce a specimen of mortal clay moulded into a form ten thousand times rarer than the imaginations of Car

...and the pictures that he is possessed of, expose him to plunder and assassination by some of our unsettled neighbours?"

"But you forget that they say he is a warlock," said Nancy Ilderton.

"And, if his magic disbelieved should fail him," rejoined her sister, "I would have him trust to his natural, and thrust his enormous head, and most pervasive smell, into his door or window, full in view of the assailants. The boldest robber that ever rode would hardly bare a second glance of him.
"Well, I wish I had the use of that Gorgon head of his for only a single hour."

"For what purpose, Lucy?" said Miss Vere.

"Oh! I would frighten out of the castle that dark, stif, and stately Sir Frederick Langley, that is so great a favourite with your bonne suggesting favourite of yours. I protest I shall be obliged to the Wizard as long as I live, if it were only for the half hour relief from that man's company which we have gained by our present engagement; a quarter of hour, Miss Vere, a new tone, so as not to be heard by the younger sister, who roves before them, the narrow path not admitting of their moving all alone abreast. What would you say, my dearest Lucy, if it were proposed to you to endure his company for life?"

"Say? I would say, No, no, no, three times, each louder than another, till they should hear me at Car isle."

"And Sir Frederick, would say then, nineteen ay-says are half a grant."

"Then, and then, Miss Lucy, "depends entirely on the manner in which the nay-says are said. Miss should have not one grain of concession in them, I promise you."

"But if your father, said Miss Vere, "were to say—Thus do, or—"

"I would stand to the consequences of his word, yet the most cruel father that ever was recorded in history, would not act thus cruelly."

"And what if he threatened you with a catholic saint, an uncle, and a clodder?"

"Then," said Miss Ilderton, "I would threaten him with a fourteen-year-old son, who, I am glad of an opportunity to dissuade him for conscientious and southerly reasons."

Now that Nancy is out of hearing, I'm really easy.
I think I would be交通安全 before God and in your power. A proud, dark, ambitious man; a caballer against the state; infamous for his avarice and severity; a bad son, a bad brother, unkind and ungrateful to all who are dear to him—Isabella, I would die rather than have him.

"Don't let my father hear you give me such advice," said Miss Vere, "or advise, my dear Lucy, to Eielslow-Castle."

"And adieu to Eielslow-Castle, with all my heart," said her friend, "for I once saw you fairly out of it, and settled under some kinder protector than he who now holds the master's place. Poor father, not only had been in his former health, how gladly would we have received and sheltered you, till this ridiculous and cruel persecution were blown over?"

"Yes; but I had been so, my dear Lucy!" answered Isabella: "but I fear nothing of your father's weak state of health, he would be altogether unable to protect me against the means which would be immediately used for the disabling the poor fugitive."

"For so indeed," replied Miss Isabella; "but we will consider and devise something. Now that your father and his guests seem so deeply engaged in some mysterious plot, to judge from the passing and returning of that order of steps, I have pressed serious charges, which appear and disappear without being announced by their names, from the collecting and cleaning of arms, and the anxious grom and bustle which seem to agitate the very soul of our household. I know nothing of your own, and there is one associate that I would gladly admit to our counsel."

"Not Nancy?"

"No, no!" said Miss Isardon; "Nancy, though an excellent woman, and fondly attached to you, would make a dull conspirator—as dull as Renault and all the other subordinate plotters in Yenice Preserved. No; this is Jaffier, or Pierre, if you like the character."

"I am afraid to mention his name to you, lest I vex you at the same time. Can you not guess? Something about a castle and a rock—it does not begin with English, but something very like it in Scotch."

"You cannot mean young Earnacliff, Lucy?" said Miss Vere, blushing deeply.

"And whom else should I mean?" said Lucy. "Jaffiers and Pierres are very scarce in this country, I take it, though one could find Renault and Bedmara now."

"But you talk so wildly, Lucy? Your plays and romances have positively turned your brain. You know, that, independent of my father's consent, without which I never will marry any one, and which, in the case you point at, would never be granted; independent, too, of our knowing nothing of young Earnacliff's inclinations, but by your own wild conjectures and fancies—besides all this, there is the fatal brawl!"

"When his father was killed!" said Lucy. "But that was a very long way ago, and I hope we have outlived the time of bloody feud. When a quarrel was carried down between two families from father to son, like a Spanish game at chess, and a murder or two committed in the same painted scene; or rather, a piece from Shakespeare, had one burnt and the other half burnt, had a sinister expression of violence, impudence, and cunning, each of which seemed alternately to predominate over the other. Sandy-haired hair, one eye with a fierce look, and the other with a look that looked for his sharp gray eyes, completed the inauspicious outline of the horseman's physiognomy. He had pistols in his holsters, and another pair perched from his belt, though he had taken some pains to conceal them by buttoning his doublet. He wore a rusted steel head-piece; a buff jacket of rather an antique cast; gloves, of which that for the right hand was covered with small scales of iron, like an ancient gauntlet, and a long broadsword completed his equipage."

"So, said the Dwarf, "rape and murder once more on horseback!"

"On horseback?" said the bandit; "ah, ay, Elias, your leech-craft has set me on the bonny bay again."

"And all those promises of amendment which you made during your illness forgotten?" continued El Shender.

"All clear away, with the water-saps and panzacs, returned the unabashed convalescent. 'Ye ken, Elias, for they say ye are weel acquaint wae the gentleman...

"When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be.

"When the devil was well, the devil a monk was he."

"Thou sayst true, said the Dwarf, "as well divided a word between a woman for carnage, or a tavern lass from her scent of slaughter, as thee from thy accursed propensities."
TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

"Why, what would you have me to do? It's born with me—lies in my very hound and bone. Why, man, the hounds of the land, they are hunted, too; have been rovers and hangers. They have all drunk hard, lived high, taking deep revenge for light offence, and never went near for the wounding," said the Dwarf, "as ever I saw a lamb-at-foot at night."

"What hell's round art thou bound now?"

"Can your sight not guess?"

"I'll tell you, said the Dwarf, "that thy purpose has this day failed, and worse will be the issue; now worst of all."

"And you like me the better for it, Father Elsie, and Westburnhurst, and you said you would--"

"I have said as much as I shall," answered the Solitary, "that are guests to their fellow-creatures, and thou art a bloody one."

"No--say not guilty to that—never blunder unless there's resistance, and that sets a man's bristles up, yea, ken. And this is no great matter, after a; just to cut the comb of a young cock that has been crowing a little over cressly."

"Not young Earnsliff," said the Solitary, with some emotion.

"No; not young Earnsliff—not young Earnsliff yet; but his time may come, if he will not take that Westburnhurst-town that he's fit for, and no keep skulking about here, destroying the few deer that are left in the country, and prancing to act as a magistrate, and writing letters to the droll folk about the slight and turfed state of the land. Let him take care o' himself."

"Then it must be Hobbie of the Hugh-foot," said Elsie.

"What harm has the lad done you?"

"I'm one man, got no greater harm; but he hear he says I said away from the Baipiel on Foston's Fien, for fear of him; and it was only for fear of the Country Korper, for there was a warrant against me. I'll stand and die here, but it's not a fit place for so much as that, to give him a lesson not to let his tongue gallop over freely about his betters. I know he has lost the best pen-feather of his wing before to-morrow morning. Farewell, Elsie; there's some canny boys waiting for me down among the shaws, overby; I will see you as I come back, and bring ye a blithie tale in return for your leech-craft."

To this, the Dwarf could collect himself to reply, the Reverend of Westburn flat set his horses to the animal, starting at one of the stones which lay scattered about, flew from the path. The rider exercised his supposed authority. The horse became furious, reared, kicked, plunged, and bolted like a deer, with all his four feet off the ground at once. It was in vain; the unrelenting rider sat as if he were the horse's master; and, after a short but furious contest, compelled the subdued animal to proceed upon the path at a rate which soon carried him out of sight of the Solitary.

"That villain," exclaimed the Dwarf,—"that cool-blooded, hard-hearted, unrelenting ruffian,—that wretch, whose every thought is infected with crimes,—has thrones and awnings, limbs, strength, and activity enough, to compel a nobler animal than himself to carry him to the place where he is to perpetuate his wickeder with—! I had, I had the weakness to wish to see my white hand upon his brow, but frustrated by the decrepitude which chains me to the spot.—Why should I wish it otherwise? What have my seerch-owl voice, my hideous form, and my mis-shaped features, to do with the fairer workmanship of nature? Do not men receive even my benefits with shrinking horror and ill-suppressed disgust? And why should I interest myself in a race which produces an outlaw, and which has treated me as such? 'No; by all the ingratitude which I have repaid—and all the wrongs which I have sustained—by my imprisonment, my exile, my deformed, my tyrannical, rebel shapes of humanity! I will not be the fool, nor have been, to swerve from my principles whenever there has been an appeal, a forth, to my feelings; as if I, too, were whom none show sympathy, ought to have sympathy with any one. Let despair her caged ear through the over-weighed mass of humanity; let her throw this decrepit form, this misshapen mortality, under her wheels, that the Wised, the Hunch-back, may save for some far form the same some-born, some-bred wolf," said the Dwarf, "as ever I saw a lamb-at-foot at night."

The night continued sullen and stormy, as far as refreshed by the coolness of the Palestinian Moors, with its broad black expanse, interspersed with marshy ground, seemed to smile under the solemn stars, which, as good-humour spread the visible charm over the placid human

The heath was in its thickest and densest, the bees, which the Solitary had heard in the evening at the corner of the path, filled the air with the murmurs of their old man, crooked by the little hill, went up to him, and hissed his dusk for the vegetables with which he was from his garden. "You, at least, he's best, see no difference in form which

As he was plunged in these glooms, he heard the tramp of a horse at the enclosure, and a strong soft voice the liveliness inspired by a light heart.

Canny Hobbie Elliot, canny Hobbie av.

Canny Hobbie Elliot, I've gone along.

At the same moment, a large dog sprang o'er the hither side of the fence. It was the sportmen in these wilds, that the dogs scent of the game, a train of the usual objects of chase, that the huntsman will sometimes fly upon them. The dog instantly pulled down and throttled one of the geese, while the Dwarf, who jumped from his horse for the purpose, to extricate the harmless animal from the affright until it was expiring. I started into an excess of frenzy, and un- napped a sharp knife, or dagger, which he had, and laid it down. I then observed that I had no more than one eye, and this, ten. Hobbie, perceiving his purpose, interposed, and held of his hand, exclaining, "Let 2 be- on, lie—he be the hound!—Na, na, Kill-

Daw turned his rage on the young farmer: a sudden effort, far more powerful than expected from such a person, freed his wrist in a moment, and he drew his dagger at his heart. The weapon was done in the twinkling of an eye, and the d of Reclusé might have completed his ven- tilating the weapon in Elliot's bosom, not been checked by an internal impulse which I hurried to the distance.

"He exclaimed, as though voluntarily de- tained to the means of gratifying his rage: and 5, I took a step or two in great surprise, out, and disdain, at having been placed in danger by an object apparently so contemptible.

"The reason, a dog and mattock, were the first words that escaped him, which waded up with an apology for the accident that had taken place, to their dis- ease, and I am sorry to say to you, that I love this, that I, the worst, should have occurred; but I'll send you two for a few hours, man, to make a straight A man like you shouldn't bear malice a poor excuse for a thing: ye see that a goat's like asset in a deer, saw he act but according to reason after a.

"Out, hind!" exclaimed the Dwarf; "home! home to your dwelling, and think on me when you find what has befallen there.

"Aweel, so be it," said Hobbie, mounting his horse; "it serves nothing to strive w' cripplings,—they are aye cankered, but I'll just tell ye ae thing, neighbour, that if things be otherwise weel wi' Grace she's the most scroucher if there be a tar- barred in the five parishes.

So saying, he rode off; and Elshie, after looking at him with a scornful and indignant look, took some steps from him himself in digging a grave for his deceased favourite.

A low whistle, and the words, "Hieh, Elshie, hieh!" disturbed him in this melancholy occupation. He looked up, and saw that the Westburnfat was before him. Like Banquo's murderèd soul, Blood clung to his face, as well as upon the rowsels of his spurs and the sides of his over-ridden horse.

"How now, ruffian?" demanded the Dwarf, "is thy job chared?"

"Ay, ay, doubt not that, Elshie," answered the freebooter; "when I ride, my face may mean. They have had mair light than comfort at the Brough-foot this morning; there's a true byre and a wide, and a wail and a cry for the bonny bride.

"The bride?"

"Ay; Charlie Cheats-the-Woodie, as we ca' him; that's Charlie Foster of Tinning Beck, has promised to keep her in Cumberland till the blast blow by. She saw me, and kend me in the spore, for the mask fell free my face for a blink. I am thinking it wad come better my safety if she were to come back here, for there's mony o' the Elliotts, and they band weel the- gither for right or wrong. Now, what I chiefly come to ask your rede in, is how to make her sure!"

"Wouldst thou murder her?"

"Ump! no, no; that I would not do, if I could help it. But they say they can whiles get folk canny away to the plantations from some of the out- landers they have been to boot the bonny wenches. They're wanted beyond seas by female cattle, and there is none to spare here. But I think of doing better for this lassie. There's a kiddy, that, unless she be the better born, is to be sent to foreign parts whether she will or no; now, I think of sending Grace to wait on her—she's a bonny lassie. Hobbie will hae a merry morning when he comes home, and me my birth and gear.

"Ay; and do you not pity him?" said the Reclusé.

"Wad he pity me were I grasping up the Castle hill at Jeddart? And yet I me something for the bit of nisiness; but he'll get another, and little skitln during the same is as good as another. And now, you that like to hear o' spures, hear ye ever o' a better aye than I have had this morning?"

"Air, ocean, and fire," said the Dwarf, speaking to himself, "the earthquake, the tempest, the volcano, are all mild and moderate, compared to the wrath of man. And what is this fellow, but one more- skilled of his kind and the rest?—Hear me, fagon, go again where I before sent thee."

"To the Steward?"

"Ay; and tell him, Elshie, the Reclusé commands him to give the gold. But, hear me, let the maiden be discharged free and uninjured, return her to her friends, and let her swear not to discover thy villany."

"Swear!" said Westburnfat; "but what if she stocked with cattle, all the wealth of an upland "ev-ator of the period, of which poor Eilott possessed.

"I don't know what it is," thought the author idly, "I wonder if the gold could have been carried for a single night. He stood a moment motionless, and then exclaimed, "I am ruined—ruined to the ground!"

"But curse on the world's great!—Had it not been the pitiful episode of the abandoned bride—but I will keep up a heart, or they will lose them a therigence.

"Manfully strode Hobbie down the hill, resolu-to suppress his own despair, and neither show his motion, which never was a temperament of misfortune. Ere he reached the top of the bank from which he could look down on his own habitation, he was met by his nurse, a goodly, middle-aged woman, all familiar shuffling in Scotland, whether of the higher or middling classes.
The connexion between them and their foster-children was considered a tie far too dearly intimate to be broken, and it usually happened, in the course of years, that the nurse became a resident in the family of her foster daughter, assisting in the domestic duties, and receiving all marks of attention and regard from the family. So soon as Hobbie recognised the figure of Anneke, in her red cloak and black head, he could not help exclaiming to himself, "What ill luck has brought the tired nurse so far from home, that never sires a gun-shot frea the door-step for ordinary?—Hunt, it will just be to get blueberries, or whortleberries, or some such stuff out of the moss, to make the pies and tarts for the foster home. I cannot get the words of that canker-nursle, natty dailie-buckie o' me head—the least thing makes me dread some ill news.—O, killuckie, man! was there nae dear and goats in the curtain?—Ah, I'll be no there without the threeling be brought to gang and worry his creature, by a other folk's"?

By this time Anneke, with a braw like a tragic volcanic, had hobbled towards him, and caught his hand in hers. As they were walking, her look was so evident as to deprive even him of the power of asking the cause. "O my bairn!" she cried, "gang on forward—gang on forward—it's a sight to kill any body, but slane there, "

"In God's name, what's the matter?" said the noted horseman, endeavouring to extract his crib from the grasp of the old woman; "for Heav'n's sake, let me see and see what's the matter."

"Oh! that I should have lived to see the day!—
This stealing a' in a low, and the bonny stack-yard lying in the red-ashes, and the gear a' driven away.
Gang on forward; it was break your young heart, to see what my muckle cen has seen this morning."

"And who has dared to do this? let me go braidle, Anneke—where is my grandmother—my sisters—Ah! is it Grace Armstrong?—God! the words of the warlock are knelling in my ears!"

"Sprang from his horse to ride himself of Ammacock's interruption, and, ascending the hill with great speed, he could see the smoke of the village with which he had threatened him. It was indeed a heartbreaking sight. The habitation which he had left in its ruins—seized the mountain-stream, surrounded with the boulders of rustling wood, was now a wasted and blackened ruin. From amongst the shattered and sable walls the smoke continued to rise. The turf-stack, the barn-yard, the offices bottom of the hill, pushed on through the crowd, unable, from the tumultuous scene, to feel his motions, to do more than receive and return the grasps of the friendly hands by which his neighbours and kinsmen anxiety expressed their sympathy in his misfortune. With the aid of Tonio of Hackburn's hand, his anxiety at length found words. "Thank ye, Simon — thank ye, neighbours — I ken what ye wad a' say. But where are they? — Where are ye? —" He stopped, and turned hastily towards the hut into which Hobbie precipitated himself with the desperate air of one who is resolved to use the least possible show. A general and powerful expression of sympathy accompanied him. "Ah, puir fellow — puir Hobbie!"

"He'll learn the worst o' it now!"

"He'll learn the worst o' it now!"

"He'll learn the worst o' it now!"

"Hearnirsch will get some speerings o' the puir lassie!"

Such were the exclamations of the group, who, having no acknowledged leader to direct their motions, were afraid to allow their caresses to allay the sobs of one who might be brought to prevent the distinction of the absence of one yet more beloved.

"God help thee, my son! He can help when worldly trust is a broken reed. — Such was the welcome of his waver! Unhappily, his look eagerly round, holding two of his sisters by the hand, while the third hung about his neck. — D'ye see, I count you — my grandmother, Lilias, Jean, and the youngest, but what ye call the hesitates, and then continued as if with an effort, where is Grace? Ee surely this is not a time to hide herself, for true friends are not in need of a time for daffing now."

"O, brother! And, "Our pour Grace!" was the only answer his questions could procure, till his grandmother rose up, and gently disengaged him from the weeping girls, led him to a seat, and with the assistance of his sisters, held him in her arms. "The potato was plucked, and sprinkled on the waves, can throw over the most acute feelings, she said. "My bairn, when thy grand-father was killed in the wars, and left me with six orphans around me, with scarce bread to eat, or a roof to cover us, I had strength — not of mine own — but I had strength given me to say, The Lord's will be done! — My son, our peaceful house was last night in the hands of the devil and murder — and we have taken and destroyed all, and carried off our dear Grace! Pray for strength to say will be done!"

"Oh my mother! urge me not — I cannot — not now — I am a sinful man, and of a hardened heart. Masked — armed — Grace carried off!" Gie me my sword, and my father's kempack — I will have vengeance!

"O my bairn, my bairn! be patient under the rod. Who knows when he may lift his hand off us? Young Earnirsch, Heaven bless him, has taken the chase, with Davie of Stenhouse, and the first comer. I tried to let house and plundering house, and follow the revilers to recover Grace, and Earnirsch and his men were over the Fell within three hours after the devil took him! he's not Earnirsch, he's his father's true son, true friend."

"A true friend indeed; God bless him!" exclaimed Hobbie; "let's on and away, and take the chase after him."

"O, my child, before you run on danger, let me hear you but say, His will be done!"

"Urge me not, mother — not now. He was rushing out, when, looking back, he observed his grand- father at the door of his cottage. He turned hastily, threw himself into her arms, and said, "Yes, mother, I can say, His will be done, since it will comfort you."

"My dear brother! He go forth with you, my dear bairn; and, O, may He give you courage to say on your return, His name be praised!"

"Farewell, mother! farewell, my dear sisters!" exclaimed Eilidh, and rushed out of the house.

CHAPTER VIII.

Now howre and battick, cried the Land, — Now howre and battick, round and battick.

They that winna ride for Trifer's kye, Let them never look in the face o' me.

Horse! horse! and spear! exclaimed Hobbie to his kinsman. Many a ready foot was in the stirrup; and, while Elliot hastily collected arms and accoutrements, the gates opened, and the blacksmiths of Home resounded with the approbation of his younger friends.

"Ay, ay!" exclaimed Simon of Hackburn, that's the gate to take it, Hobbie. Let women sit and greet their sons; such must they be done by; it's the Scripture says!"

"Haud your tongue, sir," said one of the senior, sternly; "dinnna abuse the Word that gie ye dinna kent what it means!" said Simon; "if ye canna make theuther yours, dinnna keep back them that can."

"Whistle, sir; was ye take vengeance or ye ken who has worn ye out?" Yest." D'ye think we dinna ken the road to England as well as our fathers before us? — All evil comes out o' the way it's aye said aye, and we'll e'en aye say aye, if the devil was blowing us south.

"We'll follow the track o' Earnirsch's horses over the waste, cried one Elliot."

"I'll pick them out through the blindest moor in the Border, an the day be a fair held there the day before Christmas, the blacksmiths of Hengeburn, for I aye shoe his horse wi' my ain hand."

"Lay on the deer-hounds," cried another; "where are they?"

"Joust, man, the sun's been lang up, and the dew is aff the ground — the scent will never lie."

Hobbie instantly whistled on his hounds, which were ranging about the ruins of their old habitation, and filling with a memory, like the sound of the bell, the sleepless, the voice of the blacksmiths of Hengeburn, "for, I aye shoe his horse wi' my ain hand."

"Now, Killbuck," said Hobbie; "try thy skill this day — and then, as if a light had suddenly broke on him, "—that ill-faured goblin spak someth o' this! He's ken mer o', either by villains on earth, or devils below — I'll hae it true him, if I should cut it out o' his mis-shapen bokk wi' my whinger."

He then hastily gave directions to his comrades; "Four devils to ye, ye, wi' bus, ye — the devil's too fast for Grammogap. If they're English, they'll be for being back that way. The rest disperse by twosome and thresher through the waste, and meet me at the Trysting-pool. Tell my boy — be as fast as they can — and meet me there. Poor lads, they will have hearts ween-might as sair as mine; little think they what a sorrowful house they are bringing their venison to! I'll ride ower Muckle's hill, for myself."

"And if I were you," said Dick of the Dingle, "I would speak to Canny Elsie. He can tell you whatsoever besides in this land, if he's sae minded."

"He shall tell me," said Hobbie, who was busy putting his arms in order, "what he kens o' this night's job, or I shall right well ken wherfore he does not.

"And speak him fair, my bonny man — speak him fair, Hobbie; the like o' him will no bear thrashing. They converse, sue,muckle wi' thri' fraticious gaunts and evil spirits, that it clean spoils their tempers."

"Let me alane to guide him," answered House; "there's that in my breast this day, that would over-muster a' the warlocks on earth, and a' the devils in hell."

And being now fully equipped, he threw himself on his horse, and spurred him at a rapid pace against the steep ascent. Elliot speedily surrounded the hill, rode down the other side of the same rate, crossed a wood, and traversed a long glen, ere he at length regained Mucklestone-Moor. As he was obliged, in the course of his journey, to relax his speed in consideration of the labour which his horse might have to undergo.
ne had time to consider maturely in what manner he should act, in order to extract from him the knowledge which he supposed him to be in possession of, concerning the authors of his misfortunes. Hobbie, though blunt, plain of speech, and hot of disposition, like most of his countrymen by a certain defectiveness in the dangerous which is also their characteristic. He reflected, that from what he had observed on the memorable night when the Dwarf was first seen, and from the conduct of that mysterious being ever since, he was likely to be rendered even more obstatant in his sullenness by threats and violence.

"I'll speak him fair," he said, "as said Dickon above me. Though folk say he has a league with Satan, him can he see an intimate devil as no to take some pity in a case like mine; and folk throw he'll whiles do good, charitable sort of things. I'll keep my heart dry as I can, and I'll strike him with the hair; and if the wart come to the wart, it's but wringing the head o' him about at last."

In this disposition of accommodation he approached the heart of the Subterranean. The old man was not upon his seat of audience, nor could Hobbie perceive him in his garden, or enclosure.

"He's gotten into his very keep," said Hobbie, "maybe out o' the gate; but I'll pu' it doun about his hags, if I canna win at him otherwise.

"Having thus communed with himself, he raised his voice. "Elshie, me dear Elshie!" he cried in an invitation as supposing his conflicting feelings would permit. "Elshie, my guide friend!" Not reply. "Elshie, canny Faither Elshie!" The Dwarf remained mute. Sorrel, the dog, was in the road as the Booked wereaper, with the dread between his teeth; and then again attempting a soothing tone,—"Good Faither Elshie, a most miserable creature desires some counsel of your wisdom."

"Oh, I'll tell ye that, and disguise your voice of the Dwarf through a very small window, resembling an arrow-slit, which he had constructed near the door of his dwelling, and through which he could see any one who approached it, without the possibility of their knowing so.

"What's the matter!" said Hobbie impatiently; "what is the better, Elshie? Do you not hear me tell you I am the most miserable wretched living!"

"And of a fact, you tell me tell you it is so much the better?" said Hobbie impatiently; "what is the matter, Elshie? Do you not hear me tell you I am the most miserable wretched living!"

"And of a fact, you tell me tell you it is so much the better?" said Hobbie impatiently; "what is the matter, Elshie? Do you not hear me tell you I am the most miserable wretched living!"

"Ye may have lost all this," answered Hobbie, in the bitterness of emotion; "land and friends, goods and gear; ye may hae lost them all—but ye ne'er can lose heart as mine, for ye ne'er lost heart Grace Armstrong. And now my last hopes are gone, and I shall ne'er see her mair."

"This he said in the tone of deepest emotion—and that he had not followed for his name had overwhelmed the more angry and irritable feelings of poor Hobbie. Ere he had again addressed the Solitary, the bony hand and long fingers of the great leathern bag, was thrust forth at the small window, as it unclutched the burden, and let it drop with a clang upon the ground, his harsh voice again addressed Elshie.

"Three—there lies a salve for every human woe."

at least, each human wretch readily thinks. Return twixt two of naught is the first step of the day, and torment me no more with great平原, or thrones: they are alike absurd."

"It is a gowd, by Heaven!" said Elshie, glancing at the mast of the craft, and then the Hermit. "Muckle obliged for your and I wad blithely gie you a bond for a siller, or a wind's ower the lands o' Wye I didna ken, Elshie; to be free wi' you, I to use siller unless I kend it was deca-the and maybe it might turn into sels-stanes some poor man."

"Ignorant idiot!" scouted the Dwarf, it as common poison as ever was dug bowels of the earth. Take it-use it, a with you as it hath done with me!"

"But I tell you," said Elshie, "it was near the yard, doubtless, and thirty head of more were on this side of the Catrail—but gang, if ye could but gie me a theatre! I would be your alter ego, and in that thing that didna touch my salvation, speak, man, speak.

"Well then," answered the Dwarf, as by his importance, "since then has so woe of thine own, but must needs set thyself with those of a partner, such her hast lost in the Wye."

"In the Wye? That's a wide world."

"It is the last," said the Dwarf, "wh to utter;" and he drew the shutters of leaving Hobbie to make the most of the seven.

The west! the thought of the west! it is pretty quiet down that way, until the Todesole and he's owner and now可怜的Wye.Why is life, it is

"Elshie, just tell me what you right? Is it Westburn hall? If I am you wadna like to write an innocent negligence-No answer! It must be the Red didn't think he would have ventured to sae many kin as there's o' us—I am the have some better backing than his Cumbri-Farewell to you, Elshie, and mony downs was fasht at the slend, I've nae awa' to meet my friends at the Tryning, if ye carenae to open the window, ye can after I'm awa'."

Still there was no reply.

"He's dead, or he's daft, or he's haid nae time to stay to clawn w' him."

And off rode Hobbie Elshie towards the rendezvous which he had named after. Four or five riders were already at the Tryning-pool. They stood in close concert, while their horses were permit among the paplars which overviewing the pool. A more numerous party were from the southward. It proved to be Fa's party who had followed the track of so far as the English border, but had halted, some information that a considerable force was under some of the Jacobite gentlemen there; and there were tidings of insurrection parts of Scotland, from which which had been perpetrated the apparent animosity, or love of plunder; and the new was disposed to regard it as a symptom. The young gentleman greeted Hobbie with sincere sympathy, and informed him of some which had received.

"Then, may I never stir free the b, as if dull, Bucklow is nomination at the bottom villain! Ye see he's learned to hate the Catholics; and that agrees well with hinted about Westburn, for Fillick gave him, and he wan't be happy to betray and country about his aim and hands he had.

Some now remembered that the party who had been heard to say they were seeing fences, they were by no means confident in the truth of the old dame's assertion, that she alone composed them. However, she made the best of it, and the land had observed hoof-marks in the track by which they approached the tower, which seemed to indicate that several persons had very lately passed in that direction.

"Mind how you walk through their want of care for means for attacking the place. There was no hope of procuring ladders long enough to reach the battlements, and the windows, besides being very narrow, were sealed with iron bars. Scarcely was therefore out of the question; mining was still more so, for want of tools and jumpers; neither were the besiegers provided with food, means of shelter, or other comfort, the cold and hunger having enabled them to convert the siege into a blockade, and there would, at any rate, have been a risk of relief from some of the marauder's comrades. Hobbie grumbled and gnashed his teeth, as, walking round the fastness, he could devise no means of making a forcible entry."

At length he suddenly exclaimed, "And what for no do as our fathers did lang syne?—Put hand to the work, lads. Let us cut up busies and briers, pile them before the door and set fire to them, and smoke that devil's damn as if she were to be roasted for bacon."

All immediately closed with this proposal, and some cleared with their knives towards the old alder and Hawthorn bushes which grew by the side of the sluggish stream, many of which were sufficiently decayed and dried for their purpose, while others selected them in a belt on the other side of the track, properly disposed for burning, as close to the iron-gate as they could be piled. Fire was speedily obtained from one of their guns, and Hobbie was already advancing to the pool, kindling the wood from the early fagots of the outer door of the timber, and the muzzle of a musqueton, were partially shown at a shot-hole which flanked the entrance. "Mony thanks to ye," he said, accordingly, "for calling me kith and kin for us; lest if ye step a foot nearer wi' that lunt, it be the dearest step ye ever made in your days."

"Well, see what," said Hobbie, advancing for a moment with the torch. The marauder snapped his piece at him, which, fortunately for our honest friend, did not go off; while Earnscliff, firing at the same moment at the narrow aperture and slight mark afforded by the robber's face, grazed the side of his head with a bullet. He had apparently calculated upon his shot affording him more security, for he no sooner felt the wound, than he took a light one, then he hastened a parley and demanded to know what they meant by attacking in this fashion a peaceable and honest man, and shedding his blood in that lawless manner?"

"Nothing," said Earnscliff, "to be delivered up to us in safety."

"And what concern have you with her?" repeated the marauder.

"They" returned Earnscliff, "you, who are detaining her by force, have no right to inquire."

"Awee, I think I can cie a guess," said the robber. "Well, sir, I am laith to enter into deadly feud with you by spilling any of your blood, though Earnscliff has stepped to shed mine—and he can hit a mark to a grain's breadth—so, to prevent mair skait, I am willing to deliver up the prisoner, since nae less will please you."

"And Hobbie's gear?" cried Simon of Hackburn.

"D ye think ye're to be free to plunder the faulds and byres of a gentle Elliot, as if they were an auld wife's linn's ca'we?"

"As I live by bread," replied Willie of Westburnflat. "As I live by bread, I have not a single foot o' them! They're a' over the march lang syne; therefore, I'll see what o' them can be gotten back, and I'll take a day or two days to meet Hobbie at the Castleton wi' twa friends on ilk side, and see to make an again of the wrong we've wyt off me wi'."

"Aye, said Elliot, "that will do very enough."

"And then aside to his kinsman, "Murrain on the gear! I fordsake, man! say nought about them, let us get puir Gracc out o' that auld hellicat's churches."

"Will ye give me your word, Earnscliff," said the marauder, who still lingered at the shot-hole, "your faith and troth? For God's sake, let me free to come and free to gae, with five minutes to open the gate, and five minutes to stick it and to draw the bolts! I'll winna do, for they want craving saith."

"Will ye give me your word?" said Hobbie."

"You shall have full time," said Earnscliff; "I plight my faith and troth, my hand and my glove."

"Wait there a moment, then," said Westburnflat; "or hear ye what? I wad rather ye wad that I was a pistol-shot from the door. It's no that I mistrus your word, Earnscliff; but it's best to be sure."

Q friend, thought Hobbie to himself, as he drew back, and said you on Turnoverhill, and me body by but twa honest lads to see fair play, I wad make ye wish ye had broken your leg ere ye had touched beast or body that belonged to me!"

"He has a white feather in his wing this very Westburnflat, after a," said Simon of Hackburn, somewhat scandalized by his ready surrender."

"He'll ne'er fill his father's boots."

In the meanwhile, the inner door of the tower was opened, and the mother of the freebooter appeared in the space betwixt that and the outer gate. Willie himself was next seen, leading forth a female, and the old lady, pale and steady, fastened it with her hands, remained on the post as a sort of sentinel."

"Ony ane or twa o' ye come forward," said the outlaws, "and take her free my hand hail and sound."

"Grace Armstrong," said Hobbie, "the true bride. Earnscliff followed more slowly to guard against treachery. Suddenly Hobbie slackened his pace in the deepest mortification, while that of Earnscliff was hastened in patient surmise. It was not Grace Armstrong, but Miss Isabella Vers, whose liberation had been effected by their appearance before the tower."

"Where is Grace Armstrong? Where is Grace Armstrong?" exclaimed Hobbie, in the extremity of wrath and indignation.

"Not in my hands," answered Westburnflat: "ye may search the tower if ye misdoubt me."

"You false villain, you shall account for her, or I'll blow your spot," said Elliot, presenting his gun."

But his companions, who now came up, instantly disarmed him of his weapon, explaining, all at once, "Hand and glove! faith and troth! Hand a care Ebbie; we manna keep our faith wi Westburnflat, we're the greatest rogues ever rook."

Thus were protected, the outlines recovered of his audacity, which had been somewhat daunted by the menacing gesture of Elliot."

"I have kept my word, sir," he said, "and I look to have another and another. If in the course of the morning, ye sought, I said, addressing Earnscliff, 'ye'll render her back to me again. I am answerable for her to those that might her."

"For God's sake, Mr. Earnscliff, protect me," said Miss Vers, clinging to her deliverer; "do not you abandon one whom the whole world seems to have abandoned."

"Peep nother," whispered Earnscliff, "I will protect you with my life."

Then turning to Westburnflat, "Villain!" he said, "how dared you to insult this lady?"

"For that matter, Earnscliff, answered the freebooter, "I can answer to them that has better right to ask me than you have; but if you come with armed force, and take her swa' from them that her friends lodged her wi', how will you answer that? But it's your ain affair—Nae single man can keep a tower against twenty—A the men o' the Mearns doon ma' thair they down."

"It's my own business," said Isabella; "he carried me off by violence from my father."

"Maybe he only wanted ye to think sae, hanny," replied the robber; "but it's me business o' mine, let it be as it may. So ye winna resign her back to me?"

"There is a level meadow, on the very margin of the two streams, with a small dell, where the lady's song meet, Crimons joins the Liddel. It is said to have earth, where that old lady used to be a piece frequently guarded for water, during the summer between a few and a brace.
CHAPTER X.

I left my lady's tower last night—
It was filled with sadness,
I lock'd it when the sun was bright,
And wept the rose-blow.

Senecio at what he dreamed the coldness of his friends, in a cause which interested him so nearly.
Hobble had shrank himself five of their company, and was in a very high state of excitement.
"You found them?" I said to him, as he appeared impatiently his over-fatigued and stumbling horse; "you art like a rat in the woods. I do not breathe, and could then snap now and break my neck at my utmost need? But thou'rt even like the fives-- the farthest off of them all is my cousin ten times removed, now on his solitary road homesick, and to sea my best blood; and now, and think they show man's report to the common thief of Westmorland that him sinless. But I should see the lights now high in heaven. I do not breathe, and meantime, reckoning himself, "there will neither coal nor candle-light shine in the Hugh-foot any more!" An it were for my mother and sisters, and poor Grace, I could find in my heart to go on, for I knew the sea, and I knew the the sea to make an end of all!"

In this disconsolate mood he turned his horse's bridle towards the cottage in which his family had found refuge.

As he approached the door, he heard whispering and tittering amongst his sisters. "The devil's in the women," said Hobble to this would nicker, and laugh, and giggle, if their best friend was lying a-corp—and yet I am glad they can keep up their hearts so well, poor silly things; but the dirtifus was nae to me, to be sure, and the bigger they were.

While he thus meditated, he was engaged in fastening up his horse in a shed. "Thou munm do without horse-sheet and suremple now, lad," he said, addressing the animal; "you and me has a down come alike, we had better hab in 'em in the deepest pool o' Tarra.

He was interrupted by the youngest of his sisters, who came running out, and, speaking in a constrained voice, as if to stifle some emotion, called out to him,
"What are ye doing there, Hobble, fiddling about the naigs, and there's ane free Cumberland been waiting for ye this hour and morn! Hast ye in morn; I'll take off the saddle."

"Ane free Cumberland!" exclaimed Elliot, and putting the bridle of his horse into the hand of his sister, he rushed into the cottage. "Where is he?
where is he?"

"He's come frae Cumberland," exclaimed Gifts, and seeing only females, "Did he bring news of Grace?"

"He doon't him an instant langer," said the elder sister, still with a suppressed laugh.

"Houf he, bairns!" said the old lady, with some of a good-humoured reproof, "ye shouln't vex your billy Hobble that way. Look round, my bairn, and see if there iver ane here mair than ye left this mornin."

House looked eagerly round. "There's you, and the three titties."

There's no use of us now, Hobbie, lad," said the youngest, at this moment entered.

In an instant Hobble had in his arms Grace Ann Beck, who, with one of his sister's pails around her, had passed unnoticed at his first entrance. "How dared you do this?" said Hobbie.

"It wasna my fault," said Grace, endeavoring to cover her face with her hands to hide at once her blushes, and escape the stent of hearty kisses with which her bridegroom punished her simple strangem. "It wasna my fault, Hobbie; ye shouln't kiss Jeanie and the rest of them, for they'll rue the day!"

"And so," added Hobbie, "and kissed his sister and grandmother a hundred times, while the whole party half-laughed, half-cried, in the exuberance of their joy. "I am the happiest man," said Hobble, "after having himself most exhausted, 'I am the happiest man in the world!'"

"Then, O my dear bairn," said the good old dame, who lost no opportunity of teaching her lesson of religion at these moments when the heart was best open to receive it,—"Then, O my son, give praise to Him that brings smiles out of tears and joy out of sorrow, as he brought light out of darkness and the world out of nothing. Was it not my word, that if ye could say His will be done, ye might have cause to say His name be praised?"

"It was not your word, grannie, and I do praise Him for His mercy, and for having me a good parent when my sin was great," said honest Hob-be, taking her hand, "that puts me in mind to think of Him, in all happiness and distress."

There was a solemn pause of one or two minutes employed in the exercise of mental devotion, which expressed in part such sincerity, the gratitude of the recipient, and the benevolence of the giver, and unexpectedly restored to their embraces the friend whom they had lost.

Hobble's first inquiries were concerning the adventures that had marked his and endure. They were told at length, but mentioned in substance only.

That she was warned by the noise which the results made in breaking into the house, the man, who was overpowered; that, dressing herself hastily, she ran down stairs, and having seen, in the words,
TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

Westburnflat's wizard drop off, improvidently named him by his name, and brought him for mercy; that the ruffian instantly stopped her mouth, dragged her from the house, and placed her on horseback, behind one of the three, and bolted away, Hobbie!''

"I'll break the secured neck of him," said Hobbie, "if there were another Graeme in the land but himself!"

And proceeded to say, that she was carried southward along with the party, and the spoil which they drove before them, until they had crossed the Border. Suddenly a person, known to her as a kinsman of Westburnflat, came riding very quickly after the rest, and held their leader, that his cousin had learnt from a sure hand that no luck would come of it unless the law was restored to her friends. After some discussion, the chief of the party secured a quarter. Grace was placed behind her new guardian, who pursued in silence, and with great speed, the least frequented path to the Heugh-foot, and afterwards, closed, set down the injured and terrified damsel within a quarter of a mile of the dwelling of her friends. Many and sincere were the congratulations which passed on all sides.

As these emotions subsided, less pleasing considerations intruded themselves.

"This is a miserable place for ye a," said Hobbie, looking around him; "I can sleep weel enough myself, ounly beside the muir, as in time done mony a lang night there. Can we hold yer here, or shall I bring ye up, I canna see! And what's warn, I canna mend it; and what's warn't as, ye might come, and the day after that, without your being a bit better."-

"It was a coward's word," said one of the sisters, looking round, "to harry a poor family to the bare wans't this gate."

"And leave us neither stark nor stot," said the youngest brother, who now entered, "nor sleep nor lunk, nor night that cuts grass and corn."

"If they had an quarrel wi' us," said Harry, the second brother, "were we na ready to have fought them?"

And there was nae harm in the hill-boat, and nae an' upon the hill-Odd, as we had been at home, Will Graeme's stomach shouldn't have wanted its morning; but it's biding him, is it na, Hobbie?"

"Our neighbours have been a day at the Castleton to gree' wi' him at the sight o' men," said Hobbie, mournfully; "they behooved to have't ain sight o' gate, or they'd have bit the hands."

"To gree' wi' him!" exclaimed both his brothers at once, "after seein' an act of stoutheartedness as sae been seen o' in the country, since the auld riding days!"

"The hill-boat's but a small matter of the game at it; but the sight o' Grace Armstrong has set it brawly."

"But the smoking, Hobbie?" said John Elliot; "we're utterly naired. Harry and I have been to gather what's was on the ootby land, and there's scarce on court left. I kenna how we're to carry on."

"We maun a gang to the wars," thought Westburn-flat hauns the means, e'en if he had the will, to make up our loss; there's nae means to be got o' him, but what ye take out o' his banes. He has nae four-footed creature but the violent blood thing he rides on, and that's nae trash'd got o' his night work. We are reined stoep and roop."

Hobbie cast a mournful glance on Grace Armstrong, who returned it with a downcast look and a gentle sigh.

"Dinna be cast down, barna," said the grandmater, "we have guid friends that winn fare us sake in adversity. There's Sir Thomas Kettlehead is my thing to ride by and he has come by a noble battle, and been made a Knight-honour to the ogg, for being one o' the commissioners at the Union."-

"I wadna gie a bodie to save us frae famishing," said Hobbie; "and, if he did, the breed that I bought said it would stick in my throat, when I thought it was for the profit of our auld Scotland's crown and independence."

"There's the Laird o' Dundon, ane o' the auld families in Yvidale."
THE BLACK DWARF.

have once ye keep the saddle four-and-twenty hours

"The night's very dark," said Hobbe, rising and looking through the casement of the cottage, and, looking at the field. "Can it be that Hobbe, the real honest fellow, yet sometime I would rather take daylight wi' me when I gang to visit him.

This frank avowal put a stop to further argument;
and, after the night had been shortly passed, the rashness of his brother's counsel, and his sudden cautions which he received from his grandmother, refreshed himself with such food as the cottage afforded. He then went towards the central part of the shed, and retired to the shed, and stretched himself beside his trusty poltery.

His brothers shared between them the tins of clean raw, dispositioned in the stall, and the females arranged themselves for repose, as well as the accommodations of the cottage would permit.

With the first dawn of morning, Hobbe arose;
and, rising reddened and saddled his horse, he set forth. He had engaged the company of either of his brothers, from an idea that the Dwarf was most propitious to those who visited him alone.

"The creature," said he to himself, as he went along,
"is no neighbourly; he's body at a time is full mair than he well can aible. I wonder if he's looked out o' the crib o' him to gather up the bag o' siller. If he's made wi' the bag o' siller, and he won't come again wi' the same, I, as I'm a body, and I'll be flingy. Come, Tarra,
"said he to his horse, striking him at the same time with his spur, make more fit, man; we maun be early wi' our quest, or we'll be cut off by it.

He was now on the heath, which began to be illuminated by the beams of the rising sun; the gentle dewiness which it was descending prevented him a dis-location of the same, he first put that in the air; "Coo-di-din!
Coo-di-din! to the silent abode of the Recluse, and stood as if in converse together in the open air. The taller form then stopped, as if taking something up which lay beside the door of the but, and then both moved forward a little way, and again halted, as in deep conference. All Hobbe's superstitious terrors revived on witnessing this spectacle.

That the Dwarf would open his dwelling to a mortal guest, and speak to him, and probable that any one would choose voluntarily to come to him, and under full conviction that he believed a wizard holding imprisoned with his familiar spirit, Hobbe pulled in at once his breath and his blade, resolved not to injure the inhabitants of either, by a hostile interposure in their conference. They were with his approach of his, for he had not halted for a moment before the Dwarf returned to his cottage; and the taller figure who had accompanied him, halted round the enclosure of the garden, and seemed to disappear from the eyes of the amazing Hobbe.

"Saw ever mortal, like o' that?" said Elliot;
"be tha's but a mad lad; Sir, if he were Bedelia himself, I' wi' some down the brae on him."

Yet, notwithstanding his assumed courage, he blackened his pace, when, nearly upon the very spot where the larger form stood, he turned the stall around, as if looking among the long heather, a small black rack-looking object, like a younger dog.

"He has nane dog that ear.
I ever heard," said Hobbe,
"but mony a d-o it's about his hand. Lord forgive me for saying sic a word!" It keeps its ground, what it is like—\"I'm judging it's a harder; but what seen what shape this bag o' siller will take to fright a laird, or woman wi' an husband, or cowardly hility when I come nae. I'll eat a drive a stat at it, for if it change its shape when I'm awa near, Tarras will never stand it; and it will o' awa may be he'll hit him and the devil to wi' bairn at ance.

He therefore cautiously threw a stone at the object, which continued motionless; "it's nae living," said Hobbe, approaching, "but the very big o' siller he flung out o' the window yesterday; and that other queer lang creature he brought home to lae meuch farther on the way to me." He then advanced and lifted the heavy fur pouch, which was quite full of gold. "Merry on us!" said Hobbe;
"but when I had paid my respects at the resihope and prospects in life, and suspicion of the purpose for which this assistance was afforded him—Merry on us! it's an awful thing to touch what has been seen by so many. I am determined to conduct myself like an honest man and talk of this; but all round me, I

He advanced accordingly to the cottage door, and having knocked repeatedly without receiving any answer, he at length elevated his voice, and addressed the inn of the hut. "Elibe! father, Elibe! I

"Weel, weel," replied Elliot, "since ye me willing to hear me, I've made my tale short. Since ye are so kind as to say ye are content to lend me some muckle siller as you have stock, and I am, at my part, to accept the courtesy wi' mony kind thanks; and, truth, I think it will be as safe in my hands as yours, if ye leave it flung about in that gate for the first loon body to lift, forbear the risk of had neighbours may win them stoole in doors and luck所在地, as I can tell to my cost.
I say, since ye hae sacre consideration for me,
I've been blithe to accept your kindness; and my mother in me (she's a life-tenant, and I am, far o' the lands of Widopens) would grant you a wadset, or an heri-table bond, for the siller, and to pay the annual rent half-yearly; and Saunder Wyldcote to draw the bond, and you to be at nane charge wae writin'it.

"Cut short thy jargon, and begone," said the Dwarf; "thy loquacious bull-headed honesty makes me a more intolerable plague than the light-fanged courier who is to be shot down by the first who meets him with either thanks, explanation, or apology.
Hence, I say! thou art one of those slave owners whose word is as good as their bond. Keep the more of thy principal and interest, until I demand it of thee."

"But," continued the pertinacious Borderer, we are a life-like and death-like, Elibe, and there will be a time when the world will remember the sae just make me a minute, or missive, in any form of life, and I'll write it fair, and subscribe it before famous witnesses. Only, Elibe, I wish it were put into something that may be presented to my salvation; for I'll have the minister to read it over, and it wad only be exposing yourself to the jeers. And now I'm gauming weel, for ye'll be weaken'd out of my cracks, and I am weare raid wi' cracking wi.
answer—and I'm bringing you a bit of bride's-cake some other day, and maybe bring Grace to see you. You'd like to see Grace, man, for as long as ye are—

"Oh, Lord! I wish he may be weel, that was a sair grace!" or, maybe, he thought I was speaking of his own.

"Poor man, I am very doubtful of his condition; but I am sure he is as kind to me as if I were his son, and a queer-looking father I had hee had, if that had been e'en him!"

Hobie now relieved his benefactor of his presence, and rode blithely home to display his treasure, and consult upon the means of repairing the damage which his fortune had sustained through the aggression of the Red Reiver of Westburn.

CHAPTER XI.

Three stallsa seized me yester morn,

Christabella.

The course of our story must here revert a little to Hobie. It is not a pleasant frame in which to have Miss Vere, in the unpleasant situation from which she was unexpectedly and indeed unintentionally liberated, by the appearance of Earncliff and Elliott, with their friends and on the tower of Westburn.

On the morning preceding the night in which Hobie's house was plundered and burnt, Miss Vere was requested by her father to accompany him in a walk through a distant part of the extensive grounds which lay round his castle of Ellieslaw.

"To hear was to obey," in the true style of Oriental despotism; but Isabella trembled in silence while she followed her father through rough paths, now winding by the side of the river, now ascending the precipices which seemed to guard it for its banks. A single servant, selected perhaps for his stupidity, was the only person who attended them. From her father's silence, Isabella little doubted that he had chosen this distant and sequestered scene to resume the argument which they had so frequently maintained upon the subject of Sir Frederick's addresses, and that he was inattentive in what manner he should most effectively impress upon her, the necessity of receiving him as her suitor. But her fears seemed for some time to be unfounded. The only sentences which her father from time to time addressed to her, were the usual repetitions of the beauty of the landscape through which they strolled, and which varied its features at every step. To these observations, although they seemed to come from a heart softened by grief and weariness, yet, as so much more important as well as as Isabella endeavoured to answer in a manner as free and unconstrained as it was possible for her to assume, amid the involuntary apprehensions which crowded upon her imagination.

Sustaining with mutual difficulty a desultory conversation, they at length gained the centre of a small wood, composed of large oaks, intermingled with birches, mountain-ash, hazel, holly, and a variety of underwood. The bowels of the tall trees met closely above, and the underwood filled up each interval between their trunks below. The spot on which they stood, was rather more open; still, however, embowered under the natural arcade of tall trees, and darkened on the sides for a space around by a great and lively growth of cope-pine and bushes.

"Here you, Isabella," said Mr. Vere, as he pursued the conversation, "I would have you remember, that if I were to erect an altar to Friendship—"

"To Friendship, sir!" said Miss Vere; "and why on this gloomy and sequestered spot, rather than on that which was so much better?

"The propriety of the local is easily vindicated," replied her father with a sneer. "You know, Miss Vere, (for you, I am well aware, are a learned young lady,)..."
THE BLACK DWARF.

and stumbled, it seemed, over the root of a tree, in making too eager a blow at his antagonist. The despair he felt at his daughter's disappearance, was, in Dixon's phrase, such as would have melted the heart of the most hardened and impassive. He was heard to moan, by his feelings, and the vain researches which he made to discover the track of the ravishers, that a considerable time elapsed ere he reached home, and curried the alarm to his domestics.

All his conduct and gestures were those of a desolate man.

"Speak not to me, Sir Frederick," he said impulsively, in his father's voice. "Your child is ungrateful one, I fear, but still my child—my only child. Where is Miss Ildefonte? she must know something of this. It corresponds with what I was in the habit of believing. Such a beautiful, lovely child, such a good lady, would not have left me thus."

"So far as I am concerned, you may regard her as dead," said Mr. Vere, grimly, "or in such a plight as to render it impossible to save her."

"What has happened, Mr. Vere, to discompose you?" said Mr. Ratcliffe, gravely; and while the Laird of Ellieslaw details to him, with the most affected voice and inflection, the sinister details of the adventure of the morning, we shall take the opportunity to inform our readers of the relative circumstances in which these gentlemen stood to each other.

Mr. Vere of Ellieslaw had been remarkable for a career of dissipation, which, in advanced life, he had exchanged for the less destructive career of dark and turbulent ambition. In both cases, he had gratified the predominant passion without respect to the diminution of his private fortune, although, where such inducements were wanting, he was deemed cautious, and grasping. His affluence, more than gratified by the earlier ease of elegance, he went to England, where he was understood to have formed a very advantageous matrimonial connexion. He was many years absent from his family estate. Suddenly and unexpectedly he returned a widower, bringing with him his daughter, then a girl of about ten years old. From this moment his expense seemed unbounded, in the eyes of the simple people around him. It was whispered that he must have plunged himself deeply in debt, and yet he continued to live in the same lavish expense, until some months before the commencement of his present position, when the suspicion of some embarrassed circumstances was confirmed, by the residence of Mr. Ratcliffe at Ellieslaw Castle, who, by the tacit consent, though obviously to the great disadvantage of the master, assumed, from the moment of his arrival, to assume and exercise a predominant and unaccountable influence in the management of his private affairs.

Mr. Ratcliffe was a grave, steady, reserved man, in an advanced period of life. To those with whom he had occasion to speak upon business, he appeared uncommonly well versed in all its forms. With others held little communication, but in any casual conversation, displayed the powers of an active and well-informed mind. For some time before taking up his final residence at the castle, he had been an occasional visitor there, and was at such times treated by Mr. Vere as his staunchest and most personal advocates towards those who were inferior to him in rank; with marked attention, and even deference. Yet his arrival always appeared to be an embarrassment to Mr. Vere, and he did not greatly gratify his partiality in his personal habits towards the family, it was impossible to observe indications of the displeasure with which Mr. Vere regarded his presence. Indeed, in any form of confidence and constraint, Mr. Vere's most important affairs were regulated by Mr. Ratcliffe; and although he was none of those indigent men of fortune, who, to turn the attention from their own business, are glad to devote it upon another, yet, in many instances, he was observed to give up his own judgment, and submit to the contrary opinions which Mr. Ratcliffe did not hesitate distinctively to express.

Nothing seemed to vex Mr. Vere more than when thosepungencies which were indicated by his conduct, were evaded, by saying with a forced laugh, "That Ratcliffe knew his own importance, but that he was the most honest and skilful fellow in the world; and that it would be wise to allow him to manage his own English affairs without his advice and assistance." Such was the person who entered the room at the moment Mr. Vere was summoning him to his presence, and who, with surprise, mingled with obvious incredulity, the laconic narrative of what had befallen Isabella.

Her father concluded, addressing Sir Frederick and the other gentlemen, who stood around in astonishment, "And now, my friends, you see the most unhappy father in Scotland. Lose me your assistance, gentlemaun—give me your advice, Mr. Ratcliffe. I am incapable of acting, or thinking, under the unexpected view of such a blow.

"Let us take our horses, call our attendants, and sear the country in pursuit of the villains," said Sir Frederick.

"Is there no one whom you can suspect?" said Ratcliffe, gravely, "of having some motive for this strange crime? These are not the days of romance, when ladies are carried off merely for their beauty."

"Fear," said Mr. Vere of Ellieslaw, "I have a mysterious right to confide in my own.

You see she writes to him as the confidant of a passion which he has the assurance to entertain for my daughter; tells him she serves his cause with her family, and that the further he removes from the garrison who serves him yet more effectually. Look particularly at the pencilled passages, Mr. Ratcliffe, where this meddlesome girl recommends bold measures, with an assurance that his suit would be successful anywhere beyond the bounds of the barony of Ellieslaw.

"And you argue, from this romantic letter of a very respectable young girl, that it is not by, but with Mr. Vere, "that young Earnscull has carried off your daughter, and committed a very great and criminal act of violence, on no better advice and assurance than that of Miss Isabella.""

"What else can I think?" said Ellieslaw.

"What else can you think?" said Sir Frederick; "or who else could have any motive for committing such a crime? No one seemed, from the moment of his arrival, to assume and exercise a predominant and unaccountable influence in the management of his private affairs."

"Were that the best mode of fixing the guilt," said Mr. Ratcliffe, calmly, "there might easily be pointed out persons to whom such actions are more congenial, and who have also sufficient motives of instigation. Supposing it were judged advisable to remove Miss Vere to some place in which constraint might be exercised upon her inclinations to a degree which she cannot resist, yet he attempted under the roof of Ellieslaw Castle—What says Sir Frederick Langley to that supposition?"

"I say," returned Sir Frederick, "that although Mr. Vere may choose to endure in Mr. Ratcliffe freedom totally inconsistent with his situation in life, I will not permit such license of incendio, by word or look, to be extended to me, with impunity."

"I say," said young Mary Macartach-Wells, "that the castle, that you are a starbuck to be standing wrangling here, instead of going in pursuit of the ruffians.

"I have pulled off the domestics, already in the track most likely to discover the villain," said Mr. Vere, "if you will favour me with your company, we will follow them, and assist in the search.

The efforts of the party were most anxiously prosecuted, and success directed the pursuit in the direction of Earnscull-Tower, the supposition that the owner would prove to be the author of the violence, so that they followed a direction diametrically opposite to that in which the ruffians had actually proceeded. In the evening they returned, harried and out of spirits, but other parties had in the meanwhile arrived at the castle; and, after the recent loss sustained by the owner, had been visited, concerned, and lamented, the recollection of it was, for the present, drowned in the discussion of cases of which the crisis and explosion were momentarily looked for.

Several of the gentlemen who took part in this diversion were Catholics, and all of them staunch Jacobites, whose hopes were at present at their highest pitch, as an invitation, in favour of the Pretender, was daily expected from France, which Scotland, between the defended states of its garrisons and fortified places, was now principally in the hands of the one faction, was rather prepared to welcome them to resist. Ratecliffe, who, on being shown to assist in their consultations upon this subject, was only invited to do so, had, in the mean time, called at Messrs.-Wells, who was sitting in his office, in a sort of honorary confinement, "until," said Mr. Vere, "she should be safely conveyed home to her father's house, and afforded an opportunity for which occurred on the following day.

The domestics could not help thinking it remarkable how soon the news of Miss Vere, and the strange man who had happened to be formally set down by the other guests at the castle. They knew not, that those the most interested in her fate were well acquainted with the cause of her being carried off, and that, in the morning of the next day, she had been locked up in the anxious and doubtful moments which preceded the breaking forth of a conspiracy, were little accessible to any feelings but what arose immediately out of their own machinations.

CHAPTER XII.

The researches after Miss Vere were (for the sake of appearance, perhaps) resumed on the succeeding day, with similar bad success, and the party were returned to Mr. Vere's in Elleslaw the evening.

"It is singular," said Marischal to Ratecliffe, "that five horsemen and a female prisoner, should have arrived the country without leaving the slightest trace. One would think they had traversed the air, or sunk through the ground."

"Men may often," answered Ratecliffe, "arrive at the knowledge of that which is, from discovering that which is not. We have not traced every root of the path, and track leading from the castle, in all the various parts of the compass, saving only that intricate and difficult path which leads southward down the hill of the church."

"And why have we not examined that?" said Marischal.

"Mr. Vere can best answer that question," replied his companion, "for you know who is he?"

"Then I will ask instantly," said Marischal; and, addressing Mr. Vere, "I am informed, sir," said he, "there is no path we have not examined, leading by Westburnfield."

"O," said Sir Frederick, laughing, "we know the owner of Westburnfield well—a wild lad, that knows little difference between his neighbour's zoole and his own; but, with the utmost honesty to his principles: He would disturb nothing belonging to Elleslaw."

"Besides," said Mr. Vere, smiling mysteriously, "he had other tow on his distaff last night. Have you seen Elliot of the birthplace, that has his house burnt, and his cattle driven away, because he refused to give up his arms to some honest men that think of starting for the king?"

The company, I believe, was, at hearing of this, immensely interested, and Miss Vere, with every one of her friends behind it, were convinced that this would be the most sensible way of making known the news to their friends, thinking they ought to ride in this direction at all, otherwise we should certainly be blamed for our negligence.

No reasonable objection could be offered to this proposal, and the party turned their horses' heads towards Westburnfield.

They had not proceeded very far in that direction when the trumpeting of horses was heard, and a host of riders were perceived advancing to meet them.

"There comes Earnsdill," said Marischal; "I know his bright bay with the star in his front."

"And he has brought with him," said Earnsdill, "As claimed Vere, ferociously. "Who shall call my superior's false or injurious now? Will gentlemen—trustons lend me the assistance of your swords for the security of my child?"

He unloaded his weapon, and was invited by Sir Frederick and several of the party, who proceeded to charge those that were advancing towards them. But the greater part hesitated.

"The city, as in all peace and security," said Marischal-Wells, "let us first hear what seems they give us of this mysterious affair. If Miss Vere has sustained the slightest insult or injury from her early resolution to revenge her, but let us hear what they say."

"You do me wrong by your suspicions, Marischal," continued Vere; "you are the last I would have expected to hear expressions like this."

"You injure yourself, Elleslaw, by your violence, though the cause may excuse it."

He then advanced a little before the rest, and called out, "Is Miss Vere well?" "Is Miss Vere safe?" said Marischal.

"Is it," answered Isabella, eagerly, "is its so: the Heaven's sake shent your swords. I will satisfy all that is sacred: that I was carried off by peasants whose persons and object were alike unknown to me, and am now returned to freedom by means of the gentleman's gallant interference."

"By whom, and wherefore, could this have been done?" pursued Marischal. "Had you no knowledge of his previous invasion? Earnsdill, where did you find this lady?"

But ere the other question could be answered, Elleslaw advanced, and, returning his sword to the scabbard, said, "I would know this, Sir. Earnsdill, this is Miss Vere's horse: thus far I thank you for saving my daughter in the power of her natural guardian."

A tall lady of the head was returned by Earnsdill with unalloyed satisfaction: and Elleslaw, turning back with his daughter upon the road to his own house, appeared engaged with her in a confidential earnest, that the rest of the company judged it improper to approach them too near. In the meantime, Earnsdill, as he took leave of the other gentlemen, belonging to Elleslaw's party, said aloud, "Although I am unconscious of any circumstance in my conduct that can authorize such a suspicion, I must observe, that I believe that I have had some hand in the attack, violence which has been offered to her daughter. I request you, gentlemen, to take notice of my exposure of a churlish or so dishonest and incontinent, I cannot pardon the bewildering feelings of affectation, with as much as sometimes, I think, I would be happy—very happy, and the charge, as becoming a man who comes between you means, it deeper than his life."
"And I'll be his second," said Simon of Hackburn, "and take upon twa o' ye, gentle or so me, laird o' loch; it's a' aine to Simon.

"What do ye call that decent fellow?" said Sir Frederick Langley, "and what has he to do with the quarrel of gentlemen?"

"T'will be a lad free the Hit Te'lot," said Simon, "and T'grew up body like me, except as the perplexity attending these sudden events has left his judgment to its free exercise, shall handsomely acknowledge the very important service you have this hour and a half from my sister Ellenlike, as soon as you may be encountered, even enemies, if fortune will have it so, without losing our respect for birth, fair-play, and each other. I believe you as innocent of this matter as I am myself; and I will pledge myself that my cousin Ellieslaw, as soon as the possession exists, will hasten to give the Whigs a full account of the adventure, and that the Whigs are very likely to draw a head under such a sprightly young head as I am.

"For shame, Sir Frederick!" exclaimed Maressel; "do you think that Ellieslaw could, in honour, consent to any violence being offered to Farnscliff, when he beheld his bounds only to bring back his daughter? or, if he were to be of your opinion, do you think that I, and the rest of these gentlemen, would disgrace ourselves by assisting in such a transaction?"

Sir Frederick looked grave and discontented. "Walk aside with me, my good friend," said Ellieslaw to the sombre harneft; "I have something for you to see in private car, with which I know you will be satisfied.

They walked into the house, leaving Ratcliffe and Maressel standing together in the court.

"And so," said Ratcliffe, "the gentlemen of your political persuasion think the downfall of this government so certain, that they disdain even to throw off public disguises, over the machinations of their party?"

"Faith, Mr. Ratcliffe," answered Maressel, "the actions and sentiments of your friends may require to be revised, but I am better pleased that ours can go barren.

"And is it possible," continued Ratcliffe, "that you, who, notwithstanding your thoughtlessness and want of temper, are leg-padders, Mr. Maressel, I am a plain man)—that you, who, notwithstanding these constitutional defects, possess natural good sense and acquired information, should be infatuated enough to entrench yourself in such desperate postures? How does your head feel when you are engaged in these dangerous conferences?"

"Not quite so secure on my shoulders," answered Maressel, "who speaks treason as if it were a child's nursery rhymes, and loses and recovers that sweet girl, his daughter, with a good deal less, but on both occasions, than would have affected me had I lost and recovered a greyhound puppy. My temper is not quite so infllexible, nor my hate against government as a whole so intense, as to blind me to the full danger of the attempt.

"Then why involve yourself in it?" said Ratcliffe.

"Why, I love this poor exiled king with all my heart; and my faith in King William is as firm as that of King James the Sixth, that he won't die, as mine, sooner than I die; and, as for hanging, as Sir John Falstaff, says, I can become a gallows as well as another. You know the end of the old ballad:

"She died young, way wantonly

She was never kind to me

Then came the hanging, and changed a round...

But the gallows tree.

"Mr. Maressel, I am sorry for you," said his grave adviser.

"I am obliged to you, Mr. Ratcliffe, but I would not have you judge of our enterprise by any way of vindicating it; there are wiser heads than mine at the work.

"Wiser heads than yours may lie as low," said Ratcliffe, in a low and grave tone.

"Perhaps so; but no lighter heart shall; and to prevent it being made heavier by your remonstrances, I will bid you adieu, Mr. Ratcliffe, till dinner-time, when you shall see that my apprehensions have not spoiled my appetite.

CHAPTER XIII.

To face the emptiness of rebellion.

Writing should be calculated to please the eye of the inner and outer, and our disposition, which ease and rub the elbow at the news of every petty innovation.

Henry the Fourth, Part II.

There had been great preparations made at Ellieslaw-Castle for the entertainment on this important day, when not a gentleman of note in the neighbourhood, attached to the Jacobite interest, were expected to rendezvous, but also many subordinate malcontents, whom difficulty of circumstances, love of change, resentment against England, or any of the numerous causes which inflamed men's passions at the time, rendered apt to join in pernicious enterprise. The men of rank and substance were, at this time in the country, as they often are for almost the whole year; some stood aloof, and most of the smaller gentility and yeomanry were of the Presbyterian persuasion, and the fore, however displeased with the Union would to engage in a Jacobite conspiracy. But there were some gentlemen of property, who, either from early principle, from religious motives, or sharing the ambitious views of Ellis-law, had given countenance to his scheme; and there were also, some very young and handsome ones of the younger set, who signalized themselves by engaging in a dangerous enterprise, by which they hoped to vendicate the independence of their country. The other members of the party were persons of inferior rank, and desperate fortunes, who, were now ready to rise in that part of the country, as they did afterwards in the year 1715, under Fetter-ot and Dorowatow, when a tour, commanded by a Border gentleman, and consisting entirely of freebooters, among whom the notorious Lack-in-a-bag, as he was called, held a distinguished command. We think it necessary to make some allusion to the province in which our scene lies; because, unquestionably, the Jacobite party, in the other parts of the kingdom, consisted of much more formidable, as well as much more respectable, materials.

One long table extended itself down the ample hall of Ellislaw Castle, which was still left much in the state in which it had been one hundred years before, and which, however, was the whole side of the castle, vaulted with ribbed arches of freestone, the grails of which sprang from projecting figures, that, carved into all the wild forms which the fancy of one of the sculptors of that time could suggest, were, either crowned, crowned, or without any stirring thought, or discoloured light. A banner, which tradition averred to have been taken from the English at the battle of Sark, waved over the chair in which Ellis-law presided the day, one of the chief guests, by reminding them of ancient victories over their neighbours. He himself, a lofty figure, dressed on this occasion with uncommon care, and with features, which, for delicacy of grace, and calmness, and bearded handsomely, looked the old feudal baron extremely well. Sir Frederick Langley was placed on his right hand, and Mr. Marschalch of Marschalch-Wells on his left. Some gentlemen of consideration, with their sons, brothers, and nephews, were seated at the upper end of the table, and among these Mr. Racliffe had his place. Beneath the salt-cellar (a massive piece of plate which occupied the midst of the table,) to the right of the chair, was adjoined by a large sideboard, which the board, while the distinction observed in ranking them was a salvo to the pride of their superiors, was a great distinction. The toast, which the company must be admitted, since Willie of Westburnflat was one of the party. The unobtrusive audacity of this fellow, in daring to present himself in the house of a gentle man, to whom he had just offered so flagrant an insult, can only be accounted for by supposing him conscious that his share in carrying off Miss Ver was a secret, safe in her possession and that of her father.

Before this numerous and miscellaneous party was placed a dinner, consisting, not indeed of the delicacies of the season, as the newspapers express it, but the common dish, and the ordinary fare to the different stones, which the very board groaned. But the mirth was not in proportion to the good cheer. The lower end of the table were, for some time, chilled by constraint and reserve, and finding themselves merely honoured as august an assembly; and those who were placed around it had those feelings of awe with which P. P., clerk of the parish, describes himself oppressed, when he says, "that the thoughts of the sons of high worship, the wise Mr. Justice Freeman, the good Lady Jones, and the great Sir Thomas Truly, this ceremonious feast, however, soon gave way to the feeling of degrees, which were literally supplied, and as liberally consumed by the guests of the lower description. They became talking loudly, and even clamorous in their mirth. But it was not in the power of words or brands to elevate the spirits of those who held the higher places at the banquet. They experienced the chilling revision of spirits which often takes place, when men are called upon to take a desperate resolution, after having placed themselves in circumstances where it is alike difficult to advance or to recede. The presence of the crew, with his fence学到 and his dinners eaten, caused all the rest to go over the brink, and each waited with an inward emotion of awe, expecting which of his companions would set the example by plunging himself down. This inward sensation of fear and reluctance set differently, according to the various habits and characters of the company. One looked grave; another looked silly; a third paused with apprehension on the verge of the brink; a fourth only emptied himself, and filled the higher end of the basin, as the others desired for members of the conspiracy whose prudence had prevailed over their political zeal, and who had abstained from themselves from their consultations at the critical period; and some seemed to proceed in their minds the comparative rank and prospects those who were present and absent. Sir Frederick Langley was reserved, moody, and discontented. Ellis-law himself made such a speech, as plainly marked the spirit of his own. Ratcliffe watched the scene with the composition of a vigilant but uninterested spectator so calm and cool; and only, as his character, eat and drink, laughed and declined, seemed even to find amusement in the embarrassment of the company.

"What do you see, my good sir?" he exclaimed. "We seem to be met at a council, where the chief mourners must not speak, their breath, while the mutes and the cavalry look in to the law's discharge, the Knight of Langley-dale!"

"You speak wrong, sir," said Ellis-law; "do you not see how many are present?"

"And what of that," said Marschalch? "Did not the chief mourners not speak, this half of the world are to be sat in? By my part, I am not encouraged by seeing at least two thirds of our number true to the rendezvous, though I suspect one half of these cannot secure the dinner in case of the worst."

"There is no news from the east, which cannot amount to certainty of the king's death," said another gentlemen of the company, in that tone of subdued and transient whisper which implies a failure of resolution.

"Not a line from the Earl of D---, nor a single gentleman from the southern side of the Border, added a third.

"Who is it that wishes for more men from England," exclaimed Marschalch, in a theatrical tone of affectation. To this Mr. Ellisslaw, "My cousin Elisslaw! No, my dear cousin, if we are doomed to die!"

"For God's sake, my dear cousin," said Elisslaw, "don't think you can fool at present, sir."

"Well, then," said his kinsman, "I'll bestow my devotion upon you instead, such as it is. If we have gone forward like fools, do not let us go back like men. We have done enough to draw the spirits of the company; do not let us give up before we have done something to deserve it. What, will no one speak? Then I'll give you a toast. Take a beer-glass to the brim with claret, and waving it in hand, commanded all to follow his example and rise up from their seats. All obeyed—the more the merrier. The guests, as if pleased, the others with content;—"Then, my friends, I give you the pledge of the day.—The independence of Scotland, and the health of our lawful sovereign, King James; to this, most solemnly, and in manner of a solemn vow, the others, including the king, believe, in full possession of his ancient capital!"

He quaffed off the wine, and threw the glass on his head.

"It should never," he said, "be profaned by meaner toast."

All followed his example, and, amid the crash of glasses and the shouts of the company, set themselves to the business of the meal, and the solemnity of the service for concluding a funeral.
selves to stand or fall with the principles and political interest which their toast expressed.

"You have leaped the ditch with a witness," said Ellieslaw, "apart from Mareschal; but I believe it is all for the best; at all events, we cannot now retreat from it. Mr. Ratchife (whom his fellow at Ratcliffe) has refused the pledge; but of that by

Then, rising up, he addressed the company in a style of inflammatory invective against the government and its measures, but especially the Union; a

"We shall shortly neither dare shoot a deer nor kiss a wench, without a certificate from the presbytery and kirk-treasurer," said Mareschal-Wells.

"Or make a brandy jerebot in a frosty morning without license from a commissioner of excise," said the dinner table.

"Or ride over the fell in a moonless night," said Westburnflat, "without asking leave of young Earn-

"We are agreed to a man," answered his guests.

"Not literally so," said Mr. Ratchife; "for though I cannot hope to assuage the violent symptoms which in Dunkirk, I think it right to send you this early and private information, that the vessels you expected have been driven out of the coast, which you have been unable to break bulk, or to land any part of their cargo; and that the west-country partners have resolved to withdraw their name from the firm, as it must prove a losing concern. Sir Frederick's jaw dropped, and his countenance blackened, as the letter was read, and Ellieslaw exclaimed. "Why, this affects the very main-spring of our interests. If the French deal with the king on board, has been chased off by the English, as this d--- scrawl seems to intimate, where are we?"

"Just where we were this morning," I think," said Marechal, still laughing.

"Pardon me, and a grace to your ill-timed mirth, Mr. Marechal; this morning we were not committed publicly, as we now stand committed by your own act, which can start in a letter or your pocket, apprising you that our undertaking was desperate."

"Ay, ay, I expected you would say so. But in the first place, my friend Nilil Nameless and his letter must be put to the test, and innominate, and you could have known that I am tired of a party that does nothing but form bold resolutions over night, and sleep them away with their wine before mornaz. The government is a mind of speeches and resolutions, which are at best so visibles, this first favour will be as cold as Christmas. So, as I determined to go the vole, I have taken care you shall be asleep by it: it signifies nothing plain sense. You are fairly in the bag, and must struggle through."

"You are mistaken with respect to one of us, Mr. Marechal," said Sir Frederick Langley; and, applying himself to the bell, he desired the person who entered to order his servants and horses instantly.

"You must not leave us, Sir Frederick," said Ellieslaw; "we have our musters to go over."

"I will go to-night, Mr. Vere," said Sir Frederick, and write you my intentions in this matter when I am at home."

"Ay," said Marechal, "and send them by a troop of horsemen to seek all the corners. Look well, sir, I shall not be deserted nor betrayed; and if you leave Ellieslaw Castle to-night, it shall be by passing over my dead body." Said Vere, "You, Vere, how can you so hastily misstep your friend's intentions? I am sure Sir Frederick can only be jesting with us; for, were he not too honourable to dream of deserting the cause, he cannot but remember the full proofs we have of his accession to it, and his eager activity in advancing it. He cannot but be conscious, besides, that the first information will be readily received by government, and that the question in this part of the country, as it advances, we can easily save a few hours on him."

"You should see you, and not we, when you talk of priorities in such a race of treachery; for my part, I shall be no horseman for such a man, said Marechal; and added-between his teeth, "A pretty pair of fellows to trust a man's neck with!"

"I am not to be intimidated from doing what I think necessary," said Sir Frederick Langley; "and my first step shall be to leave Ellieslaw. I have no reason to keep faith with one (looking at Vere) who has kept none with me."

"And Ellieslaw, silencing with a motion of his hand, his impetuous kingman—"how have I disappointed you, Sir Frederick?"

"In the nearest and most tender point—you have trifled me, said Sir Frederick Langley. "You know which you well know was the gage of our political undertakings. This carrying off and this bringing back of Miss Vere,—the cold reception I have met with from her, and the excuses with which you cover it, I believe to be more evasions, that you may personally self-retaliate the errors which are hers by right, and make me, in the meanwhile, a tool in your desperate enterprise, by holding out hopes and expectations which you are resolved never to realize."

"Sir Frederick, west of my life, when shall I arrive?"

"I will listen to no protestations; I have been cheated with them too long," answered Sir Frederick.

"If you leave us," said Ellieslaw, "you cannot know both your ruin and ours is certain; all depends on our adhering together."

"Leave me to take care of myself," returned the knight; "but were what you say true, I would rather perish than be fooled any further."

"Can nothing—cannot someone of you of my sincerity?" said Ellieslaw, anxiously; "this morning I should have repelled your unjust suspicions as an insult, but situated as we now are!

"You feel yourself compelled to be sincere?" retorted Sir Frederick. "If you would have me think so, there is but one way to convince me of it—let your daughter bestow her hand on me this evening."

"So, so, my poor Vere, smiled Sir Frederick, "I think of her late alarm—of our present undertaking."

"I will listen to nothing but to her consent, plighted at the altar. You have a chapel in the castle.

"Doctor Langley is there, and in the possession of your good faith to-night, and we are a small band in hand and hand. If you refuse me when it is so much for your advantage to consent, how shall I trust you? And I will trust Vere, such is the faith in my undertaking, and unable to retract!"

"And I am to understand, that, if you can bless my in-law to-night, our friendship is renewed," said Ellieslaw, "most infully, and most inviolably," replied Sir Frederick.

"Then," said Vere, "though what you ask is im maturable, and unjust towards my dear Vere, yet, Sir Frederick, give me your hand—my daughter shall be your wife?"

"This night?"

"This very night," replied Ellieslaw, "before the clock strikes twelve."

"With her own consent, I trust," said Marechal; "for I promise you both, gentlemen, I will not yield tamely by, and see any violence put on the will of my pretty waitress."

"Another post in this hot-headed fellow, muttered Ellieslaw; and then closed, "With this consent. For with whom, Vere, is it, Vere, that you shall suppose your interference necessary to protect a daughter against her father? Depend upon it, he has no repugnance to Sir Frederick Langley."

"Or, if you wish to call Lady Langley, it is enough—they are many women might be of the like mind; and I beg your pardon, but these side demands and concessions alarmed me a little on this account."

"It is only the suddenness of the proposal that embarrasses me," said Ellieslaw; "but perhaps she is found intractable, Sir Frederick will con side."

"I will consider nothing, Mr. Vere—your daughter's hand to-night, or I depart, were it at midnight—there is my ultimatum."

"I embrace it," said Ellieslaw; "and I will beseech you to hasten our military preparations, while I prepare my daughter for so sudden a change."

So saying, he left the company.

"That, Isabella," said Vere, solemnly, "you shall

"And why not speak it now?" said Isabella; "do you

"Then, my child," said Vere, "since you press me to name what I would a thousand times rather have the ransom nothing but your head in my hand and the confession before midnight this very evening."

"This evening, sir?" said the young lady, struck with horror at the proposal—and to such a man—A man—a monster, who could wish to extort the daughter by threatening the life of the father— it is impossible!"
"You say right, my child," answered her father,
"it is indeed impossible, but you have either the right or the wish to exact such a sacrifice. It is the course of nature that the old should die and be forgot, and the young should live and be happy."
"Sir, of course I have not, I do not—no, no—my dreadful tale is only told, to influence my conduct and subdue my scruples.

"My daughter," replied Ellieslaw, in a tone where offended authority seemed to struggle with parental allowance. I suspect he meant to impress me with a tale to work upon her feelings! Even this I must bear, and even from this unworthy suspicion I must descend to vindicate myself. You know the stain I bear. To tell you the truth, Mr. W—sh marked what I shall write to him, and judge from his answer, if the danger in which we stand is not real, and whether I have not used every means to avert it.

He sat down, to a few lines hastily, and handed them to Isabella, who, after repeated and painful efforts, cleared her eyes and head sufficiently to discern their purport.

"Dear cousm," said the billet, "I find my daughter, as I expected, in despair at the untimely and premature urgency of Sir Frederick Langley. She cannot even comprehend the peril in which we stand, or how much is at stake in his power—use your influence with him, for Heaven's sake, to modify proposals, to the acceptance of which I cannot, and will not, urge my child against all her own feelings, as well as those of duty and propriety, and oblige your loving cousin. R. V."

In the agitation of the moment, when her swimming eyes and dizzy brain could hardly comprehend the peril of her wrongs, you might have supposed that Miss Vere should have omitted to remark that this letter seemed to rest her scruples rather upon the form and time of the proposed union, than to be the expression of a disposition to serve Mr. Vere. The bell rang, and gave the letter to a servant to be delivered to Mr. Mareschal, and, rising from his chair, continued to traverse the apartment in a state of great exasperation, the animadversion was returned. He balanced it over, and wrung the hand of his daughter as he gave it to her. The tenor was as follows:

"My dear cousm, I have already urged the knight on the subject of the union, and I find him as fixed as Cheviot. I am truly sorry my fair cousin should be prevailed upon to give up any of her maidenly rights. Sir Frederick consents, however, to leave the castle with me, the instant the ceremony is performed, and we will raise our followers and begin the fray. Thus there is great hope the bridegroom may be knocked on the head before he and the bride can meet again, but Bell has a fair chance to be Lady Langley a 'vrai bon marron.' For the rest, I can only say, that if she can make up her mind to the alliance at all—it is no time for mere maiden ceremony—my pretty cousm must not marry to marry, but to marry a man who listens to him to-day and gave herself to another at night! But let him despise me—better so than that he should know the truth. Let him despise me; if it will but lessen his grief, I will only be comforted in the loss of his esteem. She wept bitterly: attempting in vain, from time to time, to commence the prayer for which she had sunk on her knees, but unable to calm her spirits sufficiently for the exercise of devotion. As she remained in this agony of mind, the door of her apartment was slowly opened.

CHAPTER XV.

The darkness creeps they enter, where they find.

The woful man, low sitting on the ground.

Miss Vere, in her unsmiling fancy.

Fairy Quest.

The intruder on Miss Vere's sorrows was Ratcliffe. Ellieslaw had, in the agitation of his mind, forgotten to countermand the order he had given to call him thither, so that he opened the door with the words "Come, and we, for me. I wish you could look around—Miss Vere, alone! on the ground! and in tears!"

"Leave me—leave me, Mr. Ratcliffe," said the unhappy young lady. "I must not leave you," said Ratcliffe; "I have been repeatedly requesting admittance to take my leave of you, and have been refused, until your father himself has asked me. Blame me not, if, from unthinking and imperious, I have a duty to discharge which makes me so."

"I cannot listen to you—I cannot speak to you, Mr. Ratcliffe; take my best wishes, and for God's sake leave me.

"Tell me only," said Ratcliffe, "is it true that this monstrous match is to go forward, and this very night? I heard the servants proclaim it as I was on the great staircase—I heard the directions given to clear the out-of-doors."

"Spare me, Mr. Ratcliffe," replied the luckless bride; "the bareness of this fact when you see me, you may judge of the cruelty of these questions."

"Married? to Sir Frederick Langley? and this night? It must not—cannot—shall not be."

"It must, Mr. Ratcliffe," said Vere, in the tone of one who is either ruined, or in the last extremity of despair."

"Ahh! I understand," answered Ratcliffe; and you have sacrificed yourself to save him who—"

I should have you recollect, Miss Vere," replied Ratciff's, my character and habits of thinking were so well known to you, that you might have held me implicated in creating in such absurdity.
But in what other mode," said Isabella, "can a being, so miserable himself in appearance, possess the power of assisting me?"
"Miss Vere," said Ratcliffe, after a momentary ation, "I am bound by a solemn oath of secrecy.
You must, without further explanation, be satisfied with my pledge of assurance, that he does possess the power, if you can inspire him with the will; and that, I doubt not, you will be able to do.
"Mr. Ratcliffe," said Miss Vere, "I may yourself be mistaken; you ask an unlimited degree of confidence from me.
Recollect, Miss Vere," he replied, "that when,
in your humanity, you ask and suffer influence to your father in favour of Haswell and his ruined family—when you requested me to prevail on him to do thing most abhorrent to his nature—to forgive an injury and remember the person to whom he should ask me no questions concerning the sources of my influence—You found no reason to distrust me then, do not distrust me now.
But the extinction of mode of life of this man," said Miss Vere; "his seclusion—his figure—the depths of misanthropy which he is said to express in his language—Mr. Ratcliffe, what can I think of him if he really possesses the powers you attribute to him?"
This man, young lady, was bred a Catholic, a sect which affords a thousand instances of those who have retired from the world, and whose vices privations more strict even than this.
But he avows no religious motive, replied Miss Vere.
"No," replied Ratcliffe; "disguise with the world has operated his retreat from it without assuming the veil of superstition. Thus far I may tell you—he was born to great wealth, which his parents designed should become greater by his union with a kinwoman, whom for that purpose they bred up in their own house. You have seen his figure; judge what the young lady must have thought of the lot to which she was assigned.—Yet, having devoted her ppearance, she showed no reluctance, and the friends of of the person whom I speak of, doubted not that the excess of his attachment, the various acquisitions of his name, could not have overcome the terror which his destined bride must have entertained an exterior so dreadfully insidious.
And did they judge truly?" said Isabella.
You shall hear. He, at least, was fully aware of his own deficiency; the sense of it haunted him like a phantom. I am, was his own expression to me, I am to a man whom he trusted,—I am, in spite of what you would say, a poor miserable outcast, fitter to have been amothered in the cradle than to have been partiality. But look at every book which we have read, no responsive voice in the natural man. Is not

“You repeat the sentiments of a madman,” said Miss Vere.

“I do, replied her conductor, “unless a morbid and excessive sensitiveness on such a subject can be termed insanity. Yet I will not deny that this governing... as to suggest to the human race, from which he conceives to the self-naturally deformed. The benevolence which he bestowed, from a disposition naturally philanthropic in an uncommon degree, were exaggerated by the influence of the goading reflection, that more was necessary from him than from others... lavish his treasures as if to bribe mankind to receive him into their clasp. It is scarcely necessary to say, that the bounty which flowed from a source so capricious, was often abused, and his beneficence frequently betrayed. These disappointments, which occur to all, more or less, and most to such as concenter without just discrimination, his aversion, faith in the hard and fanciful. He abandoned to all the wild fury of the tempest. He was placed under medical restraint. At a temporary measure... he whose marriage, was now his nearest ally, prolonged his confinement, in order to enjoy the management of his immense estates. There was one who owed all to the sufferer, an humble friend, but grateful and faithful. By unceasing exertion, and repeated invocation of the august Godhead... at length succeeded to his patron’s freedom, and reinstatement in the management of his own property, to which was seen added that of his intended bride, who, having died without issue, had been the heir of entail. But freedom, and wealth, were unable to restore the equipoise of his mind; to the former his grief made him indifferent—the latter only served to excite him the more. He abandoned him to the strange and wayward fancy. He had renounced the Catholic religion, but perhaps some of its doctrines continued to influence his mind, over which remorse and repentance, in appearance, was an unbounded authority. His life has since been that alternately of a pilgrim and a hermit, suffering the most severe privations, not indeed in ascetic devotion, but in the most dejection, that his words and actions have been at such a wide difference, nor has any hypocriss wretch ever been more ingenious in assigning good motives for his violent acts, than this unfortunate in reconciling to himself the abstract principles of misanthropy, a conduct which flows from his natural generosity and kindness of feeling.”

“Still, Mr. Ratcliffe—still you describe the inconsistencies of a madman.”

“By no means,” replied Ratcliffe. “That the imagination of this gentleman is disordered, I will not at all pretend; but he has sometimes broken out into paroxysms approaching to real mental alienation. But it is of his common state of mind that I speak; it is irregular, but not deranged; you cannot make so callous a division that divide the light of noon-day from midnight. The courtier who ruins his fortune for the attainment of a title which can do him no good, or power of which he can make no suitable return to society; the man who hoards his useless wealth, and the prodigal who squanders it, are all marked with a certain shade of insanity. To criminals who are guilty of enormities, when the temptation, to a sober mind, bears no proportion to the horror of the act, or the probability of detection and punishment, the same observation applies; and every violent passion, as well as anger, may be at times roused to madness.”

“This may be all good philosophy, Mr. Ratcliffe,” answered Miss Vere; “but, excuse me, it by no means emboldens me to visit, at this late hour, a person whose extravagance of imagination you yourself can only palliate.”

“ Rather, then,” said Ratcliffe, “ receive my solemn assurances, that you do not incur the slightest danger. But I could not execute my function for fear of alarming you, if, that now when we are within sight of his retreat, for I can discover it through the twilight, I must go no further with you; you must rely on this gentleman who received the bequest.”

“Indeed I dare not.”

“ You must,” continued Ratcliffe. “I will remain here and wait for you.”

aptic. The whole space of the cottage did not ceed ten feet by six within the walls; and its only furniture, besides what we have mentioned, was a table and two stools formed of rough deal.

Within these narrow precincts Isabella now herself enclosed with a being, whose history had nothing to reassure her, and the fearful conformen of whose hideous countenance inspired the uous terror. He occupied the seat opposite to her, and dropping his huge and shaggy eyebrows his piercing black eyes, gazed at her in silence, as if agitated by a variety of contending feelings.

On the other side sat Isabella, pale as death, her long hair uncurlcd by the evening damp, and falling over shoulders and breast, as the wet streamers droop from the mast when the storm has passed away, and left the vessel stranded on the beach. The Dwarf first broke the silence with the sudden, abrupt, and alarming question,—" Woman, what evil fate has brught thee hither?"

"My father's danger, and your own command," she replied faintly, but firmly,

"And you hope for aid from me?"

"If you can bestow it," she replied, still in the same tone of mild submission.

"And how should I possess that power?" continued the Dwarf, with a bitter sneer; "is mine the form of a redresser of wrongs? Is it this the power which one powerful enough to be sued to by a fair plaintiff is likely to hold his residence? I but mocked thee, girl, when I said I would relieve thee.

"Then must I depart, and face my fate as I best may?"

"No!" said the Dwarf, rising and interposing be-her and the door, and motioning to her sternly to sume her seat?—" No! you leave me not in this way; we must have further conference. Why should one being desire aid of another? Why should not each be sufficient to itself? Look round you,—the most despond and most decept on Nature's common, have required sympathy and help from no one.

These stones are of my own piling; these utensils framed with my own hands; and with this—" and he laid his hand with a fiendish smile on the sword which he always wore beneath his garment, and unheathed it so far as that the blade glittered clear in the fire-light. "With this," he pursued, as he thrust the weapon back into the scabbard, "if necessary, defend the vital spark enclosed in this poor trunk, against the fairest and strongest that shall threaten me with injury."

It was with difficulty Isabella refrained from screaming out aloud; but she did refrain.

"This," continued the Recluse, "is the life of na-ure solitary, self-sufficient, and independent. The wolf calls not the wolf to aid him in forming his den;

and the vulture invites not another to assist her in striking down her prey.

And when they are unable to procure themselves support, said Isabella, "I judge this is the man of the would be most accessible to argument couched in own metaphorical style, "what then is to befall them?"

"Let them starve, die, and be forgotten; it is the common lot of humanity."

"It is the lot of the wild tribes of nature," said

Isabella, "but chiefly of those who are destined to be support by their venal or their more forner; but it is not the law of nature in general; even the lower orders have confederacies for mutual de-ence. But mankind—the race would perish did they come to aid each other. To pass the time that the mother binds the child's head, till the moment that some kind assistant wipes the death-damp from the brow of the dying, we cannot exist without mutual aid.

All, therefore, that need aid, have right.
their fellow-mortals; no one who has the power of granting can refuse it without guilt.”

And in this simple hope, piteously, said the Solitary; “thou hast come into the desert, to seek one whose wish it was that the league thou hast spoken of were broken for ever, and that, in very truth, the whole race should perish? Wert thou not frightened of the desert?” said Isabella, firmly, “is superior to fear.”

“Hast thou not heard it said in thy mortal world, that I have languished myself with other powers, deformed to the rude and malvolent, to the human race as myself? Hast thou not heard this—And dost thou ask me at midnight?”

The Being I worship supports me against such ideol fears,” said Isabella, but the increasing agitation of her bosom reduced the affected courage which her words expressed.

Ho! no!” said the Dwarf, “thou vainest thyself a philosopher? Yet, shouldst thou not have thought of the danger of intrusting thyself, young and beautiful, in the power of one so apostate against humanity, as to place his chief pleasure in defacing, destroying,
and unreasonable torturing others?

Isabella, much alarmed, continued to answer with firmness, “Whatever injuries you may have sustained in the world, you are incapable of revenging them on one who wronged you, nor, probably, on any other.”

“Ay, but maiden,” he continued, his dark eyes flinging with an expression of malignity which communicated itself to his wild and distorted features, “revenge, revenge, which asks only to see the blood flush and lap blood. Think you the lamb’s plea of innocence would be listened to by him?”

Man said Isabella, rising, and expressing herself with more dignity, “I fear not the vengeance with which you would impress me. I cast them from me with disdain. Be you mortal or fiend, you would not offer injury to one who sought you as a suppliant in this my need. You would not.”

“Thou sayst true, maiden,” rejoined the Solitary;
“I dare not—I would not. Beseech thou dwelling.
Fear nothing with which they threaten thee. Thou hast asked my protection—thou shalt find it effectual.

“But, father, this very night I have consented to weep the man that I abhor, or I must put the seal to my father’s ruin.”

“Tell thee not—what hour?”

“Ere midnight.”

“And twilight,” said the Dwarf, “has already passed away. But fear nothing, there is ample time to protect thee.”

“And my father?” continued Isabella in a suppliant tone.

“Thy father,” replied the Dwarf, “has been, and is my most bitter enemy. But fear not; thy virtue shall suffice to keep thee safe longer by me, I might again fall into the stupid dreams concerning human worth from which I have been so fearfully awakened. But fear nothing—at the very foot of the altar I will redeem thee. Adieu, time presses, and I must act!”

He led her to the door of the hut, which he opened for her departure. She remounted her horse, which had been fastened in the outer enclosure, and pressed him forward by the light of the moon, which was now rising, to the spot where she had left Ratcliffe.

“Have you succeeded?” was his first eager question.

“With the help of the holy cross, of the stones from whom you sent me; but how can he possibly accomplish them?”

“Thank God! said Ratcliffe; ‘doubt not his power to fulfill his promise.”

At this moment a shrill whistle was heard to re-ound along the heath.

“Hark!” said Ratcliffe; “he calls me—Miss Vere, come home, and leave unboiled the postern-door of the house, lest any one, I mean the memory of me and my late Mrs. Vere of Ellislaw, who was my dying posture, while a weeping chime

TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

CHAPTER XVII.

This looks not like a nuptial. Much Ado.

The chapel in the castle of Ellislaw, is bequeathed by the testator in his will, to the clergy of much older date than the castle itself, claimed considerable antiquity. Before the advent of England and Scotland had been some part of the property of a nobleman, during whose family the possessions had long passed away under introduced by war and mutual ravage. A day had arisen on the ruin of their cell, which was included in its precincts.

The edifice, in its round arches and mas-cred simplicity of which referred their date called the Saxon architecture, and times Seged and sombre appearance, on frequently used as the residence of faud lords, as well as formerly of them. But it looked doubly gloomy by those and smoky torches which were laid on the present occasion, where ing a glare of yellow light in their immesure surrounded by a red and pur-aneous from their own smoke, and by by a zone of darkness which no other the chapel, while it rendered it impossi-assign its limits. Some inguadopted in haste for the occasion, rather dreamless of the scene. Old fragments from the walls of other apartment hauntingly and partially disposed around chapel, and mingled inconsistently with and funeral emblems of the dead, which where exhibited. On each side of the was a monument, the appearance of an equally strange contrast. On the figure, in stone, of whom I have spoken, and had died in the odour of sanctity; he was as becumbent, in his cowl and face turned upward as in the act of devot hands folded, from which his string of pendent. On the other side was a toml food, composed of the most beauti marble, and accounted a model of modest, was erected to the memory of her late Mrs. Vere of Ellislaw, who was in a dying posture, while a weeping chime sounded, seemed in the act of exiguity lamp as an emblematic of her remarkable for attention to his lady while alive, and erect after her death such a costly mausoleum as reflected sorrow; others cleared him from the imputation of hypocrisy, and averred that the monument was constructed under the direction and at the expense of Mr. Ratcliffe.

Above these monuments the wedding guests were seated. They were few in number; for many left the castle to prepare for the ensuing political action, and Ellisieslaw was, in the circumstances, far from being desirous to extend invitation further than to those near relations whose presence he felt would enliven his feast. Next to the altar stood Sir Frederick Langley, moody, and thoughtful, even beyond his wont, near him, Mareschal, who was to play the part of the groom, and it was called. The thoughtless butt of this young gentleman, on which he never used to place the least restraint, added to the effect which overhung the brow of the bridegroom.

"Do you suppose I would drag my daughter to such a place in two days, though I know none better worth a violent compliment."

Frederick attempted to turn a deaf ear to this dictum and looked set out of the chamber, whispered to Sir Frederick; "I trust that we have not recourse to the violent expedients of Romans which I read of at College. It would be like dragging a mule to an inn and being charged for it, after two days, though I know none better worth a violent compliment."

Sir Frederick returned Sir Frederick, in a whisper, the tone of which indicated that his feelings were suppressed with difficulty.

"No marriage," replied Mareschal, "there's a mistake.

Sir Frederick Langley took his hand, and as he held it, said in a lower whisper, "Mareschal, shall answer this," and then flung his hand on the floor.

"That I will readily do," said Mareschal, "for word escaped my lips that my hand was not to guarantee. So, speak up, my pretty cousin, and tell me if I am wrong, but I am in the right of accepting of this gallant knight for your lord husband; for if you have the tenth part of a mark upon the subject, fail back, fail edge, he shall answer you, madam, are you mad, Mr. Mareschal? said Ellisieslaw, having been this young man's guardian during minority, often employed a tone of authority to put the altar, were it not her own choice?"

"Ellieslaw," retorted the young gentleman, "tell me of the contrary; her eyes are full of his name and title, we will use the freedom of detaining you, till your appearance here, at this moment, is better accounted for; we will have no more of this."

But the domestics shrunk back in doubt and alarm. Sir Frederick himself stepped forward towards the Recluse, as if to lay hands on his person, when his progress was suddenly stopped by the glittering point of a pistool, which the study hand of Hobbie Elliot presented against his bosom.

"I'll gar daylight, shine through ye, if ye offer to steal him," said Hobbie. "Bonny or ill, or I'll strike ye through! Naobody shall lay a finger on Ellisie; he's a canny neighbourly man, eye ready to make a friend; and, though ye may think him a jamter, yet, grappin' for gryppin', I was the man. Whether he'll be blowin' foans under your nails. He's a tough earl, Ellisie! he grapples like a smith's vice."

"What has brought you here, Elliot?" said Mareschal; "who called on you for interference?"

"Troth, Mareschal-Wellis," answered Hobbie. "" am just come here, wi’ twenty or thirty mair’ o’ us, in my ain name and the King’s— or Queen’s, ca’ they her’? and Canny Elsie’s into the bargain, to keep them and my back some ill usage Eliseslaw has gien me. A bonny breakfast the loons gae me the other morning, and him at the bottom o’; and trow ye I wassa ready to supper him up?—Ye needna lay your carpet down, for the house is wair; but this is yours’ wi’ little din; for the doors were open, and there had been owen muckle punch among your folk; we took their swords and pistols as easy as ye wad shed a tear.”

Mareschal rushed out, and immediately re-entered the chapel.

“By Heaven! it is true, Sir Frederick; the house is defended and the men who have been here are all disarmed.—Draw and let us fight our way.”

“Binna rash—binna rash,” exclaimed Hobbies; “hear me a bit, hear me a bit. We mean ye nae harm; but we’re back in arms for King James, as ye ca’ him, and the pretenders, we thought it right to keep up the auld neighbour war, and stand up for the other ane and the Kirk; but we’ll no hurt a hair o’ your heads, if ye like to gang hame quietly. And it will be your best way for there’s sure none Loudoun, that him they ca’ Bang, or Byng, or what it is, has bang’d the French ships and the new kirk o’ the west however; so ye had best be content wi’ auld Nairn for a bit of a betterQueen.”

Ratcliffe, who at this moment entered, confirmed these accounts so unfavourable to the Jacobite interest. Sir Frederick almost instantly, and without taking care of any one, left the church with such of his attendants as were able to follow him.

“And what will you do, Mr. Mareschal?” said Ratcliffe.

“Why, faith,” answered he, smiling, “I hardly know; say spirit is too great, and my fortune too small, for me to follow the example of the doughty bridegroom. It is not in my nature, and it is hardly worth my while.”

“Well, then, disperse your men, and remain quiet, and this will be overlooked, as there has been no overt act.”

“Hoot say,” said Elliot, “just let bygones be bygones, and a’ friends again; deal ane I beil marit at west Burnstaff, and I has gien him bith a hert skin and a cauld ane. I hadna changed three blows of his him wi’ him before he lap the window into the castle-moat, and swattered through it like a wild-duck. He’s a clever fellow, indeed! I’main kilt away wi’ bony lass in the morning, and another at night. Whare him was he disam kilt oot o’ the country, I see kilt him wi’ a tow, for the Castletoun meeting’s clean blass ower; his friends will no countenance him.”

All this confusion, Isabella had thrown herself at the feet of her kinman, Sir Edward Mau- ley, for so we must now call the Solicitor, to express at once her gratitude, and to beseech forgiveness for her father. The eyes of all began to be fixed on her, as soon as their own agitation and the bustle of the attendants had somewhat abated. Miss Vere knelt beside the tomb of her mother, to whose statue her features exhibited a marked resemblance. She held the hand of the Dwarf, which she kissed repeatedly and bathed with tears. He stood fixed and motionless, excepting that his eyes glanced alternately on the marble figure and the living suppliant. At length the large droops, which gathered on his eye-lashes compelled him to draw his hand across them.

“I thought,” he said, “that tears and I had done; but we shed them at our birth, and their spring dries not until we lay him here.”

“Dear Isabella,” he said, “if you do not think it necessary that the heart should dissolve my resolution. I part here, at once, and for ever, with all of which the memory, the looking to the future,” or the presence, “the presence of your Majesty, is not to me! attempt not to thwart my determination! it will avail nothing; you will hear of and see this lump of deformity no more. To you I shall be dead ere I put my grave, and you will think of me as of a friend discommend to the toils and crimes of existence.”

He kissed Isabella on the forehead, imp another kiss on the brow of the statue by who knelt, and left the chapel followed by Ratcliffe, bells, and the rest of his followers. Eliseslaw had gie him. A bonny breakfast the loons gae me the other morning, and him at the bottom o’; and trow ye I wasna ready to supper him up?—Ye needna lay your carpet down, for the house is wair; but this is ours’ wi’ little din; for the doors were open, and there had been owen muckle punch among your folk; we took their swords and pistols as easy as ye wad shed a tear.”

CHAPTER XVIII.

Last scene of all.

To close this strange eventful history.

Or the next morning, Mr. Ratcliffe presents Vere with a letter from her father, of which the tenor:—

"MY DEAREST CHILD,

"The malice of a persecuting governor compels me, for my own safety, to retreat abroad to remain for some time in foreign parts. I ask you to accompany, or follow me; you will to my interest and your own more effectually remain where you are. It is unnecessary to into a minute detail concerning the causes strange which will appear yesterday which yesterday, I have reason to complain of the usage I have had from Sir Edward Mauley, who is your nearest man by the mother’s side; but as he has declined his assistance, and to put you in immediate possession of a large part of his fortune, I account it a full and ample justice, although, if some part of his conduct be examined, it will appear that he, on his own sake, to have been left under the influ a mild and salutary restraint.

"In one particular, however, he showed a of the ties of blood, as well as of his own frail which, while he rejected himself closely from the under various names and disguises, and was spreading a report of his own death, (in wi’ him) I willingly acquiesced,) he left at posal the rents of a great proportion of his; and especially all those, which, having been his your mother, reverted to him as a male fief. he may have thought that he was acting w treme generosity, while, in the opinion of all men, he will only be considered as having led a new obligation, seeing that, if I be in strict law, you must be considered as the you, and I as your legal administrator, meant to be considered as having the my solicitor is not to me! attempt not to thwart my determination! it will avail nothing; you will hear of and see this lump of deformity no more. To you I shall be dead ere I put my grave, and you will think of me as of a friend discommended to the toils and crimes of existence.”
ment and control of my property. Or, if all this assuming friendship was employed by Sir Edward for the sake of securing his own peace of mind, and acquiring the power of ruining me at his pleasure, I feel myself, I must repeat, still less bound by the alleged obligation.

Thus, in one last year, as I understand, either his own crazed imagination, or the accomplishment of some such scheme as I have hinted, brought him down to this country. His alleged motive, it appears, was, after the death of his unhappy and celebrated friend, which he had directed to be raised in the chapel over the tomb of your mother. Mr. Ratcliffe, who at this time had done me the honour to make my house his own, had taken the trouble to secure the lease of the chapel. The consequence, as he informs me, was a freemasonry of several hours, during which he fled into the neighbouring moors, in one of the wildest spots of regular information when by some means or other, either by Ratcliffe, or through Westburnflat or others, whom he had the means to bribe to any extent. He makes it a crime against me that I endeavoured to establish, and that the sudden and almost instantaneous revocation of allowances, of which I have so much reason to complain. Of Sir Frederick Langley, I suppose, you will hear no more. He is not likely to claim the hand of a dowager maiden. I therefore commit you, not to give my free and hearty consent, providing the settlements are drawn in such an irrevocable form as may secure my child from suffering by that state of dependence, and that sudden and almost instantaneous revocation of allowances, of which I have so much reason to complain.

The above letter throws the only additional light which we have been able to procure upon the earlier part of our story. It was Hobie's opinion, and may be that of most of our readers, that the Recluse of Mucklestone was not, after all, a mere incoherent and twilight understanding; and that he had neither very clear views as to what he himself wanted, nor was apt to pursue his ends by the clearest and most direct means to reach them. Of course, this conduct was likened by Hobie, to looking for a straight path through a common, over which are a hundred devious tracks, but not one distinct line of road.

When Isabella had perused the letter, her first inquiry was after her father. He had left the castle, she was informed, early in the morning, after a long interview with Mr. Ratcliffe, and was already far on his way to the next port, where he might expect to find shipping for the Continent.

"Where was Sir Edward Mauley?"

"No one had seen the Dwarf since the eventful scene of the preceding evening."

"Odd, if any thing has befe'en puri Elsieh," said Hobie Elliot. "I wish I had been there, but I was not."

He immediately rode to his dwelling, and the remaining she-goat came bleating to meet him, for her milking time was past. The Solitary was nowhere to be seen; his door, contrary to wont, was open, his fire extinguished, and a light in the whole but was left in the state which it exhibited on Isabella's visit to him. It was clear that the means of conveyance which had brought the Dwarf to Elsielaw had been removed by him, and he was gone to some other place of abode. Hobie returned disconsolate to the castle.

"I am doubting we hae lost Canny Elsieh for gude ane.""You have indeed," said Ratcliffe, producing a paper, which he put into Hobie's hands; "but read that, and you will perceive you have been no loser by having known him."

It was a short deed of gift, by which "Sir Edward Mauley, otherwise called Elahas-hender the Recluse, endowed Halbert or Hobie Elliot, and Grace Armstrong, in full property, with a considerable sum borrowed by Elliot from him."

Hobie's joy was mingled with feelings which brought tears down his rough cheeks.

"It's a queer thing," he said; "but I canna joy in the gear, unless I kent the puri body was happy that gave it me."

"Next to enjoying happiness ourselves," said Ratcliffe, "is the consciousness of having bestowed it on others. Had all my master's benefits been conferred like the present, what a different return would they have produced! But the indiscriminate profusion that would give no joy but the illiberal prodigality, neither does good, nor is rewarded by the gratitude of receiving the wind to reap the whirlwind."

"And that was be a light har'at," said Hobie; "but, wi' my young leetle's leaves, I wad, as I am sure as Grace's bit flower yard at the Haugh-foot—they shall never be smeekit by o'ny bair. And the puri goet's, would be negligence about a great toon like bair's, and..."
she could feed bonnily on our lily lea by the burn side, and the hounds wad ken her in a day’s time, and never flash her, and Grace weel milk her like morning wi’ her ain hand, for Elsie’s sake; for though he was thwarted and cankered in his converse, he like dumb creatures well. 14

Hobbie’s requests were readily granted, not without some wonder at the natural delicacy of feeling which pointed out to him this mode of displaying his gratitude. He was delighted when Ratcliffe informed him that his benefactor should not remain ignorant of the care which he took of his favourite.

14 And mind be sure and tell him that grannie and he titties, and, above all, grace and myself, are weel and thriving, and that it’s a’ his doing—that canna but please him, ane wad think.’

And Elliot and the family at Heugh-foot were, and continued to be, as fortunate and happy as his unadulterated honesty, tenderness, and gallantry, so well merited.

All bar the marriage of Earnscliff and Isabella was now removed, and the settlements which Ratcliffe produced on the part of Sir Edward Mauley, might have satisfied the cupidity of Elleslaw himself. But Miss Vere and Ratcliffe thought it unnecessary to mention to Earnscliff that one great motive of Sir Edward, in thus loading the young pair with benefits, was to expiate his having, many years before, shed the blood of his father in a hasty brawl. If it be true, as Ratcliffe asserted, that the Dwarf’s extreme misanthropy seemed to relax somewhat, under the consciousness of having diffused happiness among so many, the recollection of this circulation of love might perhaps be one of his chief motives for refusing obstinately ever to witness their state of contentment.

Mareschal hunted, shot, and drank claret—tired of the country, went abroad, served three campaigns, came home, and married Lucy Lidgeton.

Years flew over the heads of Earnscliff and his wife, and found and left them contented and happy.

The scheming ambition of Sir Frederick Langley engaged him in the unfortunate insurrection of 1715. He was made prisoner at Preston, in Lancashire, with the Earl of Derwentwater, and others. His defence, and the dying speech which he made at his execution, may be found in the State Trials. Mr. Vere, supplied by his daughter with an ample income, continued to reside abroad, engaged deeply in the affairs of Law’s bank during the regency of the Duke of Orleans, and was at one time supposed to be immensely rich. But, on the bursting of that famous bubble, he was so much disgraced at being again reduced to a moderate annuity, (although he saw thousands of his companions in misfortune absolutely starving,) that vexation of mind brought on a paralytic stroke, of which he died, after lingering under its effects a few weeks.

Willie of Westburnflat fled from the wrath of Hobbie Elliot, as his betters did from the pursuit of the law. His patriotism urged him to serve his country abroad, while his reluctance to leave his native scene pressed him rather to remain in the beloved isle, and collect purses, watches, and rings, on the highways and by-roads at home. Fortunately for him, the first impulse prevailed, and he joined the army under Marlborough; obtained a commission, to which he was recommended by his services in collecting cattle in the commissariat; returned home after many years with some money, (how come by Heaven only knows,)—demolished the peel-house at Westburn, as built, in its stead, a high narrow one—and, of the stories, with a chimney at each end—drank brandy with the neighbours, whom, in his youth, he had plundered—died in his bed, and is recorded on his tombstone at Kirkwall; (still extant,) at having played all the parts of a brave soldier, a dear neighbour, and a sincere Christian.

Mr. Ratcliffe resided usually with the family of Elleslaw, but regularly every spring and summer, he was then in attendance on his unfortunate patron. At length, on his return from one of these visits, a grave countenance, and deep mourning, announced to the Elleslaw family that their beloved was no more. Sir Edward’s death made no addition to their fortune, for he had divested himself of property during his lifetime, and chiefly in the favour. Ratcliffe, his sole confidant, died at a very old age, but without ever naming the place where his master had finally retired in the manner of his death, or the place of his burial. It was supposed that on all these particulars his patron had imposed on him strict secrecy.

The sudden disappearance of Elsie from her extraordinary hermitage corroborated the report that the common people had spread concerning her. Many believed that, having ventured to enter the consecrated building, contrary to her precept and the Evil One, she had been bodily carried off when his return to his cottage; but most are of opinion that he only disappeared for a season, and could not be seen from time to time among the hills, retaining, according to custom, a more vivid recollection of his wild and desperate language, than the benevolent tendency of most of his actions usually identified with the malignant demands of the Man of the Moors, whose feet were devoted to Mrs. Elliot to her grandchildren; and, accordingly, generally represented as bewitching the shepherd, cooling the eves to feel that it is to cast their lambs, or loosening the impending wreath of snow to prepare its weight on such as take shelter, during the storm, beneath the bank of a torrent, or under the shelter of a deep glen. In short, the ever-dreaded and deprecated by the inhabitants of our pastoral country, are ascribed to the agency of the Black Dwarf.

OLD MORTALITY.
INTRODUCTION TO OLD MORTALITY.

Robert Paterson, called by the title of Old Mortality, was a minister in Scotland about the close of the seventeenth century, and his real name was Robert Paterson. He was a native of Ayrshire, born in 1622. Paterson was a man of great piety and zeal, and he was the chief of the Presbyterians in Scotland at the time. He was known for his eloquence and his ability to convey the message of the Bible in a way that was accessible to all people. His sermons were filled with moral and spiritual teachings, and he was known for his integrity and honesty.

In his old age, Paterson was called to the chapel of the King's School at Dunfermline. He was a man of great charm and presence, and his sermons were well received by the congregation. He was known for his good sense and his ability to make the message of the Bible relevant to the lives of his congregation.

INTRODUCTION TO OLD MORTALITY.

Stewart, but against all who attempted to support the abominable heresies of the Church of Rome. From his circumstance it appears that he had no children, nor during his whole life, imbibed the religious enthusiasm by which he afterwards so much disapproved.

"The religious sect called Hallow-men, or Covenanters, was at that time much noted for austerity and devotion, in imitation of Cameron, their great leader, of whom Old Mortality became one of the most strenuous supporters. He made frequent journeys into the country, and wherever he went, he always carried with him gravestones from his quarry at Dastowick, to keep in remembrance the sacrifices of the revolutionists whose dust gathered at his mother's house. Old Mortality was not one of those religious devotees who, although one eye is seemingly turned towards heaven, keep the other steadfastly fixed on some sublunary object. As his enthusiasm increased, his journeys into the country became more frequent, and he sometimes undertook the perilous task of carrying his gravestones to his friends.

"From about the year 1728, he returned thence to his father's house, and he lay at rest for several years, during which time he was much visited by his friends.

"There is a small monument in the farm of the Ca- tel, near the House of the Hil, in Wigtownshire, which is reputed to have been erected as being the first record, by Old Mortality, to the memory of several persons who fell in defence of their religion in the civil war in the reign of Charles II.

"From the Caulet, the labours of Old Mortality, in the course of time, spread over nearly all the Lowlands of Scotland. There are few churchyards in any of the parishes where his works have not been visited by his adherents, and where the work of his clergymen is not yet to be seen. It is easily distinguished from the work of any other artist by the personal touching of the inscriptions, and the style of handwriting.

"This is a popular and classical style of handwriting, as it may be seen by the following account of his friends, expressed, amongst other letters, in some of which I have traced in my possession.

"A Calendar of Events, 1726. 1736.

"Robert Paterson died at Adam Walker.

"To dye, for seven weeks, 9 6

"To buy of the weeds, 1 3

"To hire of the peas, 1 5

"To rent of the rent, 6 0

"To sell of the Elliott, 1 0

"To sell of the wheat, 2 0

"Received in part, 10 0

"Unpaid, 5 5

"This statement shows the religious wanderer to have been very poor in his old age; but he was so much by choice than through necessity, as at the period here alluded to, he had children who were all comfortably situated, and were most anxious to keep their father at home, but he continued to pursue his career in the churchyard, and his wanderings were not without profit.

"As soon as his body was found, information was sent to his friends, and the same was composed of the account of his death. At that time, the letter communicating the particulars of his death was so long delayed by the fact, that the remittances of the account could not be made known at Bankhall.

"The following is an exact copy of the account of his funeral expenses, the original of which I have in my possession:

"The house was stunned by a Captain Ord and Urquhart, who was the last of the Tunbridge.

"A well of water, still alive, poetically called by the name of Old Mortality, who dies in the later or earlier, the farmer more his name.

"The above account is authenticated by the son of the deceased.

"My friend was prevented by indisposition from going to Bankhall to attend the funeral of Old Mortality, but I have heard much of his death from his eldest son, who was present at the ceremony. He was a very old man, much respected by his neighbours. Walker died several years ago, leaving behind him a family now resident in the same house. John went to America in the year 1726, and afterwards to Europe, settling at Bath.,

"Old Mortality had three sons, Robert, Walter, and John; the former, as he has been already mentioned, lived in the parish of Halmain, I believe, and was much respected by his neighbours. OLD MORTALITY.

CHAPTER I.

Preliminary.

Why seeks he with unwearyed toil
Through death's dim walk to urge his way,
Reclaim his long-assayed spot,
And lead oblivion into day?—Landore.

"Most readers," says the Manuscript of Mr. Patience, "must have witnessed with delight the joyous urst which attends the dismission of a village school on a fine summer evening. The buoyant spirit of childhood, repressed with so much difficulty during the tedious hours of discipline, may then be seen to splende, as it were, in shout, and song, and frolic, as if the little uachins join in groups on their play-ground, and arrange their matches of sport for the evening. But there is one individual who partakes of the relief afforded by the moment of discharge with a peculiar fervency, and who is not so obvious to the eye of the spectator, or so apt to receive his sympathy. I mean the teacher himself, who, stunned with the hum, and suffocated with the closeness of his school-room, has spent the whole day (himself against a host) in controlling indulgence, exciting indifference to action, striving to enlighten stupidity, and labouring to soften obstinacy; and whose spirit and intellect have been onfounded by hearing the same dull lesson repeated hundred times by rote, and only varied by the various blunders of the reciters. Even the flowers of his genius, with which his solitary fancy is most gratified, have been rendered degraded, in his imagination, by their connexion with tears, with errors, and with punishment; so that the Elocution of Virgil and Xen of Horace are each inapplicable allied in association with the sullen figure and monotonous recitation of some blundering school-boy. If to these mental distresses are added a delicate frame of body, and a mind and heart of nature, the distinction than that of being the tyrant of childhood, the reader may have some slight conception of the relief which a solitary walk, in the cool of a fine summer evening, affords to him, for he is not in haste, and his footsteps are spaced and unhurried. Indeed, many of the apprehensiveness has been shattered, for so many hours, in plying the insomnious task of public instruction.

To me these evening strolls have been the happiest moments of my life. And if, you will believe me, anything so trifling as the fragments of a child's memory can afford me any consolation, you will not object to the following recollection: A teacher who had been long associated with the quiet scenery around me, has disposed my mind to the task of composition.

"My chief haunt, in these hours of golden leisure, a the banks of the small stream, which, winding through a lone vale of green bracken, passes in front of the village school-house of Glandrigh. For the first quarter of a mile, perhaps, I may be disturbed from my meditations, in order to return the scrape, or baffle, of such stragglers among my pupils as fish for trout or minnows in the little brook, or seek nashes and wild-flowers by its margin. But, beyond the space I have mentioned, the juvenile anglers do not, after sunset, voluntarily extend their excursions. The cause is, that farther up the narrow valley, and in a recess which seems scooped out of the side of the steep heathly bank, there is a deserted burial-ground, which the little cowards are fearful of approaching in the twilight. To me, however, the place has an inexpressible charm. It has long been the favorite theme of my walks, and, if my fond patron forgets not his promise, will (probably at no very distant day) be my final resting-place after my mortal pilgrimage."

"It is a spot which possesses all the solemnity of feeling attached to a burial-ground, without exciting those of a more unpleasing description. Having been very little used for many years, the few hillocks which rise above the level plain are covered with the same short velvet turf. The monuments, of which there are not above seven or eight, are half sunk in the ground, and overgrown with moss. No newly-erected tomb disturbs the sober serenity of our reflections by reminding us of recent calamity, and no rank-springing grass forces upon our imagination the recollection, that it owes its dark luxuriance to the foul and festering remnants of mortality which ferment beneath. The ashes which sprinkled the rod, and the harelip which hangs thereon, and which derive their pure nourishment from the dew of heaven, and their growth impresses us with no degrading or disgusting recollections. Death has indeed been here, and its traces are before us; but they are softened and deprived of their horror by our distance from the period when they have been first impressed. Those who sleep beneath are only connected with us by the reflection, that they have once been with us. These are now identified with their mother earth, ours shall, at some future period, undergo the same transformation."

"Yet, although the more has been collected on the most modern of these humble tombs during four generations of mankind, the memory of some of those who sleep beneath them is still held in reverent remembrance. It is true, that, upon the largest, and, to an antiquary, the most interesting monument of the group, which bears the effigies of a doughty knight in his hood of mail, with his shield hanging on his breast, the armoirial bearings are defaced by time, and a few worn-out letters may be read at the pleasure of the decipherer, Dns. Johan, de Hamel, or Johan, de Lormel. And it is also true, that of another tomb, with a cross, mitre, and pastoral staff, tradition can only aver, that a certain nameless bishop lies interred there. But upon other two stones which lie beside, may still be read in rude prose, and ruder rhyme, the history of those who sleep beneath them. They belong, we are assured by the epitaph, to the class of persecuted Presbyterians who afforded a melancholy subject for history in the times of Charles II. and his successor."

In returning from the battle of Penland Hills, a party of the insurgents had been attacked in this glen by a small detachment of the King's troops, and three or four either killed in the skirmish, or shot after being made prisoners, as rebels taken with arms in their hands. The peasantry continued to attach to the tomb of those victims of prejudice an honour which they do not render to more splendid mausoleums; and, when they point them out to their sons, and narrate the fate of the sufferers, usually conclude, by extorting them to be ready, should times call for it, to resist to the death in the cause of civil and religious liberty, like their brave forefathers.

*Note, by Mr. Jedediah Clesibotham. That I kept my pig in this melancholy matter with my deceased and lamented friend, apparcheth from a handsome head-stone erected at my proper charge in this spot, bearing the name and calling of Peter Walker, with the inscription, with this nativity, also with a testimony of his merits, attended by myself, as his superior and patron. J. C. James, Barrister of Scotland. That is, and Memos, according to the numeration of the Kings of England."
Although I am far from venerating the peculiar tenets asserted by those who call themselves the followers of those men, and whose intolerance and narrow-minded bigotry are as conspicuous as is their devotional zeal, yet it is without depreciating the memory of those sufferers, many of whom united in the sentiments of Hampden with the sufferings of the Covenanters. On the other hand, it would be unjust to forget, that many even of those who had been most active in crushing what they considered the hempilden of their unhappy unhappy, displayed the same spirit of religious enthusiasm. It has often been remarked of the Scottish character, that the stubbornness with which it is moulded shows most to advantage in adversity, when it seems akin to the native sycamore of their hills, which seems to be imposed in its mode of growth even by the influence of the prevailing wind, but, shooting its branches with equal boldness in every direction, shows no weather-side to the storm, and may be broken, but can never be bended. It must be understood that I speak of my countrymen as they fell under my own observation. We may be mistaken, I have been borne down among them, they are more docile. But it is time to return from this digression.

One summer evening, as in a stroll, such as I have described, I listened intently to the last chime of the dead, I was somewhat surprised to hear sounds distinct from those which usually soothe its solitude, the gentle chiding, namely, of the brook, and of a sound at once melancholy and in comparison with the current of the gigantic ash-trees, which mark the cemetery. The chink of a hammer was, on this occasion, distinctly heard; and I entertained some alarm that a marching funeral should be held over this tract of existence; for this ground of my favourite brook, was about to be drawn up the glen, in order to substitute its rectangular defoliation for the graceful winding of the natural boundary. As I approached, I was agreeably undeceived. An old man was seated upon the monument of the slaughtered presbyterians, and busily employed in deepening, with his chisel, the letters of the inscription, which, announcing, in scriptural language, the promised blessings of futurity to be the lot of the slain, anathematized the murderers with corresponding violence. A canvas pouch hung around the neck of the animal, for the purpose of carrying, of cleaning the rider's tools, and any thing else he might have occasion to carry with him. Although I had never seen the old man, yet from the singularity of his employment, and the style of his equipage, I had no difficulty in recognising a religious itinerant whom I had often heard talk of, and who was known in various parts under the title of Old Mortality.

I deem it fitting that the reader should learn, that the boundary between the contestable heritable property of the land of Knapton, and his honour the Laird of Gnesith, had often been the subject of dispute. A rather sour of uncremented granite, called by the vulgar a dry-argy, furnished a natural boundary to the ground. Truly, in truth, they fell into discord concerning two discs of the same stone, one within the other, one on the outside of the other, and the controversy, having some years by past hands, had not been finally settled before the judges of the land, (under which it should be understood), as they had been disposed to thank his memory; but on this occasion I propose to show that I did not hate the child, but that I must return, the more so, because attending my interview with the interesting character to the theologian, I could not help repeating, "The old man was engaged in retouching. I am in a greater or a red, notwithstanding the multis of Solomon, for which scowls, I must return, and because attending my interview with the interesting character to the theologian, I could not help repeating, "The old man was engaged in retouching. I am in a greater or a red, notwithstanding the multis of Solomon, for which scowls, I must return, and because attending my interview with the interesting character to the theologian, I could not help repeating, "The old man was engaged in retouching. I am in a greater or a red, notwithstanding the multis of Solomon, for which scowls, I must return, and because attending my interview with the interesting character to the theologian, I could not help repeating, "The old man was engaged in retouching.

respect to his years and his principles, beginning my address by a respectful apology for interrupting his labours. The old man intimated the operation of the chisel, took off his spectacles and wiped them, then rose, and welcomed me with the most cordial hospitality. Encouraged by his affability, I intruded upon him some questions concerning the circumstances of the scene whereon he had been employed. "To talk of the exploits of the Covenant was delightful, as to repair their monuments was the business of his life. He was profuse in the communication of all the minute information which he had acquired from the records of the war and its sufferings. One would almost have supposed he must have been their contemporary, and had actually beheld the passages which he related, so much had he identified his fondest imaginings with their dreams, and so much had he narrated the circunstancialit of an eye-witness."

"We," he said, in a tone of exultation,—"we are the only true whites. Carnal men have assumed that triumphant appellation, following him whose kingdom is of this world. Which of them would sit six hours on a wet hill-side to hear a gospel sermon? I think the truth is, our ancestors were nobly born and brought up. No, they were not of the天下, whom the worthy Mr. Pedem, (the secret servitor of the Lord, none of whose words fail to the ground,) that the French monarcs sell rise as fast in the glens of Ayre, and the kerns of Galway, as ever "it was thrust upon the stem. And now they are gripping to the bow and to the spear, when they said to mourn for a solemn land and a broken covenant."

"When the great old man by letting his peculiar opinions pass without contradiction, and anxious to prolong conversation with so singular a character, I prevailed upon him to accept that hospitality, which Mr. Clisehamborn was always willing to extend to those who needed it. In our way to the school-master’s house, we called at the Wallace Inn, where I was pretty certain I should find my patron about that hour of the evening. The inn-keeper of Old Mortality was, with difficulty, prevailed upon to join his host in a single glass of liquor, and that on condition that he should be permitted to name the place where I should be expected about half-past five, and then, with bonnet doffed and eyes uplifted, drank to the memory of those heroes of the Kirk who had first uplifted her banner upon the mountain. By the time I could prevail on him to extend his conviviality to a second cup, my patron accompanied him home, and accommodated him in the Prophet’s Chamber, as it is his pleasure to call the closest which holds a spare bed, and which is frequently a place of retreat for the poor traveller."

"The next day I took leave of Old Mortality, who seemed affected by the unusual attention with which I had concurred in an acquaintance and listened to his conversation. After he had mounted, not without difficulty, the old white pony, he took me by the hand and said, "The blessing of our Master be with you, young man! My hours are like the ears of the latter harvest, and your days are yet in the spring; and yet you may be gathered into the garner of mortality before me, for the sickle of death cuts down the green as oft as the ripe, and there is a colouring of the head which is like the blackness in my hair."

Probably matrons. It would seem that this was spoken during the apprehensions of invasion from France.—Publishers.

If you have not the time to take a hand at the hand-sawdust trade, the rustics can observe the manners of the Dunlop, who was buxom and comely of aspect, his Honour the present Lord of Old Mortality. While he held his tenure of the Stewartry, was wont to prefer my Prophet’s Chamber even to the Smout chamber of ease in the Wallace Inn, and to besow me with the choice directions for all the best obdurate of the house, but, in reality, to assure himself of my company by the evening."—C.L.
TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

In behalf of the exiled house of Stewart. I may even boast right to command authority on the same score; for more than one non-juring bishop, whose authority and income were upon me as apostolical a scale as the greater abominations of Episcopacy could well permit, with the ring of the humble cheer of the Wallace Inn, to furnish me with information corrective of the facts which I learned from others. There are also here and there a laird or two, who, though they shrug their shoulders, profess no great shame in their fathers having served in the persecuting squadrons of Earlshall and Claver-house. From the gamekeepers of these gentlemen, an office not of any ordinary order, I have become hereditary in such families. I have also contrived to collect much valuable information.

Upon the whole, I can hardly fear, that, at this time, in describing the operation which their opposite principles produced upon the good and bad men of both parties, I can be suspected of meaning insult or injustice to either. If recollection of former injuries, extra-loyalty, and contempt and hatred of their adversaries, produced rigour and tyranny in the one party, it will hardly be denied, on the other hand, that, if the zeal for God’s house did not eat up the conventional; if devotion for least, to imitate the phrase of Dryden, no small portion of their loyalty, sober sense, and good breeding. We may safely hope, that the souls of the brave and sincere on either side have looked with some wonder and pity upon the ill-considered motives which caused their mutual hatred and hostility, while in this valley of darkness, blood and tears. Peace to the memory!

CHAPTER II.

Summon an hundred horse, by break of day,
To wait our pleasure at the castle gates.

Douglas.

Unaska the reign of the last Stewarts, there was an anxious wish on the part of government to counteract, by every means in their power, the strict or punctilious observance of the Church of Scotland, which had been the chief characteristic of the republican government, and to revive those feudal institutions which united the vassal to the liege lord, and both to the crown. Frequent musters of the nobility and gentry, in both my story of past and present exercise and for sports and pastimes, were appointed by authority. The interference, in the latter case, was impolitic, to say the least; for, as usual in such instances, the courtiers, the courtiers, the courtiers, the courtiers, the courtiers, became confirmed in their opinions, instead of giving way to the terrors of authority; and the youth of both sexes, whom the pipe and tabor in England, or the bagpipe in Scotland, would have been in themselves an irresistible temptation, were enabled to act them at defiance, from the proud consciousness that they were, at the same time, respecting an act of court. To compel men to dance and be merry by authority, has rarely succeeded even on board of slave ships, where it was formerly sometimes attempted by way of inducing the wretched captives to agitate themselves and restore the circulation, during the few minutes they were permitted to enjoy the fresh air upon deck. The rigor of the strict Calvinists increased, proportion to the wishes of the government that it should be relaxed. A judicial observance of the Sabbath—a superfluous condemnation of all manly pastimes and harmless recreations, as well as the profane intrusions on the peace of impious dancing, that is, of men and women dancing together in the same party (for I believe they admitted that the exercise might be carried as far as practised by the parties, more or less) distinguishes the policy of the time. In my story of past and present exercise and for sports and pastimes, there was also bestowed all the money that for a long time before he had gathered from his friends, or had otherwise purchased, upon a house of Lannack, a new hall of Lannack, and to supply the wants of his contemnors; thus furnished, the secret was at length discovered. It was at once put down by the presbytery of Clackmannan. But then came the supper of the deacons, which was nothing but an entertainment, a good supper, and the news went abroad. However, the churchmen were not to be so easily turned aside; and the presbytery came to the conclusion that the Rabbis must be called in. To this the highlanders replied, that they were not willing to countenance such a proceeding, and that if the presbytery was determined to proceed in this way, they would insist on having a presbytery of their own, and that the highlanders would have nothing to do with any such assembly as that which was called the presbytery of Clackmannan.

cause of royalty, she was ready at any time to have made the most unshrink'd personal sacrifices. She had lost her husband and two promising sons in the civil wars that unhappy period; but she had received from her own right hand the west cornwall of Scotland to meet Cromwell in the unfortunate field of Worcester. Charles the Second had actually breakfasted at the Tower of Tillicoultry; an incident which had a momentous importance in the life of Lady Margaret, who seldom afterwards partook of that meal, either at home or abroad, without detailed the whole circumstances of the royal visit, not forgetting the salutation which his majesty conferred on each side of her face, though she sometimes omitted to notice that he bestowed the same favour on two luxon serving-women who appeared at that time for the day into the capacity of waiting gentlewomen.

These instances of royal favour were decisive; and of Lady Margaret had not been a confirmed royalist already, from sense of high birth, influence of education, and hatred to the opposite party, through whom she had suffered such domestic calamity, the giving a breakfast to majesty, and received the royal salute in return, were bowing enough of themselves to unite her exclusively to the fortunes of the Stewarts. There were now, in all appearance, three parties, but Lady Margaret's heart did adhered to them through the worst of troubles, and was resolved to sustain the same securities of fortune should their scale once more kick the beam. At present she endured it; but the military display of the force which stood ready to support the instrument was quite as well as could, the mortification she felt at the unworthy desertion of her own retainers.

Many civilists passed between her ladyship and the representatives of sundry ancient loyal families who were upon the ground, by whom she was held in high reverence; and not a young man of rank passed through the course of their minstrel, but she carried his body more erect in the saddle, and threw his horse upon its haunches, to display his own horsemanship and the perfect biting of his steed to the best advantage in the eyes of Miss Edith Bellenden. But the young cavaliers, distinguished by high descent and undoubted loyalty, attracted no more attention from Edith than the law of courtesy peremptorily demanded; and she turned an indifferent eye to the compliments with which she was addressed, most of which were little the worse for the wear, though borrowed for the nonce from the labors of transcriptions on almanacs. Scudder, the minstrels in which the youth of that age delighted to dress themselves, ere Folly had thrown her banners overboard, and cut down her vessels of the freemen of the craft, was given up. Cleanness, numbers, and others, into small craft, drawing as little water, or, to speak more plainly, consuming as little time as the little cockboat in which the gentle reader has designed to embark. It was, however, the decree of fate that Miss Bellenden should not continue to evoke the same equanimity till the conclusion of the day.

CHAPTER III.

Howness and horse confined the bitter pang. And arms and warning fell with his green chesuse. Perseus of Hope.

When the military evolutions had been gone through tolerably well, allowing for the awkwardness of the occasion, but amounting to this effect that the competitors were about to step forth for the game of the popinjay already described. The mast, or pole, having a yard extended across it, from which the strings were run, was braced and the several attachments of the assembly; and even those who had eyed the evolutions of the feudal militia with a sort of malignant and sarcastic sneer, from disinclination to the practice which they professedly inculcated, could not refrain from taking considerable interest in the strife which was now approaching. They crowded towards the goal, and criticised the appearance of each competitor, as they advanced in succession, discharged their pieces at the mark, and had their good or bad address rewarded by the laughter or applause of the spectators. But when a slender young man, dressed with great simplicity, yet neat and seemly without certain, in the broad grey coat with his hat of green and the dark green cloak thrown back over his shoulder, his faced ruff and feathered cap indicating a sense of the importance of the occasion, the disinterested interest among the spectators, whether altogether favourable to the young adventurer, it was difficult to discover.

"Every one, sir, to see his father's son at the like thane fearless follies!" was the exclamation of the elder and more rigid puritans, whose curiosity had so far overcome their dignity as to bring them to the play ground. The general interest viewed the whole rashly, and were contented to wish success to the son of a deceased presbyterian leader, without strictly examining the propriety of his being a competitor in the prize.

Their wishes were gratified. At the first discharge of his piece the green adventurer struck the popinjay, being the first palatable hit of the day, though several had fallen very near the mark. A Anatomy of applause ensued. But the success was not decisive; it being necessary that each who followed should have an exchange, and then those who succeeded a hitting the mark should reproduce themselves, till one displayed a decided superiority over the others. Two only of those who followed in order succeeded in hitting the popinjay. The first was a young man of low degree, who kept his face muffled in his gray cloak; the second a gallant young cavalier, remarkable for a handsome exterior, sedulously decorated for the day. He had been since the muster in close attendance at Lady Margaret and Miss Bellenden, and had left them with an air of indifference, when Lady Margaret his mistress was unhorsed. He was a young man of family and loyalty, and was determined to show that two lads who had been successful. In half an hour, young Lord Eversdale threw himself from his horse, borrowed a gun from a servant, and, as we have already noticed, hit the mark. Great was the interest excited by the renewal of the contest between the three candidates who had been hitherto successful. The state equipment of the Duke was, with some difficulty, put in motion, and approached more near to the scene of action. The riders, both male and female, turned their horses' heads in the same direction and all eyes were bent upon the issue of the trial of skill.

It was the etiquette in the second contest, that the competitors should take their turn of firing after the Established Church. St. John, who, as he took his stand, half-uncovered his musketeer's coat, and said to the gallant in green "Ye see, Mr. Henry, if it were only other day, I could have wished to miss your fire; but John Dennern is looking at us, see I mean do my best." He took his aim, and his bullet whistled past the mark so nearly, that the pendulous object at which it was directed was seen to shiver. But, however, he had not hit it, and, with a duncast look, he withdrew himself from further competition, and hastened to disappear from the assembly, as if fearful of being recognized by his rival. At the same time, he struck his ball a second time struck the popinjay. All should; and from the outskirts of the assembly arose a cry of, "The good old cause for ever!"

While the dignitaries bent their brows at these exciting shouts of the disaffected, the young Lord Eversdale advanced again to the hazard, and again was successful. The shouts and congratulations of the well-affected marked the return of the noble youth, who attended his success, but still a subsequent trial of skill remained.

The green markman, as determined to bring the affair to a decision, took his horse from a person who held him, having previously looked carefully to the security of his gun and the fitting of his saddle, and placing his foot on his stirrup, seated himself on his horse, and determined to bring the question to a decisive issue.
place from which he was to fire at a gallop, and, as he passed, this man, with his reins turned edgewise upon his saddle, discharged his carbine, and brought down the popinjay. Lord Evandale imitated his example, although, as is common with such, his skill was not perfect, and his horse was not so well trained. The animal swerved at the moment his master fired, and the ball missed his heart, and only struck him in the hip. The address of the green marksmen were now equally pleasing by his courtesy. He disclaimed all merit from the last shot, and proposed to his antagonist that it should not be allowed to hit, and that they should renew the contest on foot.

"I would prefer horseback, if I had a horse as well fitted, and, probably, as well broken to the exercise, as yours," said the young Lord, addressing his antagonist.

"Will you do me the honour to use him for the next trial, on condition you will lend me yours?" said the young gentleman.

Lord Evandale was ashamed to accept this courtesy, as conscious how much it would diminish the value of his victory; and yet, unable to suppress his wish to return him, he thought he must commit himself. He added, "that although he renounced all pretensions to the honour of the day, (which he said somewhat scornfully,) yet, if the victor had no particular objection, he should be only too happy to exchange horses with him, for the purpose of trying a shot for love.

As said so, he looked boldly towards Miss Bellenden, and tradition says, that the eyes of the young tiraillier travelled, though more covertly, in the same direction. The young Lord's last trial was as unsuccessful as the former, and it was with difficulty that he preserved the tone of scornful indifference which he had hitherto assumed. But, conscious of the ridicule which attaches itself to the resentment of a losing party, he returned home on horseback with the horse which he had made his last unsuccessful attempt, and received back his own; giving, at the same time, thanks to his competitor, who, he said, had re-established his favourite horse in his good opinion, for he had been in great danger of transferring to the poor nag the blame of an inferiority, which every one, as well as himself, must now be satisfied remained with the rider. Having made this speech in a tone in which mortification assumed the veil of indifference, he mounted his horse and rode off the ground.

As is the usual way of the world, the applause and contempt from the绿色环保who were his favourites, Lord Evandale, were, upon his decisive discomfiture, transferred to his triumphant rival.

"Who is he? what is his name?" ran from month to month, and year to year, to all the assembled friends of him most of whom he was personally known. His style and title having soon transparent, and being within that class whom a great man might notice without derogation, four of the Duke's friends, with the obedience which poor Malvolio ascribes to his imaginary retinue, made out to lead the victor to his presence. As they conducted him in triumph through the crowd on horseback, and stunned him at the same time with their compliments on his success, he chanced to pass, or rather to be led, immediately in front of Lady Margaret and her grand-daughter. The Captain of the pageant, and Miss Bellenden coloured like crimson, as the latter returned, with embarrassed courtesy, the low inclination which the victor made, even to the saddle-bow, in passing her.

"Why do you know that young poon?" said Lady Margaret?

"I — have seen him, madam, at my uncle's, and — and elsewhere occasionally," stammered Miss Edith Bellenden.

"I hear them say around me," said Lady Margaret, "that the young spark is the nephew of old Milwood."

"The son of the late Colonel Morton of Milwood, who commanded a regiment of horse with great courage at Dunbar and Inverkeithing," said a gentleman who sat on horseback beside Lady Margaret.

"Ay, and who before that, fought for the Covenanters both at Marston-Mount and Philiphaugh," said Lady Margaret, sighing as she pronounced the last fatal words, which her husband's death gave her such sad reason to remember.

"Your ladyship is right, my dear," said the gentle man smiling; "but it was well all that were forgot now."

"He ought to remember it Gilbertslee," turned Lady Margaret; and dropped upon Mr. Gobbie himself into the company of those to whom his name must bring unpleasant recollections.

"You forget, my dear lady," said her nomenclator, "that the young gentleman named common assault and service in name of his uncle. I would every estate in the country sent out as pretty a fellow."

"His uncle, as well as his unquitable father, is a roundhead, I presume," said Lady Margaret.

"He is an old miner," said Gilbertslee, "with whom a broad piece would at any time weigh down political opinions, and, therefore, although probably somewhat against the grain, he sends the young gentleman to attend the master to save pecuniary pains and penalties. As for the rest, I suppose the youngster is happy enough to escape here for a day from the dulness of the State, where he sees nobody but his hypochondriac uncle and the favourite housekeeper.

"Do you know how many men and horses the lands of Milwood were rated at?" said the old lady, continuing her inquiry.

Two horsemen with complete harness," answered Gilbertslee.

"Our land," said Lady Margaret, drawing herself up with dignity, "has always furnished to the muster eight men, cousin Gilbertslee, and often a voluntary aid of three the number. I remember his sacred Majesty King Charles, when he took the daunt at Tullietudlem, was particular in inquiring —"

"I see the Duke's carriage in motion," said Gilbertslee, pointing at it to his aunt's friend; "an alias commoner, who touched upon the topic of the royal visit at the family mansion."

"I see the Duke's carriage in motion; I presume your ladyship will take your seat of rank in leaving the field. May I be permitted to convey your ladyship and Miss Bellenden home? — Perhaps the wild whigs have been abroad, and are said to insult and disarm the well-effectuated, who travel in small numbers."

"We thank you, cousin Gilbertslee," said Lady Margaret; "but as we shall have the escort of my own people, I think it best not to be troublesome to our friends. Will you have the goodness to order Harrison to bring up our people somewhat more briskly; he rides them towards us as if he were in procession."

The gentleman in attendance communicated his lady's orders to the trusty steward.

Honest Harrison had his own reasons for doubting the prudence of this command; but, once issued and received, there was a necessity for obeying it. He set off, therefore, at a hand-gallop, followed by the butter, in such a military attitude as became one who had served under Monrose, and with a look of defiance, rendered stern and fiercer by the inspiring fumes of a gill of brandy, which he had snatched a moment to butt to the king's fleshy, and confusion to the Covenanters in the Covenanters' duty. Unhappily this potent refreshment wiped away from the tablets of his memory the necessity of paying some attention to the distresses and difficulties of his rear-file. Gobbi, the gipsy, who next struck a cantor, than Gibbie's Jack-boots, which the poor boy's legs were incapable of steadying, began to play alternately against the horse's flanks, and being armed with what provided spur, its insatiable passion for the enjoyment of the animal, which bounded and plunged, while poor Gobbi's entreaties for aid never reached the ears of the too heedless butler, being drowned partly in the amatory sounds of the stallion, partly in the mutual talk of the gallant Greemes, which Mr. Coutril whisked with all his power of lungs.
The upshot was, that the steed speedily took the matter into his own hands, and having gambolled his way through the lines of those spectators, set off at full speed towards the huge family-coach already described. Gibbie's pike, escaping from its sling, had fallen to a level direction across his horse's neck, and as he sought for the same honourable safety in as strong a grasp of the mane as their muscles could manage. His casque, too, had slipped completely over his face, so that he saw as little in front as he did in rear. Indeed, if he could, it would not have availed him little in the circumstances: for his horse, as if in league with the disaffected, ran full tilt towards the solemn equipage of the Duke, with all the strength of his powers to perpetrate from window to window, at the risk of transfixing as many in its passage as the celebrated thrust of Orlando, which, according to the Italian epic poet, broached as many Moors as a Frenchman spits frogs.

On beholding the bent of this misdirected career, a panic shout of mingled terror and wrath was set up by the whole equipage, insides and outsiders, at once, which had the happy effect of averting the threatened misfortune. The capricious horse of Goose Gibbie was terrified by the noise, and stumbling as he turned about, a kick on the flanks and a plunger, he soon recovered. The jack-boot, the original cause of the disaster, maintaining the reputation they had acquired when worn by better cavaliers, answered one kick as well as another, from the horse's hoofs, and, by their ponderous weight, kept their place in the stirrups. Not so Goose Gibbie, who was fairly spurned out of those wide and ponderous grooves, and precipitated over the horse's head, to the infinite amusement of all the spectators. His lance and helm had forsaken him in his fall, and, for the completion of his disgrace, Lady Margaret Bellenden, not perfectly aware that it was one of the most eminent in the land who furnished the much entertainment, came in time to see her diminutive man-at-arms stripped of his lion's hide,—of the buff-coat, that is, in which he was muffled.

And well he should be, considering his connexion with this metamorphosis, and could not even guess its cause, nor surprise and resentment were extreme, nor were they much modified by the excuses and explanations of her steward and butler. She made a hasty retreat homeward, extremely indignant at the shouts and laughter of the company, and much disposed to vent her displeasure on the refractory agriculturist whose place it was to see to the welfare of his own property. The greater part of the gentry now dispersed, the whimsical misfortune which had befallen the gens d'armes of Tillietudlem furnishing them with much entertainment. But the grand cavalcade of horsemen still in little parties, as their road lay together, diverged from the place of rendezvous, excepting such as, having tried their dexterity at the popinjay, were, by ancient custom, obliged to partake of a grace-cup with their captain before their departure.

At first he played before the spearman, Andailygraffith in their gear then, Blood bonnets, pikas, and swords shone clear then As one head;

The cavalcade of horsemens on their road to the little borough-town were preceded by Niel Blanc, the town-piper, mounted on his white galloway, armed with his dirk and broadsword, and bearing a sheath of arrows, as the rider mounted. He, being the first to check out six country belles for a fair or preaching. Niel, a clean, tight, well timbered, long-winded fellow, had gained the official station of town-piper of— his mark, and was the centre of envy, the mark of all, the pipe, named the Piper's Croft, as it is still called, a field of about an acre in extent, five mounds, and a new livery-coat of the town's colours, yearly; some hopes of a dollar upon the day of the election of magistrates, providing the provost were able and willing to afford such a gratuity; and the privilege of paying, at all the respectable houses in the neighbourhood, an annual visit at the going-time, or any other time, to comfort his own with their ale and brandy, and to beg from each a modicum of seed-corn. In addition to these inestimable advantages, Niel's personal engagement, the piper's performances won the heart of a jolly widow, who then kept the principal change-house in the borough. Her former husband having been a strict presbyterian, of such note that he actually went among his sect by the name of Gene. The publican, many of the more rigid were scandalized by the profession of the successor whom his relic had chosen for a second handmaiden. As the breach (if there was one) between them was so little that it could endure the divergence of the unmixed reputation, most of the old customers continued to give it a preference. The character of the new landlord, indeed, was of that accommodating kind, which enabled him, by close attention to his, to keep his little vessel pretty steady amid the contentious tides of faction. He was a good-humoured, shrewd, selfish sort of fellow, indifferent alike to the disputes about church and state, and only anxious to secure the good-will of customers of every description.

But his character, as well as the state of the country, will be best understood by giving the reader an account of the incidents of the following day as soon as was possible after the girl about eighteen, whom he was initiating in those cares which had been faithfully discharged by his wife, until about six months before our story commences, had been the honest woman had been carried to the kirkyard.

"Jenny," said Niel Blanc, as the girl assisted to disencumber him of his bagpipe, "this is the first day that ye a' has to take the place of your worthy mothers attending to the public; a douce woman she was civil to the customers, and had a good name wi' Wha and Tery, bainth up the street and down the street. of great men, and of great events. After the rebellion for the acts of I, he was at length obliged road where he died in great misery. Great part of his arms, as well as the remarkable circumstances of his descent, had recommended this man to the attenof his officers. But he partook in a great degree of the licentiousness and oppressive disposition, which the habit of acting as agents for government in lev-fining fines, exacting from quarrels, and otherwise pressing the Presbyterian recusants, had rendered too generally among these soldiers. They were so much accustomed to such misdeeds, that they conceived themselves at liberty to commit all manner of license with impunity, as if totally exempted from all law and authority, excepting the command of their officers. On such occasions Bothwell was usually the most forward.

It is probable that Bothwell and his companions would not so long have remained quiet, but for recess to the presence of their Clayter, who comed the small party quartered in the borough, and who was engaged in a game at dice with the curate of the place. But both of these being suddenly called from their amusement to speak with the chief magistrate upon some urgent business, Bothwell was not long of evincing his contempt for the rest of the company.

"Is it not a strange thing, Halliday," he said to his comrade, "to see so much happening here this whole evening, without having drank the king's health?"

"They have drank the king's health," said Halliday. "I heard the green kail-worm of a lad name his majesty's health."

"Did he?" said Bothwell. "Then, Tom, we'll have them drink the Archbishop of St. Andrew's health, and do it on his knells too."

"So we will, by G—," said Halliday; "and he that refuses it, we'll have him to the guard-house, and teach him to ride the colt foaled of an acorn, with a brace of carabines and one foot to kick at."

"Right, Tom," continued Bothwell; "and, to do all things in order, I'll begin with that sulky bluebonnet in the ingle-nook."

He rose accordingly, and taking his shcoat broadsword under his arm to support the insinuon which he meditated, placed himself in front of the stranger noticed by Niell Blane, in his admonitions to his daughter, as being, in all probability, one of the hill-folk, or refractory presbyterians.

"I make so bold as to request of your precision,

Buceluch, and on the Francis Stewart, son of the forfeited Earl, obtained from the favour of Charles I. a general-at-arms, appointing the two nobles-men, grantee of his father's estate, to restore the same, or make some compensation for retaining it. The barony of Creichton, with its beautiful castle, was surrendered by the curators of Francis, Earl of Buceluch, but he retained the far more extensive property in Lisdelodge. Jan Stewart also, as appears from writings in the author's possession, made an advantageous composition with the Earl of Roxburghe. But," says the author, "on the head of Sir John Scott. He held on, and, when brooked them, (enjoyed them,) not onything the richer, since they accrued to his creditors, and are now in the hands of Sir N. Scott. His eldest son Francis became a trooper in the last war; as for the other brother John, who was of Coldingham, he also became a trooper; but has nothing, but lives on the charity of his friends.

Francis Stewart, who had been a private in the Great War, seems to have received no preference, after the Restoration, rather to his high birth. Though, in fact, third companion to Charles II. Captain Creichton, the friend of Deon Swift, who published his Memoirs, found him a private gentleman in the King's Life-Guards. At the time of his death, in a very ill condition: for Fountenell records a duel fought between a Life-Guardsman and an officer in the militia, between the latter which had taken upon him to assume superior rank as a officer, to a gentleman private in the Life-Guards. The Life-Guardsman was killed in the recent; and his antagonist was executed for murder.

The character of Bothwell except in relation to the taxes, is entirely ideal.

The Stagyring State of the Scots State-seven for one hundred years, by Sir John Scott of Buceluch. EDINBURGH, 1786.
All waited for the stranger's answer.—His features, austere even to frowncry, with a cast of eye, which, without being actually oblique, approached nearly to a squint, and which gave a very sinister expression to his countenance, joined to a frame, square, strong, and well made, a middling size, seemed to announce a man unlikely to understand ridicule, or to receive insults with impunity.

"And what is the consequence," said he, "if I should be disposed to comply with your uncivil request?"

"The consequence thereof, beloved," said Bothwell, in the same tone of raillery, "will be, firstly, the loss of your person. Secondly, of a memorable and scandalous divorce. Thirdly, of your property. Lastly, of your life, beloved, that I will administer my flat to thy distorted visual optics; and will conclude, beloved, with a practical application of the flat of my sword to the shoulders of the recusant."

"Is it even so?" said the stranger; "then give me the cup; and, taking it in his hand, he said, with a peculiar expression of voice and manner, "The Archbishop of St. Andrews, and the place he now worthy holds;—may each prelate in Scotland be as the Right Reverend James Sharpe!"

"I would hear the text," said the stranger, exultingly.

"But with a qualification," said Bothwell; "I don't understand what the devil the crop-eared whig means."

"One, gentlemen," said Morton, who became impatient of their insolence, "we are here met as good subjects, and on a merry occasion; and we have a right to expect we shall not be troubled with this sort of discourse."

Bothwell was about to make a surly answer, but Halliday reminded him in a whisper, that there were strict injunctions that the soldiers should give no offence to the men who were sent out to the musters agreeably to the council's orders. So, after honouring Morton with a broad and fierce stare, he said, "Well, Mr. Popinjay, I shall not disturb your reign; I mean your pleasure, at night—is it not an odd thing, Halliday," he continued, addressing his companion, "that they should make such a fuss about cracking off their birding-pieces at a mark which any woman or boy could hit at a day's practice? If Captain Popinjay now, or any of his troop, would try a bout, either with the broadsword, backsword, single rapier, or rapier and dagger, for a gold noble, the first-drawn to such a mark, there would be some good zounds, would the humpkins but wrestle, or pitch the bar, or put the stone, or throw the axe-tree, if (touching the end of Morton's sword scornfully with his toe) they say anything about them that they are afraid to draw."

Morton's patience and prudence now gave way entirely, and he was about to make a very angry answer; but Bothwell's insinuating observations, when the stranger stepped forward.

"This is my quarrel," he said, "and in the name of the good cause, I will see it out myself.—Hark thee, friend; (to Bothwell,) 'twill thou wrestle a flat with me?"

"With my whole spirit, beloved," answered Bothwell, "yes I will strive with thee, to the downfall of one or both."

"Then, as my trust is in Him that can help," retorted his antagonist, "I will forthwith make thee an example to all such railing Rabshakehs."

"Rabshakeh," said the coarse grey horseman's coat from his shoulders, and extending his strong brawny arms with a look of determined resolution, he offered himself to the contest. The soldier was notably well made, by the broad chest, square shoulders, and hardy look of his antagonist, bust, wrestling with great composure, unbuckled his belt, and laid aside his military coat. The company stuck to them, anxiously, and the"
had poured out the blood of God's saints in the wilderness as if it had been the occasion of a legal recreation to waste time in shooting at a bunch of feathers, and close your evening with wine-bibbing in public-houses and market-towns, when He that is mighty is come into the land with his fan in his hand, to purge the wheat from the chaff?"

"I suppose from your style of conversation," said Morton, "that you are one of those who have thought proper to stand out against the government. I must remind you that you are unnecessarily using dangerous language in the presence of a mere stranger, and that the times do not render it safe for me to listen to it."

"Thou canst not help it, Henry Morton," said his companion; "thy master has his uses for thee, and when he calls, thou must obey. Well wot I thou hast not heard the call of a true preacher, or thou hastere now been what thou wilt assuredly one day become."

"We are of the presbyterian persuasion, like yourself," said Morton; for his uncle's family attended the ministry of one of those numerous presbyterian clergymen, who, complying with certain regulations, were licensed to preach without interruption from the government. And indeed, it was said that they made a great stir among the presbyterians, and those who accepted of it were severely censured by the more rigid sectaries, who refused the professed terms. This stranger, therefore, answered with great disdain to Morton's profession of faith.

"That is but an equivocation—a poor equivocation. Ye listen on the Sabbath to a cold, worldly, time-serving discourse, from one in your high commission so much as to hold his apostleship by the favour of the courtiers and the false prelates, and ye call that hearing the word. Of all the things with which the devil has filled his souls in these days of blood and darkness, that black Indulgence has been the most destructive. An awful dispensation it has been, a smiting of the shepherd and a scattering of the sheep upon the mountains—an uplifting of one Christian banner against another, and a fighting of the wars of darkness with the swords of the children of light."

"My uncle," said Morton, "is of opinion, that we enjoy a reasonable freedom of conscience under the indulged clergyman, and I must seriously be guided by his sentiments respecting the choice of a place of worship for his family."

"Your uncle," said the horseman, "is one of those to whom the least lamb in his own folds at Min-wood is dearer than the whole Christian flock. He is one that could willingly bend down to the golden-calf of Bethel, and would have fished for the dust thereof when it was ground to powder and cast upon the waters. Thy father was a man of another stamp."

"My father," replied Morton, "was indeed a brave and gallant man. And you may have heard, sir, that he fought for that royal family in whose name I was this day carrying arms."

"Ay, and had he lived to see these days, he would have cursed the hour he ever drew sword in their cause. But more of this hereafter—I promise thee full surely that thy hour will come, and then the worm thou hast now heard will stick in thy bosom like barbed arrows. My road lies there."

He pointed towards a pass hemmed up into an wild extent of dreary and desolate hills; but as he was about to turn his horse's head into the rugged path, which led from the high-road in that direction, an old woman wrapped in a red cloak, who was sitting by the cross-way, arose, and addressing him, spoke in a mysterious tone of voice, "If ye be of our sin folk, gang up the pass the night for your lives. There is a lion in the path."

But the crier of Brotherstein and ten soldiers had beset the pass, to hae the lives of any of our pair wanderers that venture that gate to join wi' Hamilton and Dingwall."

"Have the persecuted crew or any to lie dead among themselves?" demanded the stranger.

"About sixty or seventy horse and foot," said the old dame; "but, eahow, they are fairly armed, and warme funded wi' victual."

 TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

"God will help his own," said the horseman. "Which way shall I take to join them?"

"It's a mere impossibility this night," said the woman, who was the driver, "for I trust to the little horse and to myself, and the man say there's strange news come free the east, that makes them rave in their cruelty mire fierce than ever—ye mean take shelter someplace for the night?

"But as the days are late, and we are far on our journey, we must seek shelter till the gray of the morning, and then you may find your way through the Drake Moss. When it's light, the wailings of the oppressors, I e'en the sound of the wind, will come down by the wayside, to warn any of our poor scattered remnant that chance to come this gate, before they fall into the nets of the spoilers."

"How far is this?" said the stranger; "and can you give me hiding there?"

"I have," said the old woman, "a hut by the wayside. It may be a mile or two; but four men of Bejol, called dragoons, are lodged therein, to spoil my household goods at their pleasure, because I will not wait upon the worthless, thriftless, fainthearted ministry of that carnal man, John Halfcrot, the curate."

"Good night, good woman, and thanks for thy counsel," said the stranger, as he rode away. "May the blessings of the promise upon you," returned the old woman, "for He that can keep you."

"Amen," said the traveller; "for where to hide my head this night, mortal skill cannot direct me."

"I am very sorry for your distress, Mr. Morton;" answered the woman. "A door to a strong shelter that could be called my own, I almost think I would risk the utmost rigor of the law rather than leave you in such a strait. But my uncle is so alarmed at the prospect of the penalties denounced by the laws against such as comfort, receive, or consort with intercommeined persons, that he has strictly forbidden all of us to hold any intercourse with you."

"It is no less than I expected," said the stranger; "nevertheless, I might be received without his knowledge—a barn, a hay-loft, a cart-shed, any place where I could stretch me down, would be to my habits like a tabernacle of silver set about with planks of cedar."

"I assure you," said Morton, much embarrassed, "that I have not the means of receiving you at Minehead without my uncle's consent and knowledge; nor, if I could do so, would I think myself justifiable in engaging him unconsciously in a danger, which, now, in this new time, is to be feared and dissembled as we are." Well," said the traveller, "I have but one word to say. Did you ever hear your father mention John Balfour of Burley?"

"He was an old friend and comrade, who saved my life, with almost the loss of his own, in the battle of Lonmarston Moor?—Often, very often." "I am that Balfour," said his companion. "Yonder stands thy uncle's house; I see the light among the trees. The avenger of blood is behind me, and my death certain unless I have refuge there. Now, make thy choice, young man; to shrink from the side of thy father's friend, like a thief in the night, and to leave him exposed to the bloody death from which he rescued thy father, or to expose thine uncle's worldly goods to such peril, as, in this perverted age, would make his fine memory the subject of public malice; or of a draught of cold water to a Christian man, when perishing for lack of refreshment?"

A thousand recollections thronged on the mind of Morton as he rode. If the man's fate was not made to him, his memory he idolized, had often enlarged upon his obligations to this man, and regretted, that, after having been long comrades, they had parted in some unkindness at the time when the kingdom of Scotland was divided into Resolutioners and Protesters; the former of whom adhered to Charles II. after his father's death upon the scaffold, while the Protesters inclined rather to the House of Hanover. The stern fanaticism of Burley had attached him to this latter party, and the comrades had parted in displeasure, not as it happened, to meet again. These recollections were the direct cause Morton had often mentioned to his son, and always with an expression of deep regret, that he had never, in any manner, been enabled to repay the assistance, which, on one occasion, he had received from Burley.

"To hasten this man's escape," he continued, "we must proceed to the rear by the old road, by a slope, which, being jealously guarded, is the more likely to be swept along, brought from a distance the sound of a kettle-drum, which, seeming to appear nearer, intimated that a body of horse were upon their march toward the scene of the fray."

"It must be Claverhouse with the rest of his regiment. What can have occasioned this night-march? If you go on, you fall into their hands; if you return, you expose me to instant death;—but the condition of the law should satisfy you, you must seek shelter, without the least delay."

Burley, who had awaited his resolution with great composure, now followed him in silence.

The house of Minnisold, built by the father of the present proprietor, was a decaying mansion, with a low and the size of the estate, but, since the accession of its owner, it had been suffered to go entirely to the disrepair. At some little distance from the house stood the court of offices. Here Morton paused.

"I must hare you here for a little while," he whispered, "until I can provide a bed for you.

"Care not what I shall say to you, said Burley; for thirty years this head has rested often on the left or on the next gray stone, than upon another half-a-dozen. A draught of ale, a moat, a stroll in prayers, and a few worm-eaten dry hay, were as good as a painted chamber and a prince's bed."

It occurred to Morton at the same moment the attempt to introduce the fugitive within the house would make it more easy to detect the danger of desertion. Accordingly, having struck a light with an Implement left in the stable for that purpose, and having lighted up their horses, he assigned Burley, for the purpose, a wooden bed, placed in a loft half-full of which an out-door domestic had occupied the loft dismissed by his uncle in one of those fits of folly which became more rigid from day to day. In this untenanted loft Morton left his companion, a caution so to shade his light that no reflection might be seen from the window, and a young man who might be able to procure at that lat-hour. This, indeed, was a subject on which he felt he had no confidence, for the power of obtaining even the least degree of ordinary personal assistance from the people in which he might happen to find his most sole confidence, the old housekeeper. If she chose to be a-bed, which was very likely, or which was as likely as was possible, Morton well knew the caution of being least problematical.

Curing in his heart the solemn purpose to pervade every part of his uncle's estate, for which he was to be accustomed to seek admittance, an accident had detained him abroad beyond the hour of establishment. The wood was a sort of hesitating too, which was an acknowledgment of transit, none as if in no sound, and seemed rather to solicit than repel it. He had been raging again, the moonlight was a dream as she rose from the chimney corner in the hour. He was again, wrapping her checkered handkerchief round her to secure her from the cold air, and the stage of her passage, and the enigmatic sound by which she fell. "Who's there at this time of night?" more than once before she asked. "Who's bolts and bars, and cautiously opened the door. "This is a fine time of night," Mr. Hector replied. "We are not in the habit of letting our favourite domestic—"baw t' love o' night, to disturbance of friend in, and yet to folk out their beds waiting for you. You're been in his place to put your hands on the rheumatism, and he's to bed too, I have to sit up by myself, for as a servant has a rest.

Here she couched once or twice, in frames of the pensive inconveniences which had often mentioned to his son, and always with an expression of deep regret, that he had never, in any manner, been enabled to repay the assistance, which, on one occasion, he had received from Burley.

OLD MORTALITY.

17

"Much obliged to you, Alison, and many kind thanks."

"I wish," said Miss Wilson, "I wish I had not wasted so much blood than brandy. See, gude-night to ye, Mr. Henry, and see that ye tak gude care o' the candle."

Morton deigned no answer to this appeal to his care, and requested her not to be alarmed if she heard the door opened, as she knew he must again, as usual, look to his horse, and arrange him for the night. Mr. Henry then re-entered the room, folding up his provisions, was about to hasten to his guest, when the nodding head of the old housekeeper was again thrust in at the door, with an admonition, to remember to take an account of his ways before he laid himself down to rest, and to pray for protection during the hours of darkness.

Such were the manners of a certain class of domestics, of whom there were many in Scotland, not to be found in some old manor-houses in its remote counties. They were fixtures in the family they belonged to; and as they never conceived the possibility of such a thing as dismissal to be within the chance of their lives, they were, of course, sincerely attached to every member of it. On the other hand, when spoiled by the indulgence or indifference of their superiors, they were very apt to become ill-tempered, self-sufficient, and tyrannical; so much so, that a mistress or master would sometimes almost have wished to exchange their cross-grained fidelity for the smooth and accommodating duplicity of a modern menial.

CHAPTER VI.

Yea, this man's brow, like to a tragic leaf,
Foretells the nature of a tragic volume.

SHAKESPEARE

Being at length rid of the housekeeper, Morton made a collection of what he had reserved from the provisions set before him, and prepared to convey them to his concealed guest. He did not think it necessary to assume any light being, or to accost every turn of the road; and it was lucky he did not do so, for he had hardly stepped beyond the threshold ere a heavy tramping of horses announced, that the heart of cavalry, whose kettle-drums they had had before heard, were in the act of passing along the high-road which winds round the fort of the bank on which the house of Milwood was placed.

He heard the commanding officer distinctly give the word halt. A pause of silence followed, interrupted only by the occasional neighing or pawing of an impatient charger.

"Whose is this?" said a voice, in a tone of authority and command.

"Milwood, if it like your honour," was the reply. "Is the owner well affected?" said the inquirer.

"He complains of the government, and frequent an indulged minister," was the response.

"Hum! ay! induced? a mere mark for treason, very implausibly allowed to those who are too great friends to those whose horses do not better send up a party and search the house, in case some of the bloody villains concerned in this heathenish hatchery may be concealed in it?"

Ere Morton could recover from the alarm into which this proposal had thrown him, a third speaker rejoined, "I cannot think it at all necessary; Milwood is an infirm, hypochondriac old man, who never meddles with politics and discharges his money-lagging bonds better than any thing else in the world. His nephew, I hear, was at the wappenshaw to-day, and gained the popinjay, which does not look like a fanatic. I should think they are quite bold to ride along since, and an alarm at this time of night might kill the poor old man."

* A masque-like retainer of this kind, having offended his master extremely, was commanded to leave his service instantly. "In troth and that will I not," answered the domestic. "If your honour dines kirk when ye have a guile servant, I ken when I have a guile master. If I say I will not, I will not."

* Regimental music is never played at night. But who can ensure that we are not cut off before the sound of the last note is heard? Till I am well informed on this point, the kettle-drums shall clash on, as adding something to the picturesque effect of the night march.
"Well," rejoined the leader, "if that be so, to search the house would be lost time, of which we have no too much. Gentlemen of the Life-Guards, forward—March!"

A few notes on the trumpet, mingled with the occasional boom of the kettle-drums, to mark the cadence of the step—clank! clank! clank! and the clash of arms—announced that the troop had resumed its march. The moon broke out as the leading files of the column attained a hill up which the road winded, and the flaming trappings and glittering of the steel caps; and the dark figures of the horses and riders might be imperfectly traced through the gloom. They continued to advance up the hill, and swept over the tops of the surrounding hedges, as intimated a considerable numerical force.

When the last of them had disappeared, young Morton resumed his purpose of visiting his guest. Upon entering the place of refuge, he found him seated on his humble couch with a pocket Bible open in his hand, which he seemed to study with intense meditation. His broadsword, which he had unsheathed in the first alarm at the arrival of the drogones, lay naked across his knees, and the little tapper that stood beside him upon the old chest, which served the purpose of a table, threw a partial and imperfect light upon the harsh features of his face, in which forsythia was rendered more solemn and dignified by a wild cast of tragic enthusiasm. His brow was that of one in whom some strong overmastering principle had taken root. His large, purple-tinged eyes, and the swell of a high spring-tide, when the usual cliffs and breakers vanish from the eye, and their existence is only indicated by the chafing foam of the waves that burn and whorl over them. To round his head, after Morton had contemplated him for about a minute.

"I perceive," said Morton, looking at his sword, "I was to hear the horses ride by; their passage delayed me for some minutes."

"I scarcely heard them," said Balfour; "my hour is not yet come. That shall one day fall into their hands, and be honourably associated with the names of them who have slaughtered, I am full well aware. And I would young man, that the hour were come; it should be as welcome to me as ever wedding to bridegroom. But if my Master has more work for me on earth, I must not do his labour grudgingly.

"Eat and refresh yourself," said Morton; "to-morrow your safety requires you should leave this place, in which they may find for aught I know, you may see to distinguish the track through the morasses."

"Young man," returned Balfour, "you are already weary of me, and would be yet more so, perchance, did you look upon which I have been interred. And I wonder not that it should be so, for there are times when I am weary of myself. Think you not it is a sore trial for flesh and blood, to be called upon to execute the righteous judgments of heaven while we are yet in the body, and continue to retain that blinded sense and sympathy for carnal suffering, which makes our own flesh thrill when we strike a lash upon the body of another? And think you, that when some prime tyrant has been removed from his place, that the instruments of his punishment can at times look back on their share in his downfall with firm and unshaken satisfactions? I cannot say they sometimes even question the truth of that inspiration which they felt and acted under. Must they not sometimes doubt the origin of that strong impulse with which their prayers for heavenly direction under difficulties have been inwardly answered and confirmed, and confuse, in their disturbed apprehensions, the results of truth itself with some vague shadow of the enigma?"

"These are subjects, Mr. Balfour, on which I am ill qualified to converse with you," answered Morton; "but the source of all inspiration which seemed to dictate a line of conduct contrary to those feelings of natural humanity, which Heaven has assigned to us as the general law of our species..."

Balfour seemed somewhat disturbed, and drew himself hastily up but immediately composed himself, and answered coolly, "It is natural you should think so; you are yet in the dungeon-house of the law, a much darker trial, though to which, as you say, even the dungeon of Malacca is the son of Hume-leech, where there was no water but mire. Yet is the seal of the covenant upon your forehead, and the son of man be an ensign to the nations. Where a flag was spread on the mountains, shall not be utterly lost, as one of the children of darkness. They say, that in this day of bitterness and calamity, nothing is required of our hands but to keep the moral law as far as our carnal frailty will permit? Think ye our counsels must be only over our corrupt and evil affections and passions? No; we are called upon, when we have gained our lawful claims, to consider them; and when we have drawn the sword, we are enjoined to smite the ungodly, though lie be our neighbour, and the man of power and cruelty, though he were of our own kindred, and the friend of our own bosom."

"These are the sentiments," said Morton, "that your enemies impute to you, and which, I think, it does not vitiate, the cruel measures which the council have directed against you. They affirm, that you pretend to derive your rule of action from what you call an inward light, rejecting the restraints of legal magistracy, of national law, and even of common human reason, in opposition to what you call the spirit within you."

"They do us wrong," answered the Covenant. "It is they perjured as they are, who have rejected all law, both of God and man. Why would they not come and ask us for adherence to the Solemn League and Covenant between God and the kingdom of Scotland, to which all of them, save a few popish malignants, have sworn to adhere?..."

When this Charles Stewart returned to these kingdoms, did the malignants bring him back? They had had a strong hand and a strong hand in the cause. Could James Graham of Montrosse, and his Highland caterans, have put him again in the place of his father? I think their heads on the Westport told another tale for many a long day. It was the workers of the glorious work—the reformers of the beauty of the tabernacle, that called him again to the high place from which his father fell. And what has been our reward? In the words of the prophet, 'We looked for peace, but no good came; and for a time of health, and beheld trouble. The snorting of his horses was heard from Dan; the whole land trembled at the sound of his chariots. His arrows were sharp, and his bow was mighty for strength; for they are come, and have devoured the land and all that is in it.'

"Mr. Balfour," answered Morton, "I neither undertake to suppose nor to refuse your complaints against the government. I have endeavoured to repay a debt due to the comrade of my father, by giving you shelter in your distress, but you will excuse me from engaging myself either in your cause or in conversation. I will leave you to repose, and heartily wish it were in my power to render your condition more comfortable."

"But I shall see you, I trust, in the morning, ere I depart?—I am not a man whose bowels yearn after kindred and friends of this world. When I put my hand to the plough, I entered into a covenant with the Lord, and my soul was set upon the things which I had left behind me. Yet the son of mine ancient comrade is to me as mine own, and I cannot behold him without the deep and firm belief, that I shall one day see him gird on his sword in the dear and precious cause for which his father fought and bled."

With a promise on Morton's part that he would call the refugee when it was time for him to pursue his journey, they parted for the night.

Morton retired to a few hours' rest; but his imagination, when, by the evening of the day, did not permit him to enjoy the sound repose. The same blended vision of horror before him, in which his new friend seemed to be a principal actor. The fair form of Elenor also mingled in his dream, weeping, and with dishevelled hair, and appearing to call on him for comfort and assistance, which he had not in his power to render. He awoke from these unrefreshing slumber with a feverish impulse, and in a moment was out of the chamber. There "was already a tinge of dazzling lustre on the verge of the distant hills, and the dawn was abroad in all the freshness of a summer morning."

"Which is but a trifle," replied Burley, "you are desirous to serve both God and Mammon—to be one day prosating the truth with your lips, and the next day in arms, at the command of carnal and tyrannic authority, to shed the blood of those for whose truth you have forsaken all. Therefore, I must ask you, 'to touch pitch and remain undefiled? to mix in the ranks of malignants, papists, papal-prolifics, intu- diminators, and scoffers; to partake of their sports, intercourse, perchance, with their daughters, as the sons of God with the daughters of men in the world before the flood—Think you, I say, to do all these things, and have no sin?"" Morto answered, "No, young man, I have sinned; I have sinned. I am an atrocious liar, and have sinned against Heaven, and against thee, and against God." And the Lord said unto you, that all communication with the enemies of the Church is the accursed thing which God hateth! Touch not—taste not—handle not! And grievous in the sight of God is sin."

Hablot was still asleep. A ray of light streamed on his uncurtained couch, and showed to Morton the working of his harsh features, which seemed agitated by some strong internal cause of disturbance. He had not undressed. Both his arms were above the bed-cover, the right hand strongly clenched, and occasionally making that abortive attempt to strike which usually attends dreams of violence; the left, was extended, and agitated, from time to time, by a movement as if repulsing some one. The perspiration stood on his brow, and made the late distemper stream, and these marks of emotion were accompanied with broken words which escaped from him at intervals—"Thou art taken, Judas—thou art taken—Cling to me—listen to me!" And—"A priest?—Ay, a priest of Baal, to be bound and slain, even at the brook Kishon. Fire-arms will not prevail against him—Strike—thrust with the cold iron—do not cut his head off him out of pain, were it but for the sake of his gray hairs!"

Much alarmed at the import of these expressions, which seemed to burst from him even in sleep with the current and general representation of some act of violence, Morton shook his guest by the shoulder in order to awake him. The first words he uttered were, "Bear me where ye will, I will avouch the deed!"

His glance around having then fully awakened him, he at once assumed the stern and gloomy composure of his ordinary manner, and throwing himself on his knees, before speaking to Morton, poured forth an ejaculatory prayer for the suffering Church of Scotland, entitling that the blood of her murdered saints and martyrs might be precious in the sight of Heaven, and that the shield of the Almighty might be spread over the scattered remnant, who, for His name's sake, were sufferers in the wilderness. Vengeance—speedy, and ample vengeance on the heads of these wicked apostates—of his devotions, which he expressed aloud in strong and emphatic language, rendered more impressive by the Orientalism of Scripture.

When he had finished his prayer he arose, and, taking Morton by the arm, they descended together to the stable, where the Wanderer (to give Burley a title which was often conferred on his sect) began to make his horse ready to pursue his journey. When the animal was saddled and bridled, Burley requested Morton to walk with him a gun-shot into the wood, and direct him to the right road for gaining the moors. Morton readily complied, and they walked for some time in silence under the shade of some fine old trees, pursuing a sort of natural path, which, after passing through a land of smart heath and moss, led into the bare and wild country which extends to the foot of the hills.

There was little conversation between them until, at a certain moment, Morton asked Burley, "Whither had he spent over-night his late fruit in his mind?"

Morton answered, "That he remained of the same opinion as he had been the day before, and that it was but a trifle, no sin, in one respect, surely. I can change my abode—my father's sword is mine, and Europe lies open before me, as it lay before him. But I am not of those who have filled it with the fame of their exploits. Perhaps some lucky chance may raise me to a rank with our Rutvines, our Leksays, our Morroses, the chosen leaders of our nation. Was it not, indeed, that Adolphus, or, if not, a soldier's life or a soldier's grave."

When he had formed this determination, he found himself near the end of his life, and resolved to lose no time in making him acquainted with it.
"Another glance of Edith's eye, another walk by Edith's side, and my resolution would melt away. I will take an irrevocable step, therefore, and then see her."

In this mood he entered the wainscotted parlour, in which his uncle was already placed at his morning's refreshment, a huge plate of oatmeal porridge, with a copper kettle of brown butter beside it. His favourite housekeeper was in attendance, half standing, half resting on the back of a chair, in a posture between freedom and respect. The old gentleman had been reading, for his little distance of sight was an advantage for which he now lost by stooping to such a degree, that at a meeting, where there was some dispute concerning the sort of arch which should be thrown over a certain porch, the housekeeper thought it necessary to propose that Milwood should be from the head, and the young man, for such a wild-goose chase? Not I am sure. I can hardly support you at home. I say you were marrying, I say warrant, as your father's afore ye, too, and sending your uncle's name to means to be fighting and skirling through the law in my days, and to take wing and flee all yourself, whenever they were asked to serve a writ about the same?"

"I have no thoughts of ever marrying," answered Harry.

"Hear till him now!" said the housekeeper. 'Tis a shame to hear a dose young lad speak in that way, since 'a the world knows that they mean either more or less harm."

"Haul your peace, Alison," said his master; "as you, Harry?" (he added more mildly,) "put the sense out of your head--this comes of letting your a-sodginger for a day--mend ye have nae skill, till ye are ane nonsense plan."

"I beg your pardon, sir, my wants be very great, and would you please to give me the gold chain, with the Mangrave gave to my father after the battle of Lutter?"

"Merce! powers!" exclaimed the governor. "My master wants every Sunday," replied the housekeeper, both astounded at the audacity of its proposal.

"I will keep a few links," continued the young man, "to remind me of him by whom it was won, and the place where he won it," continued Morton; "the rest shall furnish me the means of following the same career in which my father obtained that and that of distinction."

"Your master wants every Sunday," replied the housekeeper, both astonished at the audacity of its proposal.

"I will keep a few links," continued the young man, "to remind me of him by whom it was won, and the place where he won it," continued Morton; "the rest shall furnish me the means of following the same career in which my father obtained that and that of distinction."

"That is more than I want, sir; if you choose to give me the third part of the money, and five links of the chain, it will amply serve my purpose, and the rest will be some atonement for the expense and trouble I have put you to.""The lady's in a creel!" exclaimed his uncle. "O, sir, what will become of the ropes of Milwood when I am dead and gone! He would fix the crowns of the papists a' with it, if he had it!"

"Hout, sir," said the old housekeeper, "I must even say it's partly your own fault. Ye maunna cut his head over sarther; and, to be a' honest, he has given me to the Howl, ye maun just pay the lawing."

"It if be not abune twa dollars, Alison," said the old gentleman, very reluctantly.

"I'll see," said the housekeeper, "I'll make it ye. T' will be th' first time the fine gang down to the clachan," said Alison, "than your honour or Mr. Harry can do;" and whispered to Henry. "Dinna vex him any more, since he has give it to the Howl, ye maun just pay the lawing."

old mortality.

"And then we’ll have the dragoons on us," said Mildwood, "for comforting and entertaining interlocutors it is a fine thing to have as much in hand.
But take your breakfast, Harry, and then lay by your new green coat, and put on your Raploch gray; it’s a magnificent and thirsty dress, and a most becoming piece of habit for the distinguished character of Morton the left." the monster, perceiving plainly that he had at present no chance of gaining his purpose, and, perhaps, not altogether displeased at the obstacles which secured him, followed the monster round the neighbourhood of Tulleitlen. The housekeeper followed him into the next room, putting him on the back, and bidding him be a guard borne, and sit by his braw things open.

"And I’ll loop down your hat, and lay by the band and riband," said the officious dame; "and ye maun never, at no hand, speak o’ leaving the land, or of selling the grand chain, for your uncle has an unco ton, that he shook the old damsel cordially by the hand, advice, which he intended to follow; and before he proceeded to act upon his former resolution.

CHAPTER VII.

From seventeen years till now, almost fourscore,
Here lived I, but now live here no more.
At seventeen was many their fortunes seek.
And at fourscore is too late a work.

As You Like It.

We must conduct our readers to the Tower of Tilletteum, and to the Mausoleum. Miss Bellenden had returned, in romantic phrase, melancholy and full of heaviness, at the unexpected, and, as she deemed it, indelible affront, which had been brought upon her dignity by the public miscarriage of Goose Gibbie.
That unfortunate man-at-arms was forthwith commanded to drive his feathered charge to the most remote parts of the common moor, and on no account to be allowed the slightest hint of the sentiment of his lady, by appearing in her presence while the sense of the affront was yet recent.

The next proceeding of Lady Margaret was to hold a sanguinary banquet, and the butler were admitted, partly on the footing of wit-esses, partly as assessors, to inquire into the recuscency of Cuddie Hindreg the ploughman, and the abnormality which he had received from his mother, those being regarded as the original causes of the disaster which had befallen the chivalry of Tulleitlen. The charge being fully made out and substantiated, Lady Margaret resolved to reprimand the culpits in person, and, if she found them impudent, to extend the censure into a sentence of expulsion from the barony. Miss Bellenden alone ventured to say anything in behalf of the accused, but her countenance did not profit them as it might have done on any other occasion. For so soon as Edith had heard it ascertainment that the unfortunate cavalier had not suffered his condition with irresistible determination to laugh which, in spite of Lady Margaret’s indignation, or rather irritated, as usual, by restraint, had broken out repeatedly on her return homeward, until her grandmother, in no shape impeded upon her, having been made of more tolerance by the kind and for her ill-humor, her illness. Miss Bellenden’s tes-cion, and it was upon this occasion, little or no chance to be listened to.

As if to evince the rigour of her disposition, Lady Margaret, on this solemn occasion, exchanged the innumerable words with which she commonly walked for an immense gold-headed staff which had belonged to her father, the deceased Earl of Torwood, and which like a sort of nace of office, she only made use of on such occasions as this when accompanied by this awful baton of command. Lady Marzaret Bellenden entered the cottage of the debilicon.

There was an air of consciousness about old Mause, as she rose to meet the visitor; this was her second look, not with the cordial alacrity of visage which used, on other occasions, to express the honour she felt in the visit of her lady, but with a certain solemnity and embarrassment, and cushioned art, by the presence of her judge, before whom he is, nevertheless, determined to assert his innocence.
Her arms were folded, her mouth pressed into an expression of grief; but the furies with which her mind apparently bent up to the solemn interview.
With her best cuttery to the round, and a mute motion of reverence, Mause pointed to the chair, which, on former occasions, Lady Margaret (for the good lady was somewhat of a gossip) had designed to occupy for half an hour sometimes at a time, hearing the news of the country and of the borough. But at present her mootness was too far indignant for such condescension.
She rejected the mute invitation with a haughty wave of her hand, and drawing herself up as she spoke, she uttered the following interrogatory in a tone calculated to throw over the whole interview in the air:

"Is it true, Mause, as I am informed by Harriann, Gudyll, and others of my people, that you have taken it upon you, contrary to the faith you owe to God and the king, and to your natural allegiance, to compell, keep back your son the wappen-clawb, held by the order of the sheriff, and to return his arm-mund and abutiments at a moment when it was impossible to find a suitable substitute in his stead, which by the barony of Tulleitlen, birth in the person of his mistress and indwellers, has incurred such a disgrace and dishonor as heretofore the family since the days of Malcolm and Colin?"

Mause’s habitual respect for her mistress was exreme; she hesitated, and one or two short coughs crossed the difficulty she had in defending herself.

"I am sure—my lady—hem!—I am sure I am sorry—very sorry that any cause of displeasure should have occurred—but my son’s illness—"

"Dinn a tell me of your son’s illness, Mause! Had he been sincerely unwell, ye would have been at the Tower by daylight to get something that would do him good; there are few ailments that I haven’t medical recourses for, and that ye ken full well."

"O aye, aye, aye; I am sure ye hae wrought wonteful cures; the last thing ye sent Cuddie, when he had the yill, e’en wrought like a charm."

"Why, then, woman, ye have not applied to me, if there was anything of the kind?—but there was none, ye furze-hearted vasal that ye are!"

"Your lordship never cd me sic a word at that before. O no! that I should live, as I said, she, continued, bursting into tears, "and me a born serv-out o’ the house o’ Tulleitlen! I am sure they belie beath Cuddie and me, and I say, if they said he wad fight over the boots in haste for your lordship and Miss Edith, and the said neither—my said he, and I would rather see him buried beneath it, than he e’die way—but thir ridings and wapping-cawings, my lady, I hae nae bro o’ them ava. I can find nae warrant for them what’s o’er."

"Nae warrant for them?" cried the high-born dame. "Do ye na ken, woman, that ye are bound to be here weekly in the hunting, horse-riding, and sailing, when lawfully summoned thereto in my name? Your service is not gratuitous. I, in any tain land for it—Ye’re kindly tenants; hae a other house, a kail-yard, a cow, a horse”—the empen-mon. For see, I am a born servant and not a grudge ye your son salt gee me a day’s service in the field?"

"Na, my lord—na, my lordy, it’s na that," exclaimed Mause, greatly embarrassed, "but a manna can serve twa masters, and if the truth maun e’er come out, there’s Ane abuse whane commands I maun obey before your lordship’s. I am sure I would put neither kind on nor kine, nor orry earthly creature’s, afore them."

56
"How mean ye by that, ye said full woman?—D'ye think that I order any thing against conscience?"

"In regard to your lordship's conscience, which has been brought up, as it were, with predestination; but ilk a man walk by the light of their air; and mine," said Miss Edith, "is not a thing to be hazarded. Indeed, it is a matter of fact, that I am convinced, that tells me that I need leave a—cot, kale-yard, and cow's grass—and suffer a, rather than that I or mine should put on harness in an unlawful cause."

"Ay, my lady, nae doubt; but no to displeasure your lordship, ye'll mind that there was once a king in Scripture they ca'd Nebuchadnezzar, and he set up a golden image in the plain o' Dura, as it might be in the haugh yonder by the water-side, where the army were warned to meet yesterday; and the princess, and the governour, and the captains, and the judges themsells, forbry the treasures, the councillors, and the sheriffs, were warned to the dedication thereof, and commanded to fall down and worship at the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of music."

"And what o' a' this, ye fule wife? Or what had Nebuchadnezzer to do with the wappen-seach of the United States?"

"Only just thus far, my lord," continued Mause, "that precept is like the great golden image in the plain of Dura, and that as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego were not out in refusing to bow down to worship, so neither shall Cuddy Headriggs, your lordship's poor ploughman, at least wi' his auld mither's consent, make murgons or Jenny-factions, as they ca' them, in the house of the pliedets and curates, nor gird him wi' armour to fight in their cause, either at the sound of kettle-drums, organs, bag-pipes, or any other kind of music whatever."

Lady M'Garg and I heard this exposition of Scripture with the greatest possible indignation, as well as surprise.

"I see what way the wind blows," she exclaimed, after a pause of astonishment; "the evil spirit of the year sixteen hundred and forty-two is at work again as merrily as ever, and ilk auld wife in the chimney-nack will be for knitting doctrine wi' doctors o' divinity and fashions o' the day."

"Your lordship means the bishops and curates, I'm sure they have been but stepfathers to the Kirk o' Scotland. And, since your lordship is pleased to apply to me, I'll pass on to a subject that is more in my mind another article. Your lordship and the steward have been pleased to propose that my son Cuddie said work in the barn wi' a new-fangled machine called the corn-doff or the chaff off. This is impiously thwarting the will of Divine Providence, by raising wind for your lordship's ain particular use by human art, instead of soliciting it by prayer, or waiting patiently for whatever dispensation of wind Providence was pleased to send upon the shielingshill. Now, my lady?"

The woman would drive any reasonable being daft, said Lady M'Garg; then resuming her tone of authority and indifference, she concluded, "Weel, Mause, I'll just end where I sud hae begun—we're ower learned and ower godly for me to dispute wi' ye. But I'll mention one matter that is a bitter muster when he's lawfully warned by the ground officer, or the sooner he and you fit and quaff my bounds the better: there's nae scarcity o' auld wives o' this sort here again; and in that way, the rigs o' Tillicoultry barn casing but windlass and sandy lavvocks than that they were pleasing to the king."

"Aweel, my lady," said Mause, "I was born here, and thought to die where my father dide; and probably something similar to the barn-farmers now used for livestock is what your lordship has in mind used in their present shape until about 1750. They were objected to by the men who plowed the land, upon such reasoning as that of bases, Mause in the text.

Chap. VIII.

"Weel, mither," said Cuddie, interrupting her, "where do you think we are going? I have been dune whate'er ye bade me, and gae to kirk whare'er ye likt on the Sundays, and fended weel for ye in the ilk days besides. And that's what vexes me when I sing, and I am keen for ye now in these brisk times. I am no sure if I can plough any place but the Mains and Mucklewhame, at least I never trysted any other grund, and it wadna come natural to me. And nae neighbouring teirlers will daur to take us, after being turned aff beas bounds for non-territorial."

"Non-conformity, hinnie," sighed Mause, "is the anathema of the age; and it would be a blessing if we could all be the same."

"Weel, weel, we'll hae to gang to a far country, maybe twa or fifteen miles aff. I could be a draught, nae doubt, for I can ride and play wi' the roadwad a bit, but ye wad be warning about your pleasing and your gray hairs." (Here Mause's exclamations became extreme.) "Weel, weel, I but spoke o' besides; ye're ower auld to be sitting rocked up on a bazine-wagon w' Eppie Dumbkane, the corporal's wife. Stay, what's come to your o' mine? I canna see—doubt I'll hae to tak the hills wi' the wild whigs, as they ca' them, and then it will be my lot to be at the back o' the pack, at some dikendie, or to be sent to heaven wi' a Saint Johnstone's tipit about your house."

"O, my bonnie Cudie," said the zealous Mause, "although ye be a weel prepared, and ye wadna say ye were auld, but that ye have a bit of reading, and been reading, and whilst it is a musing o' Providence—I have not seen the son of the righteous beggin his bread, sae says the text; and your father was a doud honest man, and thou, sae worldily in his dealings, and cumbered about earthly things, even as yourself, my jo!"

"Aweel," said Cuddie, after a little consideration, "I am to come away and get coal to be blown at, mither. Howsoever, mither, ye ha'e some guests o' a wee bit kindness that are miss Edith and young Mr. Henry Morton, that auld be, ca' ye yourself, and I have a bit of a book, or maybe a bit letter, quietely atween them, and made believe never to ken what it cam from, though I kent brawly. There's whiles convenience in a body looking a wee stupid—and I have aften seen them walking at e'en on the little path by Dinglewoodburn; but nahemoer ever kent a word about it frae Cuddie; I ken I'm gay thick in the head, but I'm as honest as our auld fine fox, and fellow, that I'll ne'er work on mair—I hope they'll be as kind to him that come a bit understand me as I have been. But, as I was saying, we'll awa down to Milnwood and tell Mr. Harry our distress. They want a body to help them, and the grund's no unlike our ain—I am sure Mr. Harry will stand my part, for he's a kind-hearted gentleman. I'll get but little penny-foe, for his uncle, and I'll gie a bit to the auld man himself. But we'll awa win a bit of bread, and a dreap, a kail, and a side, and theekin ower our heads, and that's we'll want for a season. I'll get up, mither, and sort your things to gang away; for since I see it is that gang we maun, I wad like ill to wait till Mr. Harrison andauld Gudjil cam to put us out by the tug and the horn."

Chapter VIII

The devil a partisan, or any thing else he is, but a time-server.

Twa' nights after.

It was evening when Mr. Henry Morton perceived an old woman, with a cap on her head, clad in a discoloured, storm-stopped, looking fellow, in hoddie-gray, approach the house of Milnwood. Old Mause made her curtsey, but Cuddie took the lead in addressed for her. She not only was previously acquainted with her mother, but that he was to manage matters his own way; for though he readily allowed her general inferiority of understanding, and filially submitted to his authority on most occasions, yet he said, "For getting a service, or getting forward in the world, he could somenacet the wee pickle some he had gang muckle farther han hers, though she could crack like any minister o' them a'."

Accordingly, he thus opened the conversation with young Morton:

"A braw night this for the rye, your honour; the street park wi' the haggarin' by this een."

"I do not doubt it, Cuddie; but I've heard that you have brought your mother—this is your mother, is it not?" (Cuddie nodded.) What can have brought your mother and you down the water so late?"

"Troth, sir, just what gars the maidwives trust, trust, sir—I'm seeking for service, sir."

"For service, Cudde, and at this time of the year! how comes this to be, sir?"

Mause could forbear no longer. Proud alike of her cause and her sufferings, she commenced with an affected humility of tone, "It has pleased Heaven, an it like your honour, to distinguish us by a visitation—"

"Deil's in the wife and nae guide!" whispered Cudie to his mother, "an ye come out wi' your whiggery they'll nae daur open a door to us through the hault country!" Then aloud and addressing Morton, "My mother's auld, sir, and she has rather forgotten herself in speaking to my leddy, that canna weel bide to be contradicted, though they (like my brothers) could help themselves,) especially by her ain folk.—And Mr. Harrison the steward, and Gudjil the butler, they're no very fond o' us, and it's ill sitting at Rome and sitting in Edinburgh, to say it. Before I fell to work, and before I fell to work, and before I fell to work—here's a wee bit line to your honour frie a friend will maybe say some mair about it."

Morton took the billet, and crimsoning up to the ears, between joy and surprise, read these words: "If you can serve these poor helpless people, you will oblige E. B."

It was a few instants before he could contain composition enough to ask, "And what is your object, Cudie? and how can I be of use to you?"

"Work, stir, wark, and a service, is my object—a bit held for my mother and myself—we have gude plooshing o' our ain, if we had the cast o' a cart to bring it down—and milk and meal, and greens, swete, for I'm gay gleg at meal-time, and sae is my mother, lang may it be sae, and for the penny-foe and a' that I'll just leave it to the laird and you. I ken ye'll no see a poor lad wranged, if ye can help it."

Morton shook his head. "For the meat and lodging, Cudie, I think I can procure something; but the penny-foe will be a hard chapter, I doubt.""

"I'll tak my chance o' stir," replied the candidate for service, "rather than gang down about Hamilton, or any such far place of everlasting.""

"Well; step into the kitchen, Cudie, and I'll do what I can for you."

The negotiation was not without difficulties. Morton had first to talk over the housekeeper, who made a thousand objections, as usual, in order to have the pleasure of being besought and entreated; but when she was gained over, it was comparatively easy to induce old Milnwood to accept of a servant, whose wages were to be in his own option. An outhouse was therefore assigned to Mause and her son for their habitation, and it was settled that they were to be admitted to eat of the frugal fare provided for the family, until their own establishment should be completed. As for Morton, he exhausted his own very slender stock of money in order to make Cuddy and his family a present, under the name of aid, as it might show his sense of the value of the recommendation delivered to him."

"And now I must be called since mair," said Cuddie to his mother, "and if we're no see big and comfortable as we were up yonder, yet life's life ony gate, and we're we'd decent kirk-gangling folk o' your own persuasion, mither; there will be nuse quarrelling about that."

"Of my persuasion, hinnie!" said the too-enlightened Mause; "was't for thy blindness and theirs."

O, Cudie, the poor things, and I'll say it, will ne'er win farther ben, I doubt; they are but little better than the prettiest themselves. They wait on the ministry of that blinded man, Peter Veresson.

After

Although I was on the other side of the wall and much taken up with other business, I had been up, of her son Cudde. Maude, thither, to turn him further on the topic, nor altogether neglect the warning he had given me. She knew the disposition of these scribes of philanthrope, whose conduct often causes them to be reproved, with fits of obscurity, which neither remonstrance, flattery, nor threats, were capable of overpowering. Treading, therefore, at the very possibility of Cudde's fulfilling his threat, I put a guard over my mind, and I was, indeed, so surrounded by her presence, as an able and frustrating preacher, she had the good sense to suppress the contradiction which flattered upon her tongue, and to express her sentiments no otherwise than by deep groans, which the hearers gratuitously construed to flow from a vivid recollection of the more pathetically parts of his homilies. How long she could have preserved her feelings it is difficult to say. An unexpected acciden ter relieved her from the necessity.

The Laird of Milnwood kept up all old fashion which Cudde would have, therefore, still the custom in his house, as it had been universal in Scotland about fifty years before, that the domestics, after having placed the dinner on the table, sequestered themselves in the back parlor and parted off the share which was assigned to them, in company with their masters. On the day, therefore, after Cudde's arrival, being the third from the opening of this narrative, old Robin, who was butler, valet-de-cham-bray, footman, gardener, and what not, in the house of Milnwood, placed on the table an immense charger of broth, thickened with oatmeal and colewort, in which ocean of liquid was indiscernible, by close observers, two or three short ribs of lean mutton sailing to and fro. Two huge baskets, one of bread made of barley and pease, and one of oat-cakes, flanked this valley of broth, and on the other side, in like fashion, the feast was divided among the male servants, to each of whom a slice of kindness with which he should be received. Like a cousin, he first visited his own chef, a baronet in a determined nature, and the next day's fat, which he resolved to employ in the satisfaction of his guests, was furnished to the servants, who were said sometimes to have stipulated that they should not be required to eat a food so luxuriant and surfeiting in its quality above five days, before they could partake of it. The drink of the day was a very small beer of Milnwood's own brewing, was allowed to the company at discretion, as were the bannocks, cakes, and broth; but the mutton was received as a beverage, being the general order of the day. The visitor in vain announced his name and requested admissi

The custom of keeping the door of a house or castle locked during the time of dinner, probably arose from the custom of being aestively assembled in the hall at that meal, and table service. But in many instances continued to the present day, a custom of high etiquette, of which the following is an example.

A considerable landed proprietor in Dumfriesshire, was in the habit, without any communication, and without any check from his will, resolved previously to visit his two nearest kin-

To enjoy this exquisite cheer, was placed, at the head of the table, the old Laird himself, with his nephew on the one side, and the favourite house-ket, on the other. He was sate old Robin, a manger, half-starved serving-man, ordered cross and crispily by rhymati-

And a dirty mark of housekeeper, whom use had rendered callous to the daily extremities which her temper underwent at the hands of her master and Mrs. Wilson. A barmaid, a white-headed cowled box, with Cudde the new ploughman and his mother. This ploughman was a notable housekeeper, to the property resided in their own houses, happy at least in this, that if their cheer was not more delectable than that which we have described, they could eat their fill, unwatched by the sharp, envious gray eyes of Milnwood, which seemed to measure the quantity that each of his dependents swallowed, as closely as if their glasses attended each mouthful in its progress from the lips to the stomach. This close inspection was unfavourable to Cudde, who sustained much prejudice in his master's opinion, by the slight courtesy with which he caused the victuals to disappear. In the course of the repast, Cudde turned his eyes from the huge feasting to cast indignant glances upon his nephew, whose repugnance to rate labour was the principal cause of his needing a second ploughman, and the direct means of his hiring this very corpulent.

"Pay thee wages, quotha?" said Milnwood to himself. "Then will eat in a week the value of mar that he can't work for in a month!"

The significant pronunciations were interrupted by a loud knocking at the outer gate. It was a universal custom in Scotland, that, when the family was at dinner, the door of the house was kept shut, and if not, the door of the house itself, was always shut and locked, and only guests of importance, or persons upon urgent business, sought or received admittance at that time. The family of Milnwood were therefore surprised, and, in the unsettled state of the times, something alarmed, at the earnest and repeated knocking with which the door was now assailed. Mrs. Wilson ran in person to the door, and, having reconnoitred those who were so clamorous for admission, through some secret aperture with whom most Scottish door-ways were furnished for the exigent purpose, she passed her hands in great dismay, exclaiming, "The ro-

OLD MORTALITY.

"While the servants admitted the troopers, whose oaths and threats already indicated resentment at the delay they had been put to, Cuddie took the only opportunity to whisper to his mother, "Now, ye daft saddarine, mak yoursel deaft—ye hae made us a deaft oor now, and let me speek for ye. I wad like it ill if I hae to bide for an awfu' wife's claes, though ye be our mither."

"O, hanny, ah! Pse be silent or thot saill come to ill," was the ingenious whisper of Mause; "but be thinkin', my dear girl, thant the Word the Word will dey."—

Her admonition was cut short by the entrance of the foot-guard, a party of four troopers, commanded by Bothwell.

In they tramped, making a tremendous clatter upon the stone-floor with the iron-shod heels of their large jack-boots, while the clash and clatter of their heavy, basket-hilted broadswords. Milnwood and his housekeeper trembled, from well-grounded apprehensions of the system of extaction and plunder carried on during these domiciliary visits. Henry Morton was discomposed with more special cause, for he remembered that he stood answerable to the laws for having harboured Barly.

The widow Mause, Hebridean, betrayed a warm and fervent enthusiasm for the cause, which impressed her for consenting even tacitly to delve her religious sentiments, was in a strange quandary. The other servants quaked for their safety, and some as if for their lives. Cuddie, with a look of supreme indifferenc and stupidity which a Scotch peasant can at times assume as a mask for considerable shrewdness and craft, continued to swallow large mouthfuls of his broth, to command which he had drawn within his sphere the large vessel that contained it, and helped himself, amid the confusion, to a sevenfold portion.

"What, is your pleasure there, gentleman?" said Milnwood, humouring himself before the satellites of power.

"We come in behalf of the king," answered Bothwell; "why did you keep us so long standing at the door?"

"We were at dinner," answered Milnwood, "and the door was locked, as is usual in landward towns in this county. I am sure, gentlemen, if I had kend any servants of our guide king, had stood at the door—but wad ye please to drink some ale—or some brandy—or a cup of scanty sack, or claret wine?" making a graceful offer as long as a stumpy holder held at an auction, who is loath to advance his offer for a favourite lot.

"Claret for me," said one fellow. "I am rather after ale," said another. "provided it is right juice of John Barleycorn."

"Better never was melted," said Milnwood; "I can hardly say nay and nuckle for the claret. It's thin and cold andgetitem."

"Brandy will care that," said a third fellow; "a glass of claret to three glasses of wine prevents the curmudging in the stomach."

"Brandy, ale, sack, and claret? —we'll try them all," said Bothwell, "and stick to that which is best. There's good sense in that, if the dam'd thief in Scotland had it."

It certainly, put a reluctant quiver of his muscles, Milnwood lugged out two ponderous keys, and delivered them to the gentleman.

"The housekeeper," said Bothwell, taking a seat, and throwing himself upon it, "is rather young and so handsome as to tempt a man to follow her to the gauntlets, and devil a one here is there worth sending in her place. What's that I—ment? (searching with a fork among the broth, and fishing up a crust of mutton)—"I think I could eat a bit—why, it's as tough as if the devil's damn had hatched it."

If there is anything better in the house, sir, said Milnwood, alarmed at these symptoms of disapprobation.

"No, no," said Bothwell, "it's not worth while, I

The Scots retain the use of the word doun in its comprehen sive meaning of place, in the sense of town or village. A mansion or a farm house, though solitary, is called sae doun. A landward doun is a dwelling situated in the country.

TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

"Of the lands of Milwood—\(^1\) the bonny lands of Milwood—\(^2\) of which your uncle is said to have been in charge for two hundred years!" exclaimed his uncle; "they are barking and flexing, outfield and infield, haugh and hofe!"

"No, sir," said Henry, "you shall not suffer on your account.\(^2\) I own," he continued addressing Bothwell, "I did give this man a night's lodging, as to an old military courage of my father. But it was not without the use of my uncle's knowledge, but of Morton's express general orders. I trust, if my evidence is considered as good against myself, it will have some weight in proving my uncle's innocence."

"Come, you must be of a different sort, in some what may be called a smart enough, and I am sorry for you; and your uncle here is a fine old Trojan, kender, I see, to his guests than himself, for he gives us wine and drinks his own, thin alike tell me all you know about this Burley, what you parted from him, where he went, and where he is likely now to be found; and, d—n it, I'll work as hard on your share of the business as my duty will permit. There's a thousand marks on the murdering whigmore's head, an I could but light on it—Come, out with it—where did you part with him?"

"You will cause my answering that question, sir," said M'Callum, "but you have persuaded me to afford him hospitality at considerable risk to myself and my friends, would command me to respect his secret, if, indeed, he had trusted me with any"

"So you refuse to give me any answer?" said Bothwell.

"I have none to give," returned Henry.

"Perhaps I could teach you to find one, by tying a piece of lighted match between your fingers," answered Bothwell.

"O, for pity's sake, sir," said old Alison apart to her master, "see them siller—it's siller they're seeking—they'll murder Mr. Henry, and yourself next!"

"Milwood groaned in perplexity and bitterness of spirit, and, with a tone as if he was giving up the ghost, exclaimed, "Ha, punds twenty—punds would make up this unhappy matter!"

"My master," instanced Alison to the servant, "would give twenty punds on the spot;"" interrupted Milwood; "for the agony of his avarice overcame alike his puritanic precision and the habitual respect he entertained for his housekeeper".

"Punds forty," insisted the housekeeper, "if ye had the gudeness to look ower the lad's misconduct: he's that dour ye might tear him to pieces, and ye wad naer get a word o' him; and it wad do a little guide, I'm sure, to burn his bonny finger-ends."

"Why," said Bothwell, hesitating, "I don't know—most of my cloth would have the money, and take off the prisoner too; but I bear a conscience, and if your master will stand to your offer, and enter into a bond to produce his nephew, and if all in the house will take the test-oath, I do not know but—"" interrupted Mrs. Wilson, "any test, on this ye please?" And then aside to her master, "Haste ye away, sir, and get the siller, or they will burn the house about our lugs."

"Old Milwood cast a rueful look upon his adviser, and moved off, like a piece of Dutch clock-work, to set at liberty his imprisoned angels in this dire emergency. Meanwhile, Sergeant Bothwell began to put the test-oath with such a degree of solemn reverence as might have been expected, being just about the same which is used to this day in his majesty's custom-house."

"What's your name, woman?"

"Alison Wilson, sir."

"You, Alison Wilson, solemnly swear, certify, and declare, that you judge it unlawful for subjects, under pretence of suspicion, or any other pretence, to be whatsoever, to enter into Leagues and Convenants!"

Here the ceremony was interrupted by a strife between Cuddie and his mother, which, conduced to the proceedings, now became:

Minwood eagerly extended his hand.

"Only you know," said Bothwell, still playing with the purse, "that every landholder is answerable for the conformity and good behavior of his household, ad emancipated, by the very mention of the term, and the restraint of his own prudence, and Cuddie's

"Ah! what, good dame?" said the soldier.
"Here's whisp's miracle, epe! the old wife has got both her in defence of her young, this is the finest lan-"Gie ye some mair o' t?" said Mause, clearing her voice with a preliminary cough, "I will take up laddie; "there's the Philistines, as ye ca' them, are

What is meant, the sower had already heled, hastened to proffer to Bothwell, though with a smile, the purse, which he had been obliged to rummage out as ransom for his indifference, weighed it in his hand, chuckled it up for a trifle, and handed it to his nephew, who opened, and said, "There's many a merry night in this

"Are ye mad?" said his housekeeper, in a whisper: "tell them to keep it—they will keep it either by fair means or foul, and it's our only chance to make them quiet."

"I canna do it, Ailie—I canna do it," said Milnwood, with tears of his heart. "I canna part wi' the siller I hae counted sae often ower, to that blackguards."

"Then I maun do it myself, Milnwood," said the housekeeper, "or see a gang wrong together. My master, sir," she said, addressing Bothwell, "canna think o' taking back any thing at the hand of an honourable gentleman like you; he implores ye to put it away, and let the body die as it can, and be favourable in reporting our dispositions to government, and let us tak nae wrong for the dash speeches of an auld jade." (Here she turned fiercely upon Mause, to indulge herself for the effort which it cost her to assume a mild demeanour to the soldiers.) "A daud auld whig randy, that ne'er was in the house (toul fa' her) till yesterday afternoon, and that sell ne'er cross the door-stane again an anes I had her out o' it."

"Ay, ny," whispered Cuddie to his parent, "'en sae! I kend we wad be put to our travels again when they get but six times in a week, and then to an end. I was sure that wad be the upshot o' mither."

"Whishat, my bairn," said she, "and dinn murmur at the cross—cross their door-stane! weel I wot I'll not let that auld jade stand with me."

"The20/30 hall," said he, "wee o' their signal for a signal that the destroying angel should pass by. They'll get a back-'cast o' his hand, yet that think sae muckle o' the creature and sae little o' the creator—sae muckle o' world's gear and sae little o' a broken covenant—sae muckle about these pieces o' yellow buck, and sae little about the pure gold o' the Scripture—sae muckle about their ain friend and kinsman, and sae little about the elect, that are tried wi' hirings, harraising, huntings, searchings, chasings, catchings, imprisonments, torturings, banishments, harrassings, hardenings, hangings, and inquietings, and forby the hundreds forced from their ain habitations to the deserts, mountains, moors, mosaes, moss-flows, and peat-bas, there to hear the word like bread eaten in secret."

"She's at the Covenant now, sergeant, shall we not have her away?" said one of the soldiers.

"You be d—d!" said Bothwell, aside to him; "our master's better wise than long, as long as there is a respectable, sponsible, money-broking pe'er, like Mr. Morton of Milnwood, who has the means of attaining her trespasses? Let the old mother hae her brood, she's tough enough to be made any thing of herself—Here, cried, "one other round to Milnwood and his roof-tree, and to our next merry meeting with him—which I think will not be far distant, if he keeps such a fanatical family."

He then ordered the party to take their horses, and pressed the best in Milnwood's stable into the king's service to carry the prisoner. Mrs. Wilson, with weeping eyes, made up a small parcel of necessaries for Henry's compelled journey, and as she bustled about, took an opportunity, unseen by the party, to slip into his hand a small bag of money. Bothwell and his troopers, in other respects, kept their promise, and were civil. They did not bind their prisoner, but contended themselves with leading his horse between a file of men. They then mounted, and marched off with much mirth and laughter among themselves, leaving the Milnwood family in great confusion. The old Laird himself, overpowered by the low spirit his mind was in, and the smell of twenty pounds sterling, did nothing the whole evening but rock himself backwards and forwards in his great leathern easy-chair, repeating the same language. "Ruined on a's sides, ruined on a' sides—barried and undone—one and undone—body and gudes, body and gudes!"

Mrs. Alison Wilson's grief was partly indulged, and partly relieved by the torrent of invectives with which Bothwell abused Mause and Cuddie's expulsion from Milnwood.

"I'll luck be in the graining coorse o' thee! the prarest lad in Clyde-side this day maun be a sufferer and a' for you and your daft whigerry!"

"Gae wa'," replied Mause, "I trow ye are yet in the bonds of sin, and in the gall of iniquity, to grudge your bonniest and best in the cause of Him that gave ye a' ye hae—I promise I hae dune as muckle for Mr. Harry as I wad do for my ain; for if Cuddie was found worthy to bear testimony in the Grassmarket—"

"And there's gude hope o'!" said Alison, "unless you and he change your courses."

"And it," continued Mause, disregarding the interruption, "didn't we see what Mr. Grey and Mr. Ziphires were to seek to ensnare me with a profitor his remission upon sinful compliances, I wad persevere, notwithstanding my testimony against popery, prelacy, antinomianism, crassianism, lapserianism, sublapsarianism, and the sins and sufferings of the times—I wad cry as a woman in labour against the black Indulgence, that has been a stumbling-block to professors—I wad uplift my voice as a powerful preacher."

"Hout, tout, mither," cried Cuddie, interfering and dragging her off forcibly, "dinn ava the gentle woman wit' your testimony! ye hae preached enough already; ye hae showed ye hae heart enough o' the Law, and gude kule-yard, and out o' this new city!' refuge afore our hinder end was weel haft in it; and ye hae preached Mr. Harry awa to the prison; and ye hae showed ye haft heart enough o' the Law, and showed ye hae no pocket that he likes as ill to quit wi'; and sae ye may haud see, for ae wee while, without preaching me up a ladder and down a tow. Sue, come awa, comaw, comaw, before the laird hae had enough o' your testimony to mind it for ae while."

So saying he dragged off Mause, the words, "Testimony—Covenant—malignants—indulgence—will be a sufficient motive to make preparations for instantly renewing their travels in quest of an asylum."

"Ill-fall, crazy, crack-brained gowk, that she is! exclaimed the housekeeper, as she saw them depart; "to set up and put out twenty of the Lads and gude kule-yard, and to bring sae muckle distress on a douce quiet family! If it hadnab been that I am mar than half a gentlewoman by my station, I wad hae tried my ten nails in the wain'de bide o' her."

CHAPTER IX.

I am a son of Mars who have been in many wars, And eaten many a cut and scare wherein I come; This here was for a wench, and that other in a tress, When welcoming the French at the sound of the drum, I hear the tale that honours are the only way to move; And still the story thrills me as I hear it, and so I go, To find myself in the company of heroes, and then I find, That every man has his own particular story."

"Doss' be too much cast down," said Sergeant Bothwell to his prisoner as they journeyed on towards the head-quarters; you are a smart pretty lad, and well countenanced, the worst that will have to happen is strapping up for it, and that is many an honest fellow's lot. I tell you fairly your life's within the compass of the law, unless you make submission, and get off by a round fine upon your uncle's estate; he can well afford it."

"That vexes me more than the rest," said Henry.

"He partis with his money with regret; and, as he had no confidant whatever with my having given the person shelter for a night, I wish to Heaven, if I escape a capital punishment, that the penalty may be of a kind I could bear in my own person."

"Why, perhaps," said Bothwell, "they will propose to you to go into one of the Scotch regiments that are serving abroad. It's no bad line of service; if your friends are active, and there are any knockings, you may soon get a command."

"I am by no means sure," answered Morton, "that such a sentence is not the best thing that can happen to me."

"Why, then, you are no real whig after all!" said the sergeant.

"I have hitherto meddled with no party in the state," said Henry, "but have remained quietly at home; and sometimes I have had serious thoughts of joining the foreign party."

"Have you?" replied Bothwell; "why, I hope
OLD MORTALITY.

CHAPTER IX.

OLD MORTALITY.

"To be sure I do," answered Bothwell. "How should I be able to report favourably to my officers of the worthy lady and, indeed, unless I know a little of her taste of her book, for seek such a laggard that I take for granted; it is the favourite consoler of your old dowager of quality, as small comfort is the portion of your country lard.

"Then, for one's sake," said Henry, "if you are determined to go there, do not mention my name, or expose me to a family that I am acquainted with. Let me be mulled up for the time in one of your soldier's cloak rooms and mention me generally as a prisoner under your charge."

"With all my heart," said Bothwell; "I promised to use you civilly, and I seem to break my word. Here, and Andrews take a cloak room in a cloak room in a cloak room in a cloak room, and do not mention his name, nor where we caught him, unless you would have a trott on a horse of wood." There were at this moment at an archd gateway, battlemented and flagged with turrets, one where he was totally for the lower story, which served as a cow-house to the peasant, whose family inhabited the turret that remained entire. The gate had been broken down by Monk's soldiers during the civil war, and had never been replaced, therefore presented no obstacle to Bothwell and his party. The avenue, very steep and narrow, and causewayed with a large round hole in the middle of the road, was paved in an old and zigzag course, now showing now hiding a view of the tower and its exterior bulwarks, which seemed to rise almost perpetually more than a hundred feet above the surrounding fields. The battlements and defenses which it exhibited were upon such a scale of strength, as induced Bothwell to exclaim, "It is well this place is in honest and loyal hands. Gayed, if the enemy had it, a dozen of old Wakefield would with their distaff might keep it against a troop of dragons, at least if they had half the spunk of the old girl we left at Milwood. Upon my life," he continued, as they came to the lower tower and its surrounding defenses and flanks, "it is a superb place, founded, says the worm inscription over the gate—unless the remnant of my Latin has given me the slip—by Sir Ralph de Bellekinned in 1550—a respectable antiquity. I must greet the old lady with due honour, though it should put me to the labour of recalling some of the complaints that I used to dabble in when I was wont to keep that sort of company."

As he thus communed with himself, the butler, who had reconnoitered the soldiers from an arrow-slit in the wall that was continued to the tower, came to report that his Royal Highness-haughed, cried, exclaimed, and said the door, as like a taberne of pleasant doth. He had also a perfect taste for the discipline as well as the show of war, and had a corps of twenty two men armed with pike, sword, and wooden swords. For the maintenance of discipline in this juvenile corps, a wood-y-nook was established in the present cliamber, and the men exacted to the amount of those not strictly military, Burdick, the Duke's tailor, having made long files, which were brought in, in order of the day issued by the young prince, to be placed on this very day, and it was a man of manly appearance and bearing, mentred, mentred, from the pennies, which was likely to cause the inconvenience of his sturdy English expostulation trip to Dordrecht. But an attirant friend of Weilbruy, who had presumed to bring the young Prince a toy, after he had discarded the use of them, was a weapon of a wooden horse without a saddle, with his head to the tail, while he was tried by four officers of the control with more success and variety. As the Duke, the said friend of Weilbruy, who had presumed to bring the young Prince a toy, after he had discarded the use of them, was a weapon of a wooden horse without a saddle, with his head to the tail, while he was tried by four officers of the control with more success and variety.

In the day, in the morning, when the President called the members to the bar, he threw his cap over the table, and his chair over it. He was heavily mounted with his horse over the plate, where he sat for a moment, and then at his head, with a great deal of pleasure, in the metropolis, where he was brought, he thought it time to retire to the Highlands. manded party of dragoons, or, as he thought, Life-Guardsmen, waited at the gate with a prisoner under the custody of their commander.

"I am certain," said Gudyll, "and positive, that the sixth man is a prisoner; for his horse is led, and the two dragoons that are before have their carbines or pistols loaded and cocked upon their thighs. I was away the way we guarded prisoners in the days of the great Marquis."

"King's soldiers?" said the lady; "probably in want of refreshment. Go, Gudyll, make them welcome, and let them be accommodated with what provision and forage the tower can afford. And, stay, tell my gentlewoman to bring my black scarf and gloves, which the officer might be at liberty to receive from them; one cannot show the King's Life Guards too much respect in times when they are doing so much for royal authority. And d'ye hear, Gudyll, let Jenny Denna pin up her pearls to walk before my niece and me, and the three women to walk behind; and bid my niece attend me instantly."

Fully accounted, and attended according to her directions, Lady Margaret now sailed out into the court-yard of her tower with great courtesy and dignity. Sergeant Bothwell saluted the grave and reverend lady of the manor with an assurance which he knew was the light and welcome to the dissipated men of fashion in Charles the Second's time, and did not at all savour of the awkward or rude manners of a non-commissioned officer of dragoons or lancers. But Lady Margaret, seeming also to be refined for the time and occasion; though the truth was, that, in the fluctuations of an adventurous and profligate life, Bothwell had sometimes known company with his suitors to his present situation of life. To the lady's request to know whether she could be of service to them, he answered, with a suitable bow, "That as they had to march some distance that night, they would be much accommodated by permission to rest their horses for an hour before continuing their journey."

"With the greatest pleasure," answered Lady Margaret; "and I trust that my people will see that neither horse nor men want suitable refreshment."

"We are all well aware, madam," continued Bothwell, "that such has always been the reception within the walls of Tilletudium, of those who served the King."

"We have studied to discharge our duty faithfully and magnanimously."

"I am sure, sergeant," said Lady Margaret, pleased with the compliment, "both to our monarchs and to their followers, particularly to their faithful soldiers. It is not long ago, and it produced the recent occasion of his sacred majesty, now on the throne, since he himself honoured my poor house with his presence, and breakfasted in a room in this castle, Mr. Sergeant, which my waiting-gentlewoman shall show you; we still call it the King's room."

Bothwell had by this time dismounted his party, and committed the horses to the charge of one file, and the prisoner to that of another; so that he himself was at liberty to continue the conversation which the lady had so grandly opened.

Since the King, my master, had the honour to experience your hospitality, I cannot wonder that the same is extended to those that serve him, and whose principal merit is doing it with fidelity. And yet I have a nearer relation to his majesty than this coarse red coat would seem to indicate."

"Indeed, sir? Probably," said Lady Margaret, "you have belonged to his household?"

"Not exactly, madam," to his household, but rather a kindred with most of the best families in Scot-land, not, I believe, exclusive of that of Tilletudium."

"Sir?" said the old lady, drawing herself up with dignity; and a notion which I may have heard of the history and misfortunes of my grandfather Francis Stewart, to whom James 2.

his cousin-german, gave the title of Bothwell, as my comrades give me the nickname. It was not in the long run so advantageous to him to see him so low in the service. With such connections, what ill fortune could have reduced you?"

"Nothing much out of the ordinary course, I believe, madam," said Bothwell, interrupting me, and deferring the question. "I have had my moments of good luck like my neighbours—have drunk my black brandy with Rochester, thrown a merry man with Buckingham, and had my side by side with Shrewsbury. But my luck never lasted; I could not make useful friends out of my jolly companions—Perhaps I was not sufficiently aware," he continued with some bitterness, "how much the descendant of the Scottish Stewarts was honoured by being admitted into the convivialities of Wilmot and Villiers."

"But your Scotch friends, Mr. Stewart, your relations here, so numerous and so powerful?"

"Why, ay, my lady," replied the sergeant. "I believe they might have made me a gamekeeper, for I am a tolerable shot—one of them would have taught me."

"Why use my sword well—and here and there was one, who, when better company was not to be had, would make me his companion, since I can drink my three bottles of claret and half a bottle of Madeira between service and service among my kinsmen. I prefer that of my cousin Charles as the most creditable of them all, although the pay is but poor, and the work very far from splendid."

"I am a shame, it is a burning scandal!" said Lady Margaret. "Why do you not apply to his most sacred majesty? I cannot but be pleased to hear that a son of such an old noble family as Bothwell is not content to apply to his most sacred majesty, not to make better provision for you than you have yet received."

"I am much obliged to your ladyship, and I certainly will remain here with my prisoner, and request it, especially as it will be the earliest way of presenting him to Colonel Grahame, and obtaining his ultimate orders about the young spark."

"Who is your prisoner, pray you?" said Lady Margaret.

"A young fellow of rather the better class in this neighbourhood, who has been so incautiously as to give me the chance of one of the murderers of the privy, and to facilitate the dog's escape."

"O, fie upon him!" said Lady Margaret; "I am but too soon to forgive the injuries I have received at the hands of these rouges, though some of them, Mr. Stewart, are of a kind not likely to be forgotten; but those who would abet the perpetrators of so cruel and deliberate a homicide on a single man, an old man, and a nobleman, and a mother and a wife, I would not stir a step without revenge. O fie upon him! If you wish to make him secure, with little trouble to your people, I will cause Harrison, or Gudyll, look for the key of our pit, or principal dungeon. He is now at large open under suspicion of the victory of Kilsyth, when my poor Sir Arthur Belling- den put twenty whigs into it; but it is not more than two stories beneath ground, so it cannot be unwieldy some, especially as I rather believe there is somewhat an opening to the outer air."
OLD MORTALITY.

"I beg your pardon, madam," answered the sergeant; "I dare say the dungeon is a most admirable one. I have promised to be civil to the lad, and I will take care he is watched, so as to render escape impossible. I'll set those to look after him as fast as if his legs were in the boots, or his fingers in the tongs."

"Well, Mr. Stewart," rejoined the lady, "you best know your own duty. I heartily wish you good evening, and commit you to the care of my steward, Harrison. I would ask you to keep yourself company, but a— a—"

"O, madam, it requires no apology; I am sensible the coarse red coat of King Charles II. does and ought to annihilate the privileges of the red blood of King James V."

"Not with me, I do assure you, Mr. Stewart; you do me injustice if you think so. I will speak to your officer to-morrow; and I trust you shall soon find yourself in a rank where there shall be no anomalies to be recondemned."

"I believe, madam," said Bothwell, "your goodness will find itself deceived; but I am obliged to you for your intention, and, at all events, I will have a merry night with Mr. Harrison."

Lady Margaret took a ceremonious leave, with all the muskets of her mind, and even when the blood was flowing in the veins of a sergeant of the Life-Guards; again assuring Mr. Stewart, that whatever was in the Tower of Tilletud tum was heartily at his service and disposition.

Sergeant Bothwell did not fail to take the lady at her word, and readily forgot the height from which his family had descended, in a joyous carouse, during which he took a great deal of pleasure in producing the best wine in the cellar, and to excite his guest to be merry by that seducing example, which, in matters of conviviality, goes farther than precept. Old Guedon himself was with a party as much to his taste, pretty much as Dayy, in the Second Part of Henry the Fourth, mingling in the revels of his master, Justice Shallow. He ran down to the cellar that night, and selected some pretty catacumb, known, as he boasted, only to himself, and which neither ever had, or should, during his superintendence, render forth a bottle of its contents to any one but a real king's friend.

"When the Duke dined here," said the butler, seating himself at a distance from the table, being somewhat overawed by Bothwell's genealogy, but yet bustling heat half a yard nearer to interest me in his history, "the only ledder was in a position to have a bottle of that Burgundy"—(here he advanced his sent a little),—"but I didn't know how it was, Mr. Duke. He himself had a party so much to his taste, pretty much as Dayy, in the Second Part of Henry the Fourth, mingling in the revels of his master, Justice Shallow. He ran down to the cellar that night, and selected some pretty catacumb, known, as I have heard, to be a great friend to government; he pretends: the family are not to listen to. That said Duke James lost his heart before he lost his head; and the Worcester man was but wench partick, neither good to cry, bold, nor sae caudl."

(With witty observation, he completed his first parallel, and commenced a zigzag after the manner of an experienced engineer, in order to continue his approaches to the table.)

"Saw, at the faster my leddy cried 'Burgundy to his Grace—the said Burgundy—the choice Burgundy—the Burgundy that came over in the thirty-nine'—the man did say to meyell, Deil a dram gane done him, the man was generous; but I have none to my acquaintance of principles; sark and claret may serve me. Na, na, gentlemen, as long as I have the trust o' butter in this house o' Tilletudum, I'll tak it upon me to see that nae disloyal or disreputable comrades sit at the better end of our table. But when I can find a true friend to the king and his cause, and a moderate epicensoty; when I find a man, as I say, that will stand by church and crown, as I did myself in the time of Montrose, I think there's nothing in the cellar o'er good to be spared on him.

By this time he had completed a lodgement in the body of the place, or, in other words, advanced his seat close to the table.

"And now, Mr. Francis Stewart of Bothwell, I have the honour to drink your gude health, and a commission I've and much luck may we have in racking the country clear o' whigs and roundheads, fanatics and Covenanters."

Bothwell, who may well be believed, had long ceased to be very scrupulous in point of society, which he regulated more by his convenience and station in life than by his ancestry, readily answered the butler's pledge, adding, at the same time, the excellence of the wine, and Mr. Guedon, thus adopted a regular member of the company, continued to furnish them with the means of mirth until an early hour in the next morning.

CHAPTER X.

Did I but purpose to embark with thee
On smooth surface of a summer sea,
And would forsoak the skiff and make the shore
When the winds whistle and the tempests roar?

While Lady Margaret held, with the high-descended sergeant of dragoons, the conference which we have detailed in the preceding pages, her granddaughter, partaking in a less degree her ladyship's enthusiasm for all who were sprung of the blood-royal, did not honour Sergeant Bothwell with more attention than a single glance, which showed her a tall powerfully made figure, with a faintly humorous smile, which, to which pride and dissipation had given an air where discontent mingled with the reckless gaiety of desperation. The other soldiers offered still less to attract her notice; they were all of them, Primer, muffled and disguised as he was, she found it impossible to withdraw her eyes. Yet she blamed herself for indulging a curiosity which seemed obviously to give pain to him who was its object.

"I wish," she said to Jenny Dennison, who was the immediate attendant on her person, "I wish we knew that poor fellow is."

"I was just thinking the same myself, Miss Edith," said the waiting woman, "but it can be Cuddie Heddrie, because he's taller and no eae stout."

"Yet," continued Miss Belienden, "it may be some poor neighbour, for whom we might have cause to interest ourselves.

"I can soon learn who he is," said the enterprising Jenny, "if the soldiers are asest settled and at leisure, for I ken an' o' them very weel—the best-looking and the youngest o' them.

"If you think you know all the idle young fellows about the country," answered her mistress.

"Na, Miss, me no o' my acquaintance as that," answered the fille-de-chambre. "To be sure, folk canna help kenneng the folk by head-mark that they see eying glowing and looking at them at a kirk and a burial, and speaking to the deacons unless it be them o' the family, and the three Steins, and Tam Rand, and the young miller, and the five Howisons in Nethersheds, and lang Tam Gilly, and—"

"Pray cut short a list of exceptions which threaten to be a long one, and tell me how you come to know this young soldier," said Miss Belienden.

"Lord, Miss Edith, it's Tam Halliday, Trooper Tam, as they ca' him, that was wounded by the hill-folk at the convocation at Outter-side Mure, and lay here while he was under cure. I can ask him anything, and Tam will no refuse to answer me, I'll be cautious for him."

"Try, then," said Miss Edith, "if you can find an opportunity to ask him the name of his prisoner, and come to my room and tell me what he says."

Jenny Dennison proceeded on her errand, but soon returned with such a face of surprise and dismay as evinced a deep interest in the fate of the prisoner.

"What is the matter?" said Miss Edith, anxiously; "does it prove to be Cuddie, after all, poor fellow?"

"Cuddie, Miss Edith? Na! na! it's ma Cuddie," blubbered out the faithful fille-de-chambre, variable of the pain which her news were about to inflict on her young mistress. "O dear, Miss Edith, it's young Milnwood himself."

"Young Milnwood!" exclaimed Edith, agast at her turn it is impossible—totally impossible—.
HIs uncle attends the clergyman indigued by law, and has no connexion whatever with the refractory people; and he himself has never interfered in this unfortunate matter. If he has done wrong, he must be innocent, unless he has been standing up for some invaded right.

"O, my dear Mrs. Edith," said her attendant, "is there no possibility of what's to be right, or what's to be wrong; if he were as innocent as the new-born infant, they would find some way of making him guilty, if they liked; but Tam Halliday says it will touch his life, for he has been of late very active in one of the Free of Inverness, who killed that auld carle of an Arch-bishop."

"His life!" exclaimed Edith, staring hastily up, and with an expression of horror and tremulous accent, "they cannot—they shall not— I will speak for him— they shall not hurt him!"

"O, my dear young lady, think on your grand-mother; think on the danger and the difficulty," added Jenny; "for he's kept under close confinement till Claverhouse comes up in the morning, and if he doesn't get him full satisfaction, Tam Halliday says there will be brief work wi' him— Kneel down—mak ready—present—fire—just as they did wi' auld dear John Macbrair, that never understood a single question they put till him, and saw lost his life for lack of speaking.

"Jenny," said the young lady, "if he should die, I will die with him; there is no time to talk of danger or difficulty— I will put on a plaid, and slip the kilt over my head; then perhaps he shall keep him—I will throw myself at the feet of the sentinel, and entreat him, as he has a soul to be saved.

"Kha! guide us!" interrupted the maid, "our young lady at the feets o' Trooper Tam, and speaking to him about his soul, when the purf hied hardly kens whether he has one or no, unless that he whiles swears by it, but it will do; what may be done may be, and I'll never desert a true-love cause."

And see, if ye maun see young Milnwood, though I ken nae guile it will do, but to make baith your hearts the snarer, I'll e'en tak the risk o' it, and try to manage Tam Halliday; but ye maun let me hae my gin gate and no speak as word—he's keepin guard o'er Milnwood in the easter round o' the ait.

"Go, go, fetch me a plaid," said Edith. "Let me but see him, and I will find some remedy for his danger— Haste ye, Jenny, as ever ye hope to have good at my hand at first."

Jenny hastened, and soon returned with a plaid, in which Edith maffled herself so as completely to screen her face, and in part to disguise her person. This happened, I believe, to take her out of the way among the ladies of that century, and the earlier part of the succeeding one; so much so, indeed, that the venerable sages of the Kirk, conceiving that the mode gave tempting facilities for intrigue, directed more than one act of Assembly against this use of the mantle. But fashion, as usual, proved too strong for authority, and while plaid continued to be worn, women of all ranks occasionally employed them as a sort of muffler or veil.

Her face and figure thus concealed, Edith, holding by her attendant's arm, hastened with trembling steps to the place of Morton's confinement.

This was a small study or closet, in one of the turrets, opening upon a gallery in which the sentinel was pacing to and fro; for Sersgent Bothwell, scurrying in his usual scurrility, had waved the indignity of putting his guard into the same apartment with him. The plaid was thrown over his arrow and his coat; he walked up and down the gallery, occasionally solacing himself with a draught of ale, a huge flagon of which stood upon the table at one end of the room. The sight of an individual, while in public or promiscuous society, was then very common. In England, where no plaid was worn, the ladies used wizard masks for the same purpose, and drew the skirts of their cloaks over the right shoulder, as to cover part of the face. This is repeatedly alluded to in Pope's Diary.
OLD MORTALITY.

It was needless to say more; he was at her side, almost at her feet, pressing her unsuspecting hands, and leaning her with a profusion of thanks and gratitude which was far from negligible. From one of the portions of the career, the gesture, the impassioned and hurried indications of deep and tumultuous feeling, with which they were accompanied, were accompanied, was the situation of a saint which receives the adoration of a worshipper; and when she recovered herself sufficiently to feel her hands tremulous, she grasped, she could at first only faintly articulate, "I have taken a strange step, Mr. Morton—a step," she continued with more coherency, as her ideas arranged themselves in consequence of a strong effort, "that perhaps may expose me to censure in your eyes—But I have long permitted you to use the language of friendship—perhaps I might say more—too long to leave you when the world seems to have been wronging you. How, or why, is this imprisonment? What can I done? can my uncle, who thinks so highly of you—can your own kinsman, Milwood, be of no use? are there no means? and what is likely to be the event?"

"Be what it will," answered Henry, contriving to make himself master of the hand that had escaped from his, and pressing it against his heart, "I'll be my class, be what it will, it is to me from this moment the most welcome incident of a weary life. To you, dearest Edith—forgive me, I should have said, Miss Bellenden."

"Have you used to mix so little in these unhappy scenes, become so suddenly and deeply implicated, that nothing short of—"

She paused, unable to bring out the word which should have come next.

"Nothing short of my life, you would say?" replied Morton, in a calm, but melancholy tone; "I believe that will be entirely in the bosoms of my judges. My guards spoke of a possibility of exchanging the penalty for entry into foreign service. I thought I could have embraced the alternative; and yet, Miss Bellenden, since I have seen you once more, I feel that exile would be more gallant than death;"

"And is it then true," said Edith, "that you have been so desperately rash as to entertain communication with any of those cruel wretches who assassinated the primate?"

"I knew of the existence of such a crime had been committed," replied Morton, "when I gave unhappily a night's lodging and concealment to one of those rash and cruel men, the ancient friend and confidant of my father. But my ignorance will avow me little for, who, Miss Bellenden, save you, will believe it? And, what is worse, I am at least uncertain whether, even if I had known the crime, I could have brought my mind, under all the circumstances, to refuse a temporary refuge to the fugitive."

"And by whom," said Edith, anxiously, "or under what authority, will the investigation of your conduct take place?"

"Under that of Colonel Grahame of Claverhouse, I am given to understand," said Morton; "one of the military commission, to whom it has pleased our king, our privy council, and our parliament, that used to be more tenacious of our liberties, to commit the sole charge of our goods and of our lives."

"To Claverhouse?" said Edith, faintly; "merciful Heaven, you are spared to me to take an interest in his misfortunes? and yet afraid, owing to the delightful twilight and the muffled dress, of making some mistake which might be prejudicial to the object of his deflection. Jean, whose ready wit and forward manners well qualified her for such an office, hastened to break the ice."

"Mr. Morton, Miss Edith's very sorry for your present situation, and—"
"Farewell, Edith," whispered Morton, assuming his firmness he was far from possessing; "do not remain here—leave me to my fate—it cannot be beyond endurance once you are interested in—good night!—Do not remain here till you are discovered."

Thus saying, he resigned her to her attendant, by whom she was quietly led and partly supported out of the apartment.

"Every one has his taste, to be sure," said Halliday; "but don't you think if I were to have vexed so sweet a girl as that, for all the whigs that ever swore the Covenant."

When Edith had regained her apartment, she gave way to a sob, and then to a frenzy which almost overwhelmed Miss Dinsan, who hastened to administer such scraps of consolation as occurred to her.

"Dinna vex yourself sae muckle, Miss Edith," said that faithful attendant; "who, kens what may happen to help young Milnwood? He's a brave lad, and a bonny, and a gentleman of a good fortune, and they winna string the like o' him up as they do the pur i' the bodies that they catch in the murrin, like straps o' onions; maybe his uncle will bring him a', or maybe your ain grand-uncle will speak a guize word for him—he's weel acquainted wi' a' the red-coat gentlemen that he met at Miss Dinsan's wedding, is that if he should find himself in danger again."

"You are right, Jenny! you are right," said Edith, recovering herself from the stupor into which she had sunk; "this is no time for despair, but for exertion. You must find some one to ride this very night to my uncle's with a letter."

"To Charnwood, madam? It's unco late, and it's sae miles an' a bitock doon the water; I doubt if we can find a man who has had a horse or a horse, for they have mounted a sentinel before the gate. Pur Cuddy! he's gane, pur fowal, that was dune aught in the wark I bade him, and niver a guid word, it's a guid word, to walk ten miles a' night and get na a guid word."

"You must find some one to go, Jenny; life and death depend upon it."

"I wad gang myself, my laddy, for I could cress out at the window o' the pantry, and spow down by the auld yew-tree weel enough—I have played that trick ere now. But the road's unco wild, and sae mony red-coats about, forby the whigs, that are no mussie better (the young lads o' them) if they meet a man frae behind, they will give way, and come o' the road for the walk—I can walk ten miles by moon-light weel enough."

"Is there no one you can think of, that, for money or favour, could serve me so fair?" asked Edith, in great anxiety.

"I dinna ken," said Jenny, after a moment's consideration, "unless it be Gussie Gibbie; and he'll maybe no ken the way, though it's no sae difficult to hit, if he keep the horse-road, and mind the turn at the Caperchyle, and dinna drowm himsell in the Wholme-kirk-park; or fa' owre the eaur at the Dell's Loaning, or mae o' the kittle streets at the Paves o' Walkway, or be carried to the hills by the whigs, or be taken to the tollbooth by the red-coats."

"All these cannot be run," said Edith, cutting short the list of blunders against Gussie Gibbie's said arrival at the end of his pilgrimage; "all risks must be run, unless you can find a better messenger. Go bid the hosie keep the gate, just as she did as secretley as you can. If he meets any one, kens him say he is carrying a letter to Major Bellenden of Charnwood, but without mentioning any name."

"I understand, madam," said Jenny Dennison; "I warrant the callant will do weel enough, and Tè the hen-who will take care o' the goose for a word o' my mouth. I'll tell Gussie, and he'll tell Gibbie to mak his peace wi' Lady Margaret, and we'll give him a dollar."

"Two, if he does errand well," said Edith.

Old Mortality.

Birds under his charge. During her absence, Edith took her writing materials, and prepared against her return the following letter, superscribed, For the hand: Major of Cumnock, of Charnwood, my much honoured uncle, These:

"My dear Uncle—I this will inform you I am determined to have your care. As we did not see you at the wappen-schaw, which made both my grandmother and myself very uneasy. And if it will permit you to travel, we shall be happy to see you at our breakfast. As Colonel Grahame of Claverhouse is to pass this way on his march, and we would willingly have your assistance to receive and entertain a military man of such distinction, probably will not be much delighted with the company of women. Also, my dear uncle, I pray you to let Mrs. Careforth, your housekeeper, send me my double-trimmed padasus with the hanging sleeves, which she will find in the third drawer of the walnut press in the green room, which you are so kind as to call mine. Also, my dear uncle, I pray you to send me the second volume of the Grand Cyrus, as I have only read as far as the imprisonment of Phildaspeus upon the seven hundredth and thirty-third page; but, above all, I entreat you to come to us to-morrow before eight of the clock, which, as it will not do, I will do with, get rising before your usual hour. So, praying to God to preserve your health, I rest your dutiful and loving niece,

Edith Bellenden.

Postscriptum. A party of soldiers have last night brought your friend, young Mr. Henry Morton of Milnwood, hither as a prisoner. I conclude you will be sorry for the young gentleman, who, you know this, in case you may think of speaking to Colonel Grahame in his behalf. I have not mentioned his name to my grandmother, knowing her prejudice against the family.

This epistle being duly sealed and delivered to Jersey, that faithful confidant hastened to put the same in the charge of Goose Gibbie, whom she found in readiness to stay from the castle. She then gave him various instructions touching the road, which she apprehended he was likely to mistake not having travelled it above five or six times, and possessing only the same slender proportion of memory as of judgment. Lastly, she smuggled him out of the gaol, she being the branch of a yew-tree which grew close beside it, and had the satisfaction to see him reach the bottom in safety, and take the right turn at the commencement of his journey. As she left him, a young mistress to go to bed, and to lull her to rest, if possible, with assurances of Gibbie's success in his embassy, only qualified by a passing regret that the trusty Gibbie, with whom the commission might have been more safely reposed, was no longer within reach of serving her.

More fortunate as a messenger than as a cavalier, it was Gibbie's good hap rather than his good management, which, after he had gone astray not oftener than nine times, and given his garments a taste of the variation of each brook, bog, and slough, between Tilitudem and Auchterarder, forced him about dawn to break before the gate of Major Bellenden's mansion, having completed a walk of ten miles (for the hitlock, as usual, amounted to four) in little more than the same number of hours.

Chapter XI

At last comes the trumpet, by the word of command Drawn up in our court, where the Captain cries, Stand Straight.

Major Bellenden's ancient valet, Gideon Pike, as he adjusted his master's clothes by his bedside, was paratory to the worthy veteran's toilet, acquainted him, as an apology for disturbing him an hour earlier than his usual time of rising, that there was an expectant from the heralds with a most sacred majesty.

"From Tilitudem?" said the old gentleman, rising hastily in his bed, and siting bolt upright.—"Open the shutters, Pike—I hope my sister-in-law is well—pull up the bed-curtain.—What have we all the hand here?" (giving Edith's note). "And she knows I have not had a fit since Candlemas.——The wappen-schaw? I told her a month since I was not to be there.—Padasus and hanging sleeves? Why, hang them!——Lord Byron! and Philipstus.—Philip Devil!—is the wrench gone crazy all at once? was it worth while to send an express and wake me at five in the morning for all this trash? I mean to be in bed—I have been at mercy on us!" he exclaimed on perusing it,—"Pike, saddle old Kylesythe instantly, and another horse for yourself.

"I hope no ill news free the Tower, sir," said Pike, astonished at his master's sudden emotion.

"Yes—no—yes, that is it, I must meet Claverhouse there on some express business; so boot and saddle, Pike, as fast as you can.—O Lord! what times are these!—the poor lad—my old cronic's son! and the silly wrench sticks it into her postscriptum, as she calls it, at the tail of all this trumpery about old gowns and new romances!"

In a few minutes the good old officer was fully equipped; and having mounted upon his arm-gaunt charger as soberly as Mark Antony himself could be, he was done, and paced his way to the Tower of Tilitudem.

On the road he formed the prudent resolution to say nothing to the old lady (whose dislike to presby- terians of old date was known to him) as to the quality and rank of the prisoner detained within her walls, but to try his own influence with Claverhouse to obtain Morton's liberation.

"Being no lover of intrigue," he said, "we must do something for so old a cavalier as I am," said the veteran to himself; "and if he is so good a soldier as the world speaks of, why, he will be glad to see an old soldier's son. I never knew a real soldier that was not a frank-hearted, honest fellow; and I think the execu- tion of the laws (though it's a pity they find it necessary to make them so severe) may be a thou- sand times better intrusted with them than with ped- dling lawyers and thirk-skulled country gentlemen."

Such were the ruminations of Major Miller Bellenden, which were terminated by John Guitjill (not more than half-drunk) taking hold of his bridle, and assisting him to disinmount in the rough-paved court of Tilitudem.——

"Why, John," said the veteran, "what devil of a discipline is this you have been keeping? You have been reading Geneva print this morning already!"

"I have been reading the Bible," said John, shaking his head at the sound of Guitjill's voice, "and having only caught one word of the Major's address to him: "Life is short, sir; we are flowers of the field, sir—hence—\ldots" pasty to the same age, with the flagon, and said they were too good friends to be parted?

"I found that week madam," said Mydie, "and if I had got the flagon; but, for I was not sure about that, I am sure I was sure; but I thought everything was to be placed just as it was when his majesty, God bless him, came into this room, looking like an angel than a man, if he had had a beard black like his vis-

"Then ye thought none, Mydie; for in whatever place his most sacred majesty ordered the position of the flagon and flagons, that, as we say, they never fail. And, indeed, all the hall is a law to his subjects, and shall ever be to those of the house of Tiltledrum.

"Well, madam," said Mydie, making the alterations needed, it's easy mending the error; but if every thing is just to be as his majesty left it, there should be an un mole hole in the procession pasty.

At this moment the door opened.

Who is that, John Gudjill?" exclaimed the old lady. "T' een speak to no one just now. Is it you, my dear brother?" she continued, in some surprise, and a Major cut short; "this is a right early visit.

"Nay, brother, said the Major, as he took up the book, "Majol Bellenden, as I said, saluted the widow of his deceased brother; but I heard by a note which Edith sent to Charnwood about some of her equipage and how she was to have Chaquen to be here this morning, as I thought, like an old fine look as I am, that I should like to have a chat with this rising soldier. I caused Pike saddle Kilsyth, and here we all bided.

"And most kindly you are, said the old lady; it is just what I should have prayed you to do, if I had thought there was time. You see I am busy in preparation. All is to be in the same order as when --"

"The king breakfasted at Tiltledrum," said the Major, who, like all Lady Margarets friends decided that the arrival of that narrate, and was disposed to cut it short, "I remember it well; you know I was waiting on his majesty.

"You were brother," said Lady Margaret; "and perhaps you can help me to remember the order of the entertainment."

"Nay, good brother," said the Major, "the damnable dinner that Noll gave us at Worcester a few days ago has been too good cheer out of my memory. But how's this?--you have even the great Turkey-leather elbow-chair, with the tapestry cushions, placed in state.

OLD MORTALITY.

With a providence unknown in other parts of Scotland, the pious paterfamilias, planted orchards and cottages, and the general pleasantness of the apple-trees at this season of the year gave all the lower part of the view the appearance of a flower-garden.

Looking up the river, the character of the scene was varied considerably for the worse. A hill, waste, and uncultivated country approached close to the banks; the trees were few, and limited to the neighborhood of the stream, and the rude moors stretched out at a little distance into shapeless and heavy hills, which were again surmounted in their turn by a range of lofty mountains, dimly seen on the horizon. The vale, in short, was a picture of nature in the rude and untamed state; the trees closely planted and highly adorned, the other exhibiting the monotonous and dreary character of a wild and inhospitable moor-land.

The eyes of the spectators on the present occasion were attracted to the downward view, not alone by its superior beauty, but because the distant sounds of military music began to be heard from the public high-road which winded up the vale, and announced the approach of the expected body of cavalry. Their glittering ranks were shortly afterwards seen in the distance, appearing and disappearing as the trees and their branches sundered them, and distinguished chiefly by the flashes of light which their arms occasionally reflected against the sun.

The train was long and imposing, for there were many officers and soldiers on foot, and the glittering of the swords and waving of their banners, joined to the clang of their trumpets and kettle-drums, had at once a lively and awful effect upon the imagination. As they advanced still nearer and nearer, they could distinctly see the files of those chosen troops following each other in long succession, completely equipped and superbly mounted.

"It's a sight that makes me thirty years younger," said the old cavalier; "and yet I do not much like the service that these poor fellows are to be engaged in. Although I had my share of the civil war, I cannot think that I have had much in that sort of service as when I was employed on the Continent, and we were hacking at fellows with foreign faces and outlandish dialect. It's a hard thing to hear a namely Scotch tongue cry quarter, and be obliged to cut him down just the same as if he called out miscreant.--So, there they come through the Netherwood gaug; upon my word, fine-looking fellows, and capably mounted, but I know this is a world of a more different sort of business than is my style; and, if he was once wrong, he was once right too. I must caution your youth. Edith, for having said nothing of this young gentleman's affair to your grandmother—why, you rely on it, I shall not. I will take an opportunity to speak to Claverhouse. Come, my love, they are going to breakfast. Let us follow them."

CHAPTER XII.

Their breakfast so warm to be sure they did eat,
A custom in travellers mighty discreet.

The breakfast of Lady Margaret Delftenden no more resembled a modern abundance, than the great stonewall at Tillicoultry could brook comparison with a modern drawing-room. No tea, no coffee, no variety of rolls, but solid and substantial viands,—the pasty lamb, the knightly ribon, the noble bacon of beef, the hare, the venison, the pheasant,—all so tender with difficulty from the claws of the Gourmands, now manured, now with ale, now with mead, and some with generous wine of various qualities and degrees of refinement. But the want of delicacies of the table corresponded to the meanness and solidity of the preparation,—no piddling,—no boy's play, but that steady and persevering exercise of the jaws which is best learned by early morning hours, and by occasional hard commons.

Lady Margaret beheld with delight the eats which she had provided descending with such alacrity into the persons of her honoured guests, and had little occasion to exercise, with respect to any of the company save Claverhouse himself, the compulsory urgency of loyalty to his prince, with a discernment of the rights of his fellow-subjects. He was the unceremonious agent of the Privy Council, executing the most arduous duties of the government in Scotland during the times of Charles II. and James II., and if he were not the true character of the brave, he most certainly ascertained the cause of the latter monarch after the Revolution, the military skill with which he supported it at the battle of Killiecrankie, and by his own death in the arms of victory.

It is said by tradition, that he was very desirous to see, and be introduced to, the two ladies at this instance. Lady Elphinstone was called the advanced two of one hundred years and upwards. The noble matron, however, in conversation with the inquisitive Claverhouse (as he was called from his title,) at length consented. After the usual compliments, the officer observed that as the lady, having been so long an inhabitant of the United States of America, she must in her time have seen many strange changes. "I'm sure," said Claverhouse, "it is just to end with me as it began. When I was entering life, there was a Kron Knis down at my castle, and now I am once more coming out."

Claverhouse, signifying, in common parlance, idle chat, the double coin does credit to the urgency of a lady of a hundred years old.
of pressing to eat, in which, as to the peine forte et dure, the ladies of that period were in the custom of subjecting their guests.

Edith Bellenden, on her own part, was more anxious to pay courtesy to Miss Bellenden, next whom he was placed, than to gratify his appetite, appeared somewhat negligent of the good cheer set before him. Edith herself, her manner was as composed as her looks, and she conversed as naturally to her, in a tone of voice of that happy modulation which could alike melt in the low tones of interesting conversation, and rise amid the din of battle, and as to her, he seemed so entirely the gentleman, that he was in the presence of the dreadful chief upon whose fate the fate of Henry Morton must depend— the recollection of the terror and awe which were attached to him, for a while, the name of the young hero, for some time, not only of the courage to answer, but even the power of looking upon him. But when, emboldened by the soothing tones of her voice, she lifted her eyes to frame some reply, the person on whom she looked bore, in his appearance at least, none of the terrible attributes in which her apprehension had arrayed him.

Graham of Cleverhouse was in the prime of life, rather low of stature, and slightly, though elegantly, formed; his gesture, language, and manners were those of a nobleman. He had been once among the envious and the gay. His features exhibited even feminine regularity. An oval face, a straight and well-formed nose, dark hazel eyes, a complexion just sufficiently tanned to show the effect of a change of climate, a short upper lip, curved upward like that of a Greek statuette, and slightly shaded by small mustaches of light brown, joined to a profusion of long curled locks of the same colour, which fell down on each side of his face, contributed to form such a countenance as l迷失s love to paint and ladies to look upon.

The severity of his character, as well as the higher attributes of undaunted and enterprising valour which even his enemies were compelled to admit, lay concealed under an exterior which seemed adapted to the court or the saloon rather than to the field. The same gentleness and gravity of expression which reigned in his features seemed to inspire his actions and gestures; and, on the whole, he was generally esteemed, at first sight, rather qualified to be the votary of pleasure than of ambition. But under this soft exterior was hidden a spirit unabridged in daring and in aspiring, yet cautious and prudent as that of Machiavel. He was an old man in politics, and indulged his inclinations, with that disregard for individual rights which its intrigues usually generate. This leader was cool and collected in danger, fierce and ardent in pursuing success, dealing death and ruthlessness in its infliction on others. Such are the characters formed in times of civil discord, when the highest qualities, perverted by party spirit, and inflamed by habitual opposition, are too often combined with vices and excesses which deprive them at once of their merit and of their lustre.

In endeavouring to reply to the polite trifles with which Cleverhouse accosted her, Edith showed so much confusion, that her grandmother thought it necessary to come to her relief.

"Edith Bellenden," said the old lady, "has, from my sedentary mode of living, seen so little of those of her own sphere, that truly she can hardly frame her speech to suitable answers. A soldier is so rare a sight with us, Colonel Graham, that unless it be your own family, you have had an opportunity of receiving a gentleman in uniform. And, now I talk of that excellent young nobleman, may I inquire if I was not to have had the honour of seeing him before with the regiment?"

"Lord Evanbale, madam, was on his march with us," answered the leader, "but I was obliged to detach him with a small party to disperse a convention of the Highlanders, who had had some impudence to assemble within five miles of my headquarters."

"Indeed," said the old lady, "that is a height of presumption to which I would have thought no rebel—"

"cow fanniacs would have ventured to aspire. But these are strange times! There is an evil spirit in the land, Colonel Graham, that excites the vassals of persons of rank to rebel against the very house that holds an abode in their midst. There was a ragged bodied man the other day who plainly refused to attend the wappen-schaw at my bidding. There is no law for such recusancy, Colonel Graham, he did not dwell long in Tillietudlem, but was speedily expelled for his contumacy. I wish the lad no ill; he is a body; but incautiously let him fall on the ears of a handful of that good example in this neighborhood. His mother, under whose influence I doubt he acted, is an ancient domestic of this family, which makes me incline to mercy; although," continued the old lady, looking towards the pictures of her husband and her sons, with which the wall was hung, and heaving, at the same time, a deep sigh. "I, Colonel Graham, have in my name persons, but little right to compassion to that stubborn and rebellious generation. They have made me a childless widow, and, but for the protection of our sacred sovereign, I might have been deprived of lands and goods, of hearth and altar. Seven of my tenants, whose joint rent-claim may amount to wellnigh a hundred marks, have already deserted my arms, and I am soon to be deprived of the assurance to tell my steward that they would acknowledge neither king nor landlord but who should have taken the Covenant."

"I will take a course with them—that is, with your ladyship's permission," answered Cleverhouse, "it would ill become me to neglect the support of lawful authority when it is lodged in such worthy hands as those of Lady Margaret Bellenden. I say this country grows worse and worse daily, and reduces me to the necessity of taking measures with the recusants that are much more consonant with my duty than with my inclinations. And, speaking of this, I must not forget that I have to thank your ladyship for the hospitality you have been pleased to extend to a party of mine who have brought in a prisoner, charged with having resented the murdering villain Balfour of Burley."

"The house of Tillietudlem," answered the lady, " hath ever been open to the servants of his majesty, and I hope I shall do the same to you.—Bothwell," he continued, "I am addressing the sergeant, who just then appeared at the door, go kiss Lady Margaret Bellenden's hand, who interests herself in your promotion, and you shall have the satisfaction of being made a gentleman; but I would not kiss a man's hand, the king's, to be made a general."

"You hear him," said Cleverhouse, smiling, "there's no road by sprints upon; he cannot forget his pedigree."

"I know, my noble colonel," said Bothwell, in the same tone, that you will not forget your promises and the quarter in which you may rebel."

"Received, &c. received or harboured." have some recollection of his grandfather, though the sorcerer who forgot him ...

"Enough of this," said Claverhouse, in the tone of command which was familiar to him; and let me know what you came to report to me just now.

"My Lord Evandale," said the young gentleman on the high-road, "I have been to visit my father and Bothwell.

"My Lord Evandale!" said Lady Margaret.

"Surely, Colonel Grahame, you will permit him to name your household, and to take his poor dis-june here, especiaslly as it is not as any of his sacred Majesty did not pass the Tower of St. Ivelanden without halting to pay some refreshment.

"And I have reason to believe," added Lord Grahame, in the confidence that Lady Margaret had adventured to this distinguished event, Colonel Grahame, as specifically politeness would permit, took advantage of the first pause to intercept the further progress of the narrator; by saying, "We are already too numerous a company guests; but as I know what Lord Evandale will suffer (looking towards Edith) if deprived of the pleasure which we enjoy, I will run the risk of overburden your ladyship's hospitality. Bothwell, let Lord Evandale know that Lady Margaret Bellenden requests the honour of his company.

"And let me add," said Lord Margaret, thal the people and their horses are suitably seen.

Edith's heart sprung to her lips during this conversation, but her influence over Lord Evandale, she might find some means of removing Morton from his present state of danger; in case her uncle's intercession with Claverhouse should prove in vain, she might at any other time would have been much averse to exert this influence; for, however inexperienced in the world, her native delicacy taught her the advantage which a young woman gives to a young man when she permits him to lay her under an obligation.

And she would have been the farther disinclined to request any favour of Lord Evandale, because the voice of the man who is feared, and to whom her influence be made known, assigned him to her as a suitor, and because she could not disguise from herself that very little encouragement was necessary to realize conjectures which had hitherto no foundation. This was the more to be dreaded, that, in the case of Lord Evandale's making a formal declaration, he had every chance of being supported by the influence of Lady Katherine, who, in. all probability, would have nothing to oppose to their solicitations and authority, except a predilection, to avow which she knew would be equally dangerous and unavailing.

ance, into a recess formed by one of the arched win-eyes almost dazzled by the eagerness of suspense; and, with observation rendered more acute by the internal agony of her mind, could guess, from the pantomimic expressions by which the conversation was conveyed, progress and fate of the intercession in behalf of Henry Morten.

"What may be their strength?" asked his commander.

"Probably a thousand men, but accounts differ widely.

"Then," said Claverhouse, "we must be up and be doing also—Bothwell, bid them sound to horse.

Bothwell, who, like the war-horse of scripture, snuffed the battle air, hastened to give orders to his men, which were all massed against the massive silver collars and armlets. These noble functionaries acted as trumpeters, and splendidly made the castle and the woods around it ring with their summons.

"Must you then leave us?" said Lady Margaret, her heart sinking under recollection of former unhappy times; "had ye not better send to learn the force of the rebels' army, and bring back news of the stage of these fearful sounds call away the Tower of Tillou-udem, that my auld men were near to see return to it?"

"It is impossible for me to stop," said Claver-house; "it is only our courtesy to make the rebels five times their strength, if they are not checked at once."
"Many," said Evandale, "are flocking to them already, and they give out that they expect a strong man. Edith almost waxes pale with anxiety. As she is always very nervous when she is frightened, she began to tremble, and I was afraid that she might faint."

This speech produced a very different effect upon the young nobleman. Edith almost sank in her seat, while Claverhouse dashed a glance of sarcasm at Major Bellenden, which seemed to imply—"You see what are the principles of the young nobleman."

"A mixed fish—just like the rest of these rascally farmers," said the Major huskily. "I was for Henry Morton as I would for my own son. He is a mere youth; he is yet in the university, and you have no right to send an English officer against a body of the Life-Guards. I mean no offense to any one. He has gone to church service with me fifty times, and I never heard him miss one of the responses in my life. Edith Bellenden can bear witness to it as well as I. He always reads the same Prayer-book with her, and could look out the lessons as well as the curate himself. Call him up; let him be heard for himself."

"There can be no harm in that," said Claverhouse, "if he is innocent or guilty. Major Allan, he said, turning to the officer next him in the crowd, "take me to the Leith shore, and forward to Londonhill by the best and shortest road. Move steadily, and do not let the men blow the horses; Lord Evandale and I will overtake you in a quarter of an hour."

Portobello with a party to bring up the prisoners."

Allan bowed, and left the apartment, with all the officers, excepting Claverhouse and the young nobleman. In a few minutes the sound of the martial music and the clashing of hoofs announced that the horsemen were leaving the castle. The sounds were presently heard only at intervals, and soon died away entirely.

While Claverhouse endeavoured to soothe the terrors of Lady Margaret, and to reconcile the veteran Major to his opinion of Morton, Evandale, getting the better of that young man, now the expression in his features, drew near to Miss Bellenden, and accosted her in a tone of mingled respect and interest.

"We are to leave you," he said, taking her hand, "for which I am much obliged." "to leave you for a scene which is not without its dangers. Farewell, dear Miss Bellenden; let me say for the first time that—"

"I rather," she interposed, "wonder in your prospects so singular may excuse some solicitude in bidding farewell to one, whom I have known so long, and whom I—respect so highly."

"My daughter," said Lord Evandale, "will express to you that urchin's conduct, which, in the hope of saving the life of a gallant youth, you now took leave of him to rush into dangers of no ordinary description."

"I hope—sincerely trust," she said, "there is no danger. I hope there is no occasion for this solemn ceremony—that these hasty assurances will be dispersed rather by fear than force, and that Lord Evandale will speedily return to be what he must always be, the dear and valued friend of all in this castle."

"Of all," he repeated, with a melancholy emphasis upon the word. "But let it be—whatever is near you is dear and valued to me, and I value their approbation accordingly. Of our success I am not sanguine. Our matter is grave. Follow, that I dare not hope for so speedy, so bloodless, or so safe an end of this unhappy disturbance. These men are enthusiastic, resolute, and desperate, and have leaders not altogether unskilful in the management of the multitude."

"Of all," he exclaimed, with a glance of incalculable malice against the impetuosity of our Colonel is hurrying us against them, rather prematurely. But there are few that have less reason to shun danger than I have."

The Colonel was wistful to be the young nobleman's intercession and protection for Henry Morton, and it seemed the only remaining channel of interest by which he could be communicated to his majesty. Yet she felt at that moment as if, in doing so, she was abusing the partiality and confidence of the lover, whose heart was as open before her, as if his tongue had made as expressively known. Could she send word to Lord Evandale in the service of a rival? or could she with prudence make him any request, or lay herself under any obligation to him, without affording grounds for hopes which she could never realize? But the moment was too urgent for hesitation, or even for those explanations with which her request might otherwise have been qualified.

"I will wait on Major Allan," said Claverhouse, from the other side of the hall, "and then, Lord Evandale—I am sorry to interrupt again yet conversation—but then we must mount—Portobello, why do you not bring up the prisoners? and, harry's, let two lads load their carbines?"

In these words, Edith conceived she heard the death-warrant of her lover. She instantly broke through the restraint which had hitherto kept her silent.

"My Lord Evandale," she said, "this young gentleman is a particular friend of my uncle's—your interests must be merged in his. You must intercede for him."

"You overstate me, Miss Bellenden," said Lord Evandale, "I have been often unsuccessful in such applications, when I have made them on the more serious of human life."

"Yet try once again for my uncle's sake."

"And why not? you make me wonder," said Lord Evandale, "Will you not allow me to think I am obliging you personally in this matter?—Are you so inefficient of an old friend that you will not allow him even the satisfaction of thinking that he is gratifying your wishes?"

"Surely,—surely," replied Edith; "you will oblige me infinitely—I am interested in the young gentleman on my uncle's account. Let me see, for his sake!"

She became bolder and more urgent in her entreaty, for she heard the steps of the soldiers who were entering with their prisoners.

"By heaven! then," said Evandale, "he shall not die, if I should die in his place!—But will not you?"

"I am sure," he said, in a voice of the most passionate intercourse, "that you will not grant me one suit, in return for my zeal in your service?"

"Any thing you can ask, my Lord Evandale, that slyly, with a smile, said Lord Evandale, "seems to me to be an improper alternative."

"And is this all," he continued, "all you can grant to my affection living, or my memory when dead?"

"Do not speak thus, my lord," said Edith, "you distress me, and do injustice to yourself. There is no friend I esteem more highly, or to whom I would more readily grant every mark of regard—providing—"

But—"

A deep sigh made her turn her head suddenly, or she had well uttered the last word; and, as she hesitated how to frame the exception with which she meant to close the sentence, she became suddenly aware that she had been overheard by Morton, who, hastily ironed and guarded by soldiers, was now passing behind her in order to be presented to Claverhouse. As their eyes met each other, the sad and reproachful expression of Morton's glance seemed to imply that he had partially heard, and altogether misunderstood, the conversation which had just passed."

"You are not aware that the doctor, whose quick and eager step was easily discovered that there was between the prisoner and the object of his own attachment, some singular and uncommon connexion. He resisted the hand of Miss Bellenden, again urging the prisoner with more attention, again looked at Edith.
and plainly observed the confusion which she could no longer conceal.

"This," he said, after a moment's gloomy silence, "is I believe, the young gentleman who gained the point in the shooting match."

"I am not sure," hesitated Edith—"yet—I rather think not," scarce knowing what she replied.

"It is he," said Evandale, decidedly—"I know him well. A visitor he continued, somewhat laughingly, "ought to have interested a fair spectator more deeply."

He then turned from Edith, and advancing towards the steps at which Claverhouse now placed himself, stood at a little distance, resting on his sheathed broadsword, a form, but not an unconcerned spectator of that which passed.

CHAPTER XIII.

O, my Lord, beware of jealousy!

To explain the deep effect which the few broken passages of the conversation we have detailed made upon the next portion of the story; that we may over-arch, it is necessary to say something of his previous state of mind, and of the origin of his acquaintance with Edith.

Morton was one of those gifted characters, which possess a force of talent unsuspected by the owner himself. He had inherited from his father, an unwhimpered courage, and a firm and uncompromising determination of character, whether in matters of religion or politics. But his enthusiasm was unsullied by fanatic zeal, and unawakened by the enormity of the puritanical spirit. From these his mind had been formed, partly by the active exertions of his own excellent understanding, partly by frequent and long visits at Major Bellenden's, where he had an opportunity of meeting with many guests whose conversations had on him the deepest impression, and which he had not been limited to those of any single form of religious observance.

The bulk of his knowledge of his uncle had thrown many obstacles in the way of his education; but he had so far improved the opportunities which offered themselves, that his instructors as well as his friends were surprised at his progress under such disadvantageous circumstances. But the boy was known by his name of dependence, of poverty, above all, of an imperfect and limited education. These feelings impressed him with a difficulty and reserve which, until actually conversing from all the very intimate friends, the extent of talent and the firmness of character, which we have stated him to be possessed of. The circumstances of the times brought him for the first time in his position to true indifference; for, being attached to neither of the factions which divided the kingdom, he passed for full, inoffensive, and uninfluenced by the feeling of religion or of patriotism. No conclusion, however, could be more unjust; and the reasons of the neutrality which he had hitherto professed had root in very different and most praiseworthy motives. He had formed few congenial ties with those who were the objects of persecution, and was disgusted alike by their narrow-minded and selfish party spirit, their gloomy fanaticism, their abhorrent condemnation of all elegant audaces or innocent exercises, and the envenomed rancour of their political hatred. But his mind was still more revolted by the tyrannical and oppressive conduct of the government, the misuse, license, and brutality of the soldiers, the executions on the scaffold, the slaughters on the open fields, the free quarters and executions imposed by military law, which placed the lives and limbs of all men, and of their parents, and of their slaves. Condemning, therefore, every party as its excesses fell under his eyes, disgusted with the sight of evils which he had no means of alleviating, and heaping down the remnants of his old opinions which he could not sympathize, he would long ere this have left Scotland, had it not been for his attachment to Edith Bellenden.

The earlier meetings of these young people had been at Clarnwood, when Major Bellenden, who was as free from suspicion on such occasions as Uncle Toby himself, had encouraged their keeping each other as near company, as appeared to yield them any apprehension of the natural consequences. Love, as usual in such cases, borrowed the name of friendship, used her language, and claimed her privileges. When Edith Bellenden was recalled to her mother's castle, it was astonishing by what singular and recurring accidents she often met young Morton in her secluded walks, especially considering the distance of their houses from each other. Yet the question was repeated that she never expressed the surprise which the frequency of these encouters ought naturally to have excited, and that their intercourse increased gradually a more decided acquaintance, and that eventually it was to wear the air of appointments. Books, drawings, letters, were exchanged between them, and every trifling commission, given or executed, gave rise to a new correspondence. Love indeed was not yet mentioned between them by name, but each knew the situation of their own bosoms, and could not but guess at that of the other. Unable to desist from an intercourse which, by the very laws of nature, they were by all the laws of nature and the odds, as it were, in their favor, a young lady does, and even when trembling for its too probable consequences, it had been continued without specific explanation until now, when fate appeared to have taken the conclusion into its own hands.

It followed, as a consequence of this state of things, as well as of the disaffection of Morton's disposition at this period, that his confidence in Edith's return of his affection was less strong, but that the acquaintance was in every respect so superior to his own, her worth so eminent, her accomplishments so many, her face so beautiful, and her manners so bewitching, that he could not entertain fears of some way unfavouring himself or her a self to innocence than herself for fortune, and more acceptable to Edith's family than she herself to that of his affection. Common sense and common prudence led Evandale, whom birth, fortune, connexions, and political principles, as well as his frequent visits at Tiltedstead, and his attendance upon Lady Bellenden and her niece at all public places, naturally pointed out as a candidate for her favour. It frequently and inevitably happened, that engagements to which Lord Evandale was a party, interfered with the visits of the ladies; and therefore it was this matter of Edith either studiously avoided speaking of the young nobleman, or did so with obvious reserve and hesitation.

These symptoms, which, in fact, arose from the delicacy of his own feelings towards Morton himself, were misconstrued by the diffident temper, and the jealousy which they excited was fermented by the extraordinary behaviour of the season; and a ruse was true bred serving damsel was, in her own person, a complete country coquette, and when she had no opportunity of teasing her own lovers, used to take some occasional opportunity to torment her young lady's. This arose from no ill-will to Henry Morton, who, both on her mistress's account and his own handsome form and countenance, stood high in her esteem. But then Lord Evandale was also handsome; he was liberal far beyond what Morton's means could afford, and he was a lord, moreover, and, if Miss Edith Bellenden, should accept his hand, she would become a lady, and, what was more, little Jenny Dennis, whom the awful housekeeper at Tiltedstead huffed about at her pleasure, would bethe Mrs. Evandale, Lady Evandale's own woman, or perhaps her ladyship's lady-in-waiting. The imprudence of Jenny Dennis, therefore, did not like that of Mrs. Quickly, extend to a wish that both the handsome suitors could wed her young lady; for it must be owned the climate of Ancil was particularly in favour of Lord Evandale, and her wishes in her favour took many shapes extremely tormenting to Morton: being now expressed as a friendly caution, now as an incitement. On the other hand, Evandale was always tending to confirm the idea, that, sooner or later, his romantic intercourse with young must have a close, and that Edith Bellenden.-------------------- in spite of summer walks beneath the greenwood tree, exchange of verses, of drawings and of books, and in becoming Lady Edith. These limits concluded so exactly with the very point of his own suspicions and fears, that Morton was not long of feeling that jealousy which every one has felt who has truly loved, and which those are prone to whose love is consumed by the want of friend’s consent, or some other evident impediment of fortune. Edith herself, unwittingly, and in the generosity of his own frank nature, contributed to the error into which her lover was in danger of falling. Their conversation once chanced to turn upon some late excesses committed by the soldierly on an occasion which was accurately known, and that the party was commanded by Lord Edvandale. Edith, as true in friendship as in love, was somewhat hurt at the severe strictures which escaped from Morton on this occasion, and which, perhaps, were not the less strongly expressed on account of their supposed rivalry. She entered into Lord Edvandale’s defence with such spirit as hurt Morton to the very soul, and afforded no small delight to Jenny Dinnenson, the usual companion of their walks. Edith perceived her error, and endeavoured to remedy it; but the impression was not so easily erased, and it appeared to consist in a form of the resolution of going abroad, which was disappointed in the manner we have already mentioned.

The visit which he received from Edith during his convalescence, was the deep and devoted interest which she had expressed in his fate, ought of themselves to have dispelled his suspicions; yet, ingenious in tormenting himself, even this he thought might be imputed to anxious regard. At least, which afflicts at once our bodies, souls, estates, and affections! And is it to one of the pensioned cut-throats of this oppressive government that I must yield my pretensions to Edith Bellenden—I will not, by Heaven!—It is a just punishment on me for being dead to public wrongs, that they have visited me with their injuries in a point where they can be least brooked or comforted.

As these stormy resolutions boiled in his bosom, and while he ran over the various kinds of insult and injury which he had sustained in his own cause and that of his country; Bothwell entered the town, followed by two dragons, one of whom carried handcuffs.

“You must follow me, young man,” said he, “but first I must put you in trim.”

“In trim!” said Morton. “What do you mean?”

“Well, we must put on these rough bracelets. I dare not—no, not yet. I dare not do anything—but I would not for three hours’ plunder of a stormed town bring a whig before my Colonel without his being cornered. Come, come, young man, don’t look sulky about it.”

He advanced to put on the irons; but, seizing the octane-seat upon which he had rested, Morton threatened to dash out the brains of the first who should approach him.

“Tut, you’ll cut my arm in a moment, my youngster,” said Bothwell, “but I had rather you would strike out quietly.”

Here indeed he spoke the truth, not from either envy or malice, but because he dreaded the consequences of a noisy scuffle, through which it might probably be discovered that he had, contrary to express orders, suffered his prisoner to pass the night without being properly secured.

“You had better be prudent,” he continued, in a tone which he meant to be conciliatory, “and don’t spoil your own sport. They say here in the castle that the Lady Margaret’s niece is immediately to marry our young Captain, Lord Edvandale. I saw them close together in the hall yonder, and I heard her ask him to intercede for your pardon. She looked so devilish handsome and kind upon him that my soul—But what the devil’s the matter with you?—You are as pale as a sheet—Will you have some brandy?”

“Miss Bellenden ask my life of Lord Edvandale?” said the prisoner, simply.

“Ay, ay; there’s no friend like the women—the interest carries all in court and camp—Come ye, you are reasonable now—Ay, I thought you would come round.”

Here he employed himself in putting on the fetters against which, Morton, thunderstruck by the intelligence of what he inferred, offered the least resistance.

“My life beggared of him, and by her!”—ay, ay, on the irons—my limbs shall not refuse to bear what has entered into my very soul—My life beggared of Edith, and beggarded of Edvandale!”

“Ay, and he has power to grant it too,” said Bothwell. “He can do more with the Colonel than a man in the regiment.”

And as he spoke, he and his party led their prisoner towards the hall. In passing behind the seat of that unfortunate prisoner heard enough, as he cascaded, of the broken expressions which passed between the two parties, to give faith that the soldier had told him. That moment saw a singular and instantaneous revolution in character. The depth of despair which his ill-used body had reached, and the wretchedness in which poverty appeared to stand, the transference of Edith’s affection, her intercession in his favour, which made her flinchness yet more galling, seemed to detach her from every feeling of respect for wrongs. In the same time, awakened those which had hitherto been smothered, by passions more gentle than more selfish. Desperate himself, he determined to support the cause of his own person. His character was for the moment as effectually changed as the appearance of a vixen, which, for being the slave of domestic quiet and happiness, by the sudden intrusion of an enemized force, comes into a formidable pest of defence.

We have already said that he cast upon this last glance in which reproach was mingled with scorn, as if to bid her farewell forever; his next move was to walk firmly to the table at which Lord Grahame was seated.

“By what right is it, sir,” said he firmly, “without my knowledge he was questioned? By what right is it that these soldiers have dragged me from my family, and put fetters on the limbs of a fee man?”

“By my commands,” answered Cleaverhouse; and I now lay my commands on you to be silent in hearing my questions.”

“I will not,” replied Morton, in a determined way, while his holiness seemed to electrify all around him. I will know whether I am in lawful custody, as before a civil magistrate, ere the charter of my country shall be forfeited in my person.”

“A pretty springalt this, upon my honour!” said Cleaverhouse.

“Are you mad?” said Major Bellenden to his young friend. “For God’s sake, Henry Morton, you continued in it to the end of rebuke and entreaty, as no man was speaking to one of his majesty’s officers high in the service.”

“Is it for that very reason, sir,” returned he firmly, “that I desire to know what right he has in a legal warrant, and to an officer of the law who should know my duty to him.”

“My friend, here,” said Cleaverhouse to the rear, coolly, “is one of those scrupulous gentlemen who, like the madman in the play, will not be craven without the warrant of Mr. Justice Dacar; but I will let him see, before we part, and my shadow have gone as legal habeas corpus as the cause of the Justice. So, warring the discussion, you will be pleased, young man, to speak directly when you saw Colonel of the Hay.”
As I know no right you have to ask such a question," replied Morton, "I decline replying to it.

"You confused to my sergeant," said Claverhouse, "I am not a man who forgets such debts—yon will delight me by showing how I can evince my gratitude." I will hold the debt cancelled," said Lord Evandale, "if you will spare this young man's life."

"Evandale," replied Grahame, in great surprise, "you are mad—absolutely mad—what interest can you have in this young swain of an old roundhead? His father was positively the most dangerous man in all Scotland, cool, resolute, solitary, and inflexible in his cursed principles. His son seems his very model; you cannot conceive the mischief he may do. I am mankind, Evandale—were he an insignificant, fanatical, country booby, do you think I would have refused such a trifle as his life to Lady Margaret and this family? But this is a lad of fire, zeal, and education—and these knaves want but such a leader to direct their blind enthusiastic hardihood. I mention this, not as refusing your request, but to make you aware of the possible consequences—I will not evade a promise, or refuse to return an obligation—if you ask his life, he shall have it.

"Keep him close prisoner," answered Evandale, "but do not hang him if I am inquiring: you will not put him to death. I have most urgent reasons for what I ask."

"Be it so then," replied Grahame; "but, young man, should you attempt to force your future life to eminence in the service of your king and country, let it be your first task to subject to the public interest, and to the discharge of your duty, your private passions, effects of education. If you are resolved to sacrifice to the dungage of graybeards, or the tears of silly women, the measures of salutary severity which the dangers around compel us to adopt. And remember, that if I am exasperated in this point, it is on your urgency, my present concession must exempt me from future solicitations of the same nature."

He then stepped forward to the table, and bent his eyes keenly on Morton, as if to observe what effect the pause of awful suspense between death and life, which seemed to freeze the bystanders with horror, would produce upon the prisoner himself. Morton maintained a degree of firmness, which nothing but a mind that had nothing left upon earth to love or to hope, could have supported at such a crisis.

"You see him," said Claverhouse, in a half whisper to Lord Evandale. "He is too orderly to permit the variety between time and eternity, a situation more appalling than the most hideous certainty; yet his is the only check unblench'd, the only eye that is calm, the only heart that knows not what is joy and what is despair."

"If that man shall ever come to head an army of rebels, you will have much to answer for on account of this morning's work," he then said aloud. "Young man, your life is for the present safe, through the intercession of your friends—Remove him, Bothwell, and let him be properly guarded, and brought along with the other prisoners."

"If my life," said Morton, with the idea that he owed his respite to the intercession of a favourite rival, "If my life be granted at Lord Evandale's request?"

"Take the prisoner away, Bothwell," said Colonel Grahame, interrupting him; "I have neither time to make nor to hear fine speeches."

Bothwell forced off Morton, saying, as he conducted him into the court-yard, "Have you three lives in your pocket, besides the one in your body, my lord, that you can afford to let your tongue run away with you? In the present case, you must keep you out of the Colonel's way; for, egad, you will not be five minutes with him before the next tree or the next ditch will be the word. So, come along to your business in a handomely dignified manner."

Thus speaking, the sergeant, who, in his rude manner, did not altogether want sympathy for a gallant young man, hurried Morton down to the court-yard, where three other prisoners, two men and a woman, who had been taken by Lord Evandale, remained under an escort of dragoons.

Meantime, Claverhouse took his leave of Lady Johnson, and went for a good lady to forgive his neglect of her intercession.

"I have thought a while now," she said, "that the Tower of Tilletudem might have been a place of safety for the King that a ready to perish, even if they werea sae deserving as they should have been—but I see auld fruit has little savour—our suffering and our services have been of an ancient date."

"I shall be happy to hear of your success, Colonel," said Major Bellenden; "but take an old soldier's advice, and spare blood when battle's over,—and once more let me request to enter ball for young Morton."

"We will settle that when I return," said Claverhouse. "Meanwhile be assured his life shall be safe."

During this conversation, Eydevale looked anxiously around for Edith; but the precaution of Jenny Dening was effective; her heart and the watchword hastened to the court-yard. The prisoners with their guard were already on their march, and the officers with their escort mounted and followed. All pressed forward to protect the girl, as it was supposed they would come in sight of the enemy in a little more than two hours.

CHAPTER XIV.

My hounds must a' rin masterless. My hawks may fly free tree to tree, My lord may gripp my vassal lands, For there again maun I never be—Old Ballad.

We left Morton, along with three companions in captivity, travelling in the custody of a small body of soldiers, who formed the rear-guard of the column under the command of Claverhouse, and were immediately followed by a succession of stragglers. The route lay towards the hills in which the insurgent presbyterians were reported to be in arms. They had not prosecuted their march a quarter of a mile ere Claverhouse and Eydevale past them, followed by their orderly-men, in order to take their proper places in the column which preceded them. No sooner were they past than Bothwell halted the body which he commanded, and disencumbered Morton of his iron.

"King's blood must keep word," said the dragoon.

"I promised you should be civilly treated as far as rests with me."—Here, Corporal Inglis, let this gentleman ride alongside of the other young fellow who is prisoner; and you may permit them to converse together at their pleasure, under their breath, but take care they do not ride by two lines of loaded carriages. If they attempt an escape, blow their brains out.—You cannot call that using uncivilly," he continued, addressing himself to Morton. "It's the rule to treat him as you please. If you tie up the pensioner and the old woman, they are fittest company for each other, d—n me; a single file may guard them well enough. If they speak a word of caft or far, you'll take a course to let them have a cut. I'll go in, and I'll give them a shoulder-belt. There's some hope of choking a silenced pensioner; if he is not allowed to hold forth, his arm will burst him,"

Having made this arrangement, Bothwell placed himself at the head of the party, and Inglis, with six dragoons, brought up the rear. The whole then set forward with the purpose of taking the amin body of the regiment.

Morton, overwhelmed with a complication of feel-
OLD MORTALITY.

"It would be very strange if you did," answered Morton, with suppressed emotion.

"And was it like worst o' a," continued poor Cuddie, "is that wany red-coats coming among the lasseis, and taking awa our joes. I hae a sair heart o' my ain when I passed the Mains down at Bishop Hill, looking about parrich-time, and saw the reck comin' out at me. I thought I could ken there was someither body than a mither mither sitting by the ingle-side. But I think my heart was een saur, for when I saw that hellicat trooper, Tam Halliday, kissing Jenny Dennisoun in front o' me, I wonder women can hae the impudence to do such things, but they are a' for the red-coats. Whiles I hae thought o' being a soldier, I hae nother o' my thoughts, and nothing else was gae down wi' Jenny—and yet I'll no blame her ower muckle neither, for maybe it was a' for my sake that she loot Tam touzel her tap-knots that gate."

"For your sake?" said Morton, unable to refrain from taking some interest in a story which seemed to bear a singular coincidence with his own.

"E'en sae, Milnwood," replied Cuddie; "for the pur quean got leave to come near me wi' speaking the loun fair, (—d—n him, that I saul say sae!) and sae she bade me God speed, and she wanted to stop affer into my hand;—I wassent it was the tae half o' her fee and the tae half o' her pinnie and the tae half o' her derriere wi' pins and pearls and things to see us aroon you day at the popinjay."

"And did you take it, Cuddie?" said Morton.

"Troth o' course! Milnwood; I would a' flung it back to her—my heart was ower grieved to be behadden to her, when I hae seen that loon slavering and kissing at her. But I was a great rule for my pains; it was hame to my mitre and my monse guise, and she wunt' a' on duds and nonsense."

There was here a deep and long pause. Cuddie was probably engaged in regretting the rejection of his mistress's love, and in pondering over the reasons for it, deriving from what motives, or upon what conditions, Miss Bellenden had succeeded in procuring the interference of Lord Evandale in his favour.

Was it not possible, he suggested his awakening hopes, that he had constrained her influence over Lord Evandale hastily and unjustly? Ought he to molest her severely, if, submitting to dissimulation for his sake, she had permitted the young nobleman to entertain hopes which she had no intention to realize? Or what if she had appealed to the generosity which Lord Evandale was supposed to possess, and had engaged her honour to protect the person of a favoured rival?

Still, however, the words which he had overheard recurred ever and anon to his remembrance, with a pang which seemed to grow with the dying of his hope.

"Nothing that she could refuse him!—was it possible to make a more unlimited declaration of predestination!—all language of affection has not, within the limits of mundanity, a stronger expression. She is lost to me wholly, and for ever; and nothing remains for me now, but vengeance for my own wrongs, and for those which are hourly inflicted on my country."

Apparently, Cuddie, though with less refinement, was following out a similar train of ideas; for he suddenly asked Morton in a low whisper, "Where there be any ill in getting out o' thae chields' hands ane could compass it?"

"None in the world," said Morton; "and if an opportunity of doing so, depend on it for I one will not let it slip."

"I'm by the hear ye sae sae," answered Cuddie.

"I'm but a pair silly fellow, but I canna think there will be much good in taking advantage of such an hand, if ye could make it any thing feasible. I am the lad that will never fear to lay on, if it were come to that; but our aud leddy hae made that a resisting o' th' hands."

"I will resist any authority on earth," said Morton, "that invades tyrannically my charted rights as a freeman; and I am determined I will not be unjustly deprived, or have a child's hand or neck, possibly make my escape from these men either by address or force."
echoed the shrill counter-tenor of Mause, falling in like the second part of a catch.

"I tell thee, if these are things that only belong to the like o' you that are a gentleman, and it mightna bear through me that am but a husbandman.

"I do not care that I speak of," said Morton, "is as common to the meanest Scotswoman. It is that freedom from stripes and bondage which was claimed, as you may read in Scripture, by the Apostle Paul himself, and which every man who is free-born is called upon to defend, for his own sake and that of his countrymen."

"Heigh, aye!" replied Cuddie, "it was hae been langer, Ledy Marmont, or my mother either, wad ha' fund out sic a wiselike doctrine in the Bible! The tane was eye graining about giving tribute to Caesar, and theither is as daft wi' her whiggery. I hae been clean spilt, just wi' listening to twa blithering auld wives; but if I could get a gentleman that wad let me tak on to be his servand, I am confident I wad be a clean contrary creature; and I hope your honour will think on what I am saying, if ye were ance fairly delivered o' this house of bondage, and just take me to be your ain wally-de-shaill." (N. B. Cuddie answered Morton, "alas! that would be sorry preferment, even if we were at liberty."

"I ken what you're thinking—that because I amLang, I am auld and cannot be bending ye to do aye, as aforeside; but ye maun ken I'm gay gleg at the up-tak; there was never any thing dune wi' hand but I learned gay readly, 'sept reading, writing, and ciphering; but in the first of the latter two, I can play wi' the broadsword as well as as Corporal Ingleth. I hae broken his head now, for as massy as he's riding shite us. And then ye'll never beggar sot to say against a country?"—said he, interrupting and sumptipartly.

"Probably not," replied Morton.

"Wec, I careen a boddle. Yo ken I wad get my mother out o' the yeilding little, sumpt Meg, in the Galgogaye o' Glasgow, and then I trust they wad neither burn her for a witch, or let her fall for for the athole entirely, or hang her up for an auld witch; for the provest, they say, is very regardful o' suchs poor bodies. And then you and me wad gang and possess our fortunes, like the folk i' the daft auld tales about Jock the Giant-killer and Valiente and Orson; and we wad be as well as the prelates at the whin that the says, and I wad tak to the stits again, and turn sic furson on the bonny rigs o' Minfold holus, that it wad be worth a pint but to look at them."

"Hout, sir; that's a strange notion," replied Cuddie, "'tis aye gude to keep up a hardy heart—as broken a ship's come to land. But what's that I hear? Never stir, if my auld mother aye at the preaching again! I ken the nach o' her texts, that sound just like the wind blawing through the scone; and there's Kettledrummich setting to work, too—Lordaiske, if the sodgers aye get angry, they'll murder them baith, and us for company!"

Such a conversation was in fact interrupted by a blatant noise which rose behind them in which the voice of the preacher emitted, in unison with that of the old woman, tunes like the grumble of a horse sooon combined with the shrieking of a cracked candle. At first, the aged pair of sufferers had been contented to content with each other in smothered expressions of complaint and indignation; but the sense of their injury being thus conveyed to them was the more communicated with each other, and they became at length unable to suppress their ire.

"Wo, wo, and a thousand wo unto you, ye bloody and execrable Kettle-drummers!—'Wo, and thousand wo unto you, even to the breaking of seals, the blowing of trumpets, and the pouring forth of thistles!—" cried Cuddie, "be quiet to all them auld dead, and the outside o' the loot at the last day!"
taken in consequence of the corporal’s motion, a dragoon galloped towards Sergeant Bothwell, who was considerably a head of the party he commanded. On hearing the orders which he brought, Bothwell hastened after him, and, by the head of a swamp, forced them to close their files, to mend their pace, and to move with silence and precaution, as they would soon be in presence of the enemy.

CHAPTER XV.

Questions in order: we’ve thought good
To save the horsemen from a bloody heel.

And try if we, by mediation
Of our accommodation
Can end the quarrel, and compose
This bloody duel without blood.

BUTLER.

The increased pace of the party of horsemen soon took away from their zeal that captivates the horsemen, if not the inclination, necessary for holding forth. They had now for more than a mile got free of the woodlands, whose broken glades had, for some time, accompanied them after they had left the woods of Tultimo, over which they had made their way, hissing through the narrow ravines, or occupied in dwarf-clusters the hollow plains of the moor. But these were gradually disappearing; and a wide and waste country lay before them, bare hills of heather, interspersed with deep gullies; being the passages by which torrents forced their course in winter, and during summer the dispossessed channels for diminutive rivulets, which, however, swarmed black with stones and gravel, the effects and tokens of their winter fury;—like so many spectrals dwindled down by the consequences of former excesses and extravagance. This desolate region seemed to extend farther than the eye could reach, without grandeur, without even the dignity of mountain wildness, yet striking, from the huge proportion which it seemed to bear to the size of the country, and, as it were, as adapted to cultivation, and fitted for the support of man; and thereby impressing irresistibly the mind of the spectator with a sense of the omnipotence of nature, and the comparative inefficacy of the boasted means of amelioration which man is capable of opposing to the disadvantages of climate and soil.

It is a remarkable effect of such extensive wastes, that they impose an idea of solitude even upon those who travel through them in considerable numbers; so much is the imagination affected by the disproportion between the desert around and the party who are traversing it. For the number of ten thousand souls may feel, in the deserts of Africa or Arabia, a sense of loneliness unknown to the individual traveller, whose solitary course is through a thriving and populous country. It was not, therefore, without a peculiar feeling of emotion, that Morton beheld, at the distance of about half a mile, the body of the cavalry to which his escort belonged, crowning a steep and winding path which ascended from the more level moor into the hills. Their numbers, which appeared formidable as they crowded through narrow roads, and seemed multiplied by appearing partially, and at different points, among the trees, were now apparitely diminished by being exposed at once to view, and in a landscape whose extent bore such immense proportion to the columns of men and animals, which, glowing more like a drove of black cattle than a body of soldiers, crawled slowly along the face of the hill, their force and their numbers seeming trifling and contemptible. It is said, Morton, in my band, all of us of resolute men may defend any defile in these mountains against such a small force as this is, providing that their bravery is equal to their enthusiasm.

While he made these reflections, the rapid movement of the horsemen who guarded him soon traversed the space which divided them from their companions; and ere the front of Claverhouse’s column had gained the summit of the hill where they had been ascending. Bothwell with his rear-guard and prisoners, had united himself, or nearly so, with the main body led by his commander. The extreme difficulty of the road, which was in some places steep, and in others boggy, retarded the progress of the column, especially in the rear; for the passage of the main body, in many instances, poached up the swamps through which they passed, and rendered them so deep that the east of the further legions, or to plough them through morasses and swamps.

"Through the help of the Lord I have lapped over a wall," cried poor Mausie, as her horse was, by rude attendants, brought up to leap the turf encircling a desert fold, in which her curch flew off, leaving her grey hairs uncovered.

I am sunk in deep mire where there is no standing
—I am come into deep waters where the floods over-flow me," exclaimed Kettledrumme, as the chargers on which he was mounted plunged up to the saddle-girths in a small head, as the springs are called, which supply the moor with the waters that spare the face and person of the captive preacher.

These exclamations excited shouts of laughter among the soldiers, and the country people, who had occurred which rendered them all sufficiently serious.

The leading files of the regiment had nearly attained the brow of the steep hill we have mentioned, when two or three of them, on hearing the neighing of part of their own advanced guard, who had acted as a patrol, appeared returning at full gallop, their horses much blown, and the men apparently in a disordered flight. They were followed upon the spur by five or six riders, well armed with sword and pistol, who halted upon the top of the hill, on observing the approach of the Life-Guards. One or two of which had carbines and pistols discharged, and deliberate aim at the foremost rank of the regiment, discharged their pieces, by which two troopers were wounded, one severely. They then mounted their horses, and disappeared over the ridge of the hill, retreating with so much coolness as evidently showed that, on one hand, they were undismayed by the approach of so considerable a force as was moving against them, and conscious, on the other, that they were supported by numbers sufficient for their protection. This incident occasioned a halt through the whole body of cavalry; and while Claverhouse himself remained in the rear, a body of horse, which had been thus driven back upon the main body, Lord Evandale advanced to the top of the ridge over which the enemy’s horsemen had retired, and Major Allan, of the Cornet of Life-Guards, and the other officers who had placed themselves in extricating the regiment from the broken ground, and drawing them up on the side of the hill in two lines, the one to support the other.

The word was then given to advance; and in a few minutes the first lines stood on the brow and commanded the prospect on the other side. The second line closed upon them, and also the rear-guard with the prisoners; so that Morton and his companions in captivity could, in like manner, see the form of opposition which was now offered to the farther progress of their captors.

The form of the hill, on which the royal Life-Guards were now drawn up, sloped downwards (on the side opposite to that which they had ascended) with a gentle declivity, for more than a quarter of a mile, and descended more gradually, though unequal in some places, was not altogether unfavourable for the manoeuvres of cavalry, until near the bottom, when the slope terminated in a marshy level, traverses through which were divided by wide and deep water, covered by springs, trenches filled with water, out of which peats and turf had been dug, and which here and there had formed an artificial natural gully, or a deep artificial drain, the sides of which were broken by springs, trenches filled with water, out of which peats and turf had been dug, and which here and there had formed an artificial natural gully, or a deep artificial drain, the into a second heathy swell, or rather hill, near to the foot of which, and as if with the object of defending the broken ground and ditch that covered their front, the body of insurgents appeared to be drawn up with the purpose of abiding battle.

Their infantry was divided into three lines. The first, tolerably provided with fire-arms, were advanced almost close to the verge of the bog, so that their fire must necessarily annoy the royal cavalry as they descended upon it in full, the whole of whom was exposed, and would probably be yet more fatal if they attempted to cross the morass. Bounding this first line was a body of pikemen, designed for their support in case of the fire-arms being shut up by the passage of the marsh. In their rear was their third line, consisting of countrymen armed with scythes set straight on poles, lye-forks, spits, clubs, goats, fish-spearers, and such other rustic implements as hasty resuscitation had converted into instruments of war. On each flank of the infantry, but a little backward from the bog, as to allow themselves dry and sound ground wherein to act in case their enemies should force the pass, there was drawn up a small body of cavalry, who, were, in general, but indifferently armed, and worse mounted, but full of zeal for the cause, being chiefly either artizans, or people of the better class, whose means enabled them to serve on horseback. A few of those who had been engaged in driving back the fishermen might now be seen returning slowly towards their own squadrons. These were the only individuals of the insurgent army which seemed to be in motion. All the other men and women were as the gray stones that lay scattered on the heath around them.

The total number of the insurgents might amount to about a thousand men; but of these there were scarce a hundred cavalry, nor were the half of them even tolerably armed. The strength of their position, however, the sense of their having taken a desperate step, the superiority of their numbers, but, above all, the newness of their story, were perhaps in some degree the means on which their leaders reckoned, for supplying the want of arms, equipment, and military discipline.

On the side of the hill that rose above the array of battle which they had adopted, were seen the women and even the children, whom zeal, opposed to persecution, had driven into the wilderness. They seemed stationed there to be spectators of the engagement, by which their own fate, as well as that of their parents, husbands, and sons, was to be decided. Like the females of the ancient German tribes, the shrill cries which they raised, when they beheld the glittering ranks of the enemy appear on the opposite side. The chiming of their voices, as an incentive to their relatives to fight to the last in defence of that which was dearest to them, and to their exhortations seemed to have their full and emphatic echo, for a sound of voices, which went from rank to rank on the appearance of the soldiers, intimated the resolution of the insurgents to fight to the uttermost.

As the horsemen halted their lines on the ridge of the hill, their trumpets and kettle-drums sounded a bold and warlike flourish of menace and defiance, that rang along the waste like the shrill summons of a destroying angel. The waderers, in answer, united their voices, and sent forth, in solemn modulation, the two first versets of the seventy-sixth Psalm, according to the metrical version of the Scottish Kirk:

\[\text{In Jonah's land God is well known.} \\ \text{His name is Israel great.} \\ \text{Solemn is his tabernacle,} \\ \text{In Zion is his seat.} \\
\text{There arrows of the bow he brake,} \\ \text{The shield, the sword, the we.} \\ \text{Sovereigns thus they have of prey,} \\
\text{More excellent art far.} \]

A shout or rather a solemn acclamation, attended the close of the stanza, and after a dead pause, the second verse was repeated. Thus, and applied the destruction of the Assyrians as prophetical of the issue of their own impetuous contest:

\[\text{Those that were about of heart are spoil'd,} \\
\text{They slept their deep disgust.} \]

There was another acclamation, which was followed by the most profound silence.

While these solemn sounds, accented by a thousand voices, were proceeding amid the smoke which Claverhouse looked with great attention on its ground and on the order of battle which the wavers had adopted, and in which they determined to await the issue of the struggle.

"The curst," he said, "must have some old soldiers with them; it was no rustic that made choice of that ground."

"Burley is said to be with them for certain," answered Lord Evanisle, "and also Hackaton of Falshe, Paton of Meadowhead, Cleland, and some other men of military skill."

"Judged as much," said Claverhouse, "from the style in which these detached horsemen kept their horses over the ditch, as they returned to their position. It was easy to see that there were a few armed troopers and a greater number of the troopers of the old Covenant. We must manage this matter urly as well as boldly. Evanisle, let the officers come to this knoll."

He moved to a small moss-grown promontory, probably the resting-place of some Celtic chief of other times, and the calls of "Officers to the front," soon brought them around him: there was a place for action, as the gray stones that lay scattered on the heath around them.

"I do not call you around me, gentlemen," said Claverhouse, "in the formal capacity of a council of war, for I will never turn over on others the responsibility which my rank imposes on myself. I can only promise you that I shall mix them in the heat of the action, to clear the way of the young vouner. You are youngest and hottest, and therefore will speak first whether I will or no."

"Then," said Cornet Graham, "while I have the honour to carry the standard of the Life-guard, I shall never, with my will, retreat before rebels. I set charge, in God's name and the King's!"

"And what say you, Allan?" continued Claverhouse; "for Evanisle is so modest, we shall never get him to speak till you have said what you have to say."

"These fellows," said Major Allan, an old cavalry officer of experience, "are three or four to one—I should not mind that much upon a fair field, but they are posted in a very formidable strength, and give no intimation to quit it. I therefore think, as a defence of Cornet Graham, that we shall draw back to Tilletudlem, occupy the pass between the hills and the open country, and send reinforcements to my Lord Boss, who is lying at Glasgow with a regiment of infantry. In this way we should cut them off from the Struth of Clyde, and either compel them to come out of their strongholds and give us battle on fair terms, or if they retreat here, we will attack them so soon as our infantry has joined us, and enable us to act with effect against these ditches, bogs, and quagmires."

"Pahaw," said the young Cornet, "what signifies strong ground, when it is only held by a crew of cawing, psalm-singing old women! A man may fight never the worse," retorted Major Allan, "for honouring both his Bible and Psalms. These fellows will prove as stubborn as steel; I know them of old."

"Their nasal psalmody," said the Cornet, "reminds our Major of the race of Dunbar."

"Had you been at that race, young man," retorted Allan, "you would have wanted nothing to recall you for the longest day you have to live."

"Hush, Cornet," said the reverend Major, "there are untimely reportes. I should like your adress well, Major Allan, had our rascally patrol (who will see only punish'd) brought us timely notice of the enemy's numbers and position. But having se nent ourselves before them in line, the retreat of Life-Guards would have been提早, and at the order of Col. Grahame, who was also in command of the Commandant; and the first flag—the rascals never saw such a pennant of Flanders rise in their lives before.
OLD MORTALITY.

"Colonel Graham," said Evandale, while the young officer prepared for his expedition, "this young gentleman is your nephew and your apparent heir; for God's sake, permit me to go. It was my counsel, and I sought to stave off the time, but I must be some gashes or passes in the morass in which we can force our way; and we were on firm ground, I trust there is no man in the junto then. If Dick Grahame, though so many years, are unable to trample into dust the number of these unpractised clowns—say you, my Lord Evandale?"

"Rumrumbly," said Lord Evandale, "that go the way it will, it must be a bloody one; and that we lose many brave fellows, and probably be obliged to fight a great number of these misguided men, after all, are Scotchmen and subjects of King as well as we are."

"Selves! rebels! and undeserving the name either of men or of subjects," said Claverhouse; "come, my lord, what does your opinion of such a-enter into a treaty with these ignorant and evil-men," said the young nobleman.

"Trente! and with rebels having arms in their hands? Never while I live," answered his commander.

"least send a trumpet and flag of truce, summing them to lay down their weapons and disperse a thousand in the promise of a free pol— I have always heard, that had that been before the battle of Pentland hills, much blood have been saved."

"If not Claverhouse, and who the devil doink would carry a summons to these head—the desperate fanatics? They acknowledge as war. Their leaders, who have been all active in the murder of the Archbishop of St. Annes, fight with a rope round their necks, and ready to kill the messenger, were it but to take flowerers in loyal blood, and to make them as a rate of parols as themselves."

"I will go myself," said Evandale, "if you will give me, I have often risked my blood to spill that of others, let me do so now in order to save human beings."

"You shall not go on such an errand, my lord," said Claverhouse; "your rank and situation render such a move to the country age when good principles are so rare—Here's a motion being made in the conspicuous object of attention to both armies; and, without disarming to the cause of either, it is probably there was a general wish on both sides that this embassy might save the risks and bloodshed of the impending conflict."

"When he had arrived right opposite to those, who, by their advancing to receive his message, seemed to take upon themselves as the leaders of the enemy, Cornet Grahame commanded his trumpeter to sound a parley. The insurgents having no instrument of martial music whatever to make the thing appear more effectually, one of their number called out with a loud, strong voice, demanding to know why he approached their leaders."

"Do you summon you in the King's name, and in that of Colonel John Grahame of Claverhouse, slain in the battle of Drumclog, in the old ballad on the Battle of 3 Bridge, Claverhouse is said to have continued the er of the fugitives in revenge of this gentleman's death."

"Head up your hand," then Moumouh said; "He is a man to these men for—"

"But bloody Claverhouse were an oath."

"Not a death avenged should be; body of this young man was found shockingly mangled in a battle, his eyes pulled out, and his features so much mutilated, that it was impossible to recognize him."

"Cornet Grahame's body being found in the field, having been brought home to Edinburgh by one of his relatives with a view to obtain some information as to the circumstances of his death."

"Two stories are presented to the reader, leaving it to judge whether it is most likely that a party of parishioners and farmers should manage a body of their chief enemy, in the same manner as several persons, already cited, that retreating would have avoided the bishop's displeasure, or that a domestic dog should, for want of breakfast, become so ferocious as to feed on his own

CHAP TE R XVII.

With many a stout thrash and many a bang,
Hard crate-boat and old iron rang.

Corney Richard Grahame descended the hill, bearing in his hand the extemporize flag of truce, and making his mounted horse keep time by bounds and cavorts to the tune of which he whistled, while Peter followed. Five or six horsemen, having seen the appearance of officers, detached themselves from each flank of the Presbyterian army, and, meeting in the centre, approached the ditch which divided the hollow as near as the morass would permit. Towards this group, but keeping the opposite side of the swamp, Cornet Grahame directed his horse, his motions being now the conspicuous object of attention to both armies; and, without dispellement to the cause of either, it is probable there was a general wish on both sides that this embassy might save the risks and bloodshed of the impending conflict.

"When he had arrived right opposite to those, who, by their advancing to receive his message, seemed to take upon themselves as the leaders of the enemy, Cornet Grahame commanded his trumpeter to sound a parley. The insurgents having no instrument of martial music whatever to make the thing appear more effectually, one of their number called out with a loud, strong voice, demanding to know why he approached their leaders."
“I did not come to hear you preach,” answered the officer, “but to know, in one word, if you will disperse yourselves, on condition of a free pardon to the murderers of the late Archbishop of St. Andrews; or whether you will abide the attack of his majesty’s forces, which will instantly advance upon you.”

“In one word, then,” answered the spokesman, “we are here with our swords on our thighs, as men that watch in the night. We will take one part and portion together, as brethren in righteousness. Whitney vouches for us in our good cause, his blood be on his own head. So return to them that sent thee, and God give them and thee a sight of the evil of your ways!”

“Is not your name,” said the Cornet, who began to recollect having seen the person whom he was now speaking with, “John Balfour of Burley?”

“And if it be,” said the spokesman, “last thou ought to say against it?”

“Only,” said the Cornet, “that, as you are excluded from pardon in the name of the King and of my commanding officer, it is to these country people, and not to you, that I offer it; and it is given to you, or such as you, that I am sent to treat.”

“Youth a young soldier, friend,” said Burley, “and scant well learned in thy trade, or thou wouldst know of this a little more!”

“I am not to be intimidated from the discharge of my duty by the menace of a murderer,” said Cornet. “Thou dost wrong me, good people; I proclaim, in the name of the King and of my commanding officer, full and free pardon to all, excepting...”

“Then the Lord grant grace to thy soul—amen!” said Burley.

With these words he fired, and Cornet Richard Graham dropped from his horse. The shot was mortal. The unfortunate young gentleman had only strength to turn himself on the ground and mutter forth. “My poor mother!” when life forsook him in a few moments. He asked me, good people; I proclaim, in the name of the King and of my commanding officer, full and free pardon to all, excepting...”

“What have you done?” said one of Balfour’s brothers.

“My duty,” said Balfour, firmly. “Is not written. Thou shalt be zealous even to slaying? Let those, who dare, now venture to speak of truce or pardon!”

Claverhouse saw his nephew fall. He turned his eye on Evandale, while a transitory glance of indescribable emotion disturbed, for a second’s space, the serenity of his features, and briefly said, “You see the event.”

“I will avenge him, or die!” exclaimed Evandale, and, putting his horse into motion, rode furiously down the hill, followed by his own troop, and that of the deceased Cornet, which broke down without orders; and, each striving to be the foremost to revenge their young officer, their ranks soon fell into confusion. These forces formed the first line of the royalists. It was in vain that Claverhouse exclaimed, “Halt! halt! this rashness will undo us. It was all that he could accomplish, by galloping about the plain, and entreating his men to follow him, and even menacing the men with his sword, that he could restrain them from following an example so contagious.”

As he said, as soon as he had rendered the men in some degree more steady, “lead them slowly down the hill to support Lord Evandale, who is about to need it very much.—Bothwell, thou art a cool and a daring fellow!”

“Ay,” muttered Bothwell, “you can remember that in a moment of the truth!”

Bothwell made a signal of intelligence and obedience, and moved off with his party at a rapid pace. Meanwhile, the disaster which Claverhouse apprehended, did not fail to take place. The troopers, who, with Lord Evandale, had rushed down upon the enemy, soon found their disorderly career interrupted by the impracticable character of the ground. Some stuck fast in the morass as they attempted to struggle through, some recoiled from the attempt and remained on the brink, others dispersed to seek a more favourable place to pass the swamp. In the midst of this confusion, the first line of the enemy, of which the foremost rank knelt, the second stooped, and the third stood upright, poured in a close and destructive volley that emptied at least a score of saddles, and increased tenfold the disorder into which the horsemen had fallen. Lord, Evandale, in the meantime, at the head of a very few well-mounted men, had galloped as rapidly as he could towards the opposite bank of the river faster across than he was charged by the left body of the enemy’s cavalry, who, encouraged by the small number of opponents that had made their way through the broken ground, set upon them with increasing fury, crying, “Wo, wo to the unmerciful Philistines! down with Dagon and all his adherents!”

The young nobleman fought like a lion; but most of his followers were killed, and he could not have escaped the same fate but for a heavy fire of carbines, which Claverhouse, who had now advanced with the second line near to the ditch, poured so effectively upon the enemy, that the horsemen, for a moment began to shrink, and Lord Evandale, disengaged from his unequal combat, and finding himself nearly alone, took the opportunity to effect his retreat through the morass. But notwithstanding the loss they had sustained by Claverhouse’s first fire, the insurgents became soon aware that the advantage of numbers and position were so decidedly theirs, that, if they could but persist in making a bold but resolved resistance, the Life-Guards must necessarily be defeated. Their leaders flew through their ranks, exhorting them to stand firm, and pointing out how efficaciously the left body of the enemy were exposed to it; for the troopers, according to custom, fired without having dismounted. Claverhouse, more than once, when he perceived his best men dropping from the fire with which the King was immediately return, made desperate efforts to pass the bog at various points, and renew the battle on firm ground and firmer terms. But the close fire of the insurgents joined to the natural difficulties of the place, foiled his attempts in every point.

“We must retreat,” he said to Evandale, “unless Bothwell can effect a diversion in our favour. In the meantime, draw the men out of fire, and leave skirmishers behind these patches of alder-bushes to keep the enemy in check.”

These directions being accomplished, the appearance of Bothwell’s troopers was eagerly expected. But Bothwell had his own disadvantages to struggle with. His detour to the right had not escaped the penetrating observation of Burley, who made a corresponding movement with the left wing of the mounted insurgents, so that when Bothwell, after riding a considerable way up the valley, found a place at which the bog could be passed, though with some difficulty, he found himself opposed by a superior enemy. His daring character was in no degree checked by this unexpected opposition.

“Follow me, my lads!” he called to his men: “never let it be said that we turned our backs before these canting roundheads!”

With that, as inspired by the spirit of his ancestors, he shouted, “Bothwell! Bothwell!” and throwing himself into the morass, he struggled through it...”
at the head of his party, and attacked that of Burley with such fury, that he drove them back above a pis tol-shot, killing three men with his own hand. Burley, perceiving the consequences of a defeat on this point, and that his troops nearer home were unequal to the regulars in using their arms and managing their horses, threw himself across Bothwell's way, and attacked him hard to hand. Each of the combatants was a considerable of his respective party, and a result ensued more usual in romance than in real story. Their followers, can neither side instantly paused, and looked on as if the fate of the day would be determined by the excitement of the combat between these two redoubled soldiers. The combatants themselves seemed of the same opinion.

"You are the murdering villain, Burley," said Bothwell, gripping his sword firmly, and setting his teeth close—"you escaped me once, but—" (too aware with which, and anxious to be written down)—"you head is worth its vice again, and shall be on my saddle-bow, or my saddle shall go home empty for me.""I swear Burley, with stern and gloomy deliberation, "I am that John Balfour, who promised to lay thy head when thou shouldst never lift it again; and God do so unto me, and more also, if I do not receive my sword by the point." "Then a bed of heather, or a thousand marks," said Bothwell, striking at Burley with his full force.
"The sword of the Lord and of Gideon," answered
Bothwell, and returned the blow.

There have seldom met two combatants more equally matched in strength of body, skill in the management of their weapons and horses, deter-mation, courage, and chivalric hostility. After exchanging my dozen blows, both men were inflicting wounds, though of no great conse-quency, they grouped together as if with the desperate impatience of mortal hate, and Bothwell struck his enemy by the shoulder-blade, while the grasp of Balfour was upon his own collar, they came headlong to the ground. The companions of Burley hastened to his assistance, but were repelled by the dragons, and the battle became a hand-to-hand one. But nothing could withdraw the attention of the combatants from each other, or induce them to uncloise the deadly collars together. Only the grief, tearing, and struggling, and drowning, with the invincibility of thorough-bred bull-dogs.

Several horses passed over them in the mêlée without noticing, and the sword arm of Bothwell was broken by the kick of a charger. He then relinquished his grasp with a deep and suppressed groan, and both combatants started to their feet. Bothwell's right hand dropped helpless by his side, but his left grasped to the place where his dagger hung; it had escaped from the sheath in the struggle, —and, with a look of mingled rage and despair, he stood totally defenceless, as Balfour, with a laugh of savage joy, flourished his sword aloft, and then passed it trough his adversary's body. Bothwell received the thrust without falling—it had only grazed on his ribs, and the charger, whirling round him, looked at Burley with a grin of deadly hatred, he exclaimed—
"Beast peasant cur, thou hast split the blood of a line of kings!"

"Die, wretch!—die!" said Bothwell redoubling the thrust with better aim; and, setting his foot on Bothwell's body as he fell, he a third time transfixed him with his sword. "Die, bloodthirsty dog! die as thou hast lived—" he exclaimed, with a triumphant air that proved—nothing—believing nothing—"

"And feasting nothing!" said Bothwell, collecting the last effort of respiration to utter these desperate words. He then fell to the ground, and the broken arm of Bothwell was broken by the kick of a charger.
To catch a stray horse by the bridle, throw himself upon it, and rush to the assistance of his followers, was, with Burley, the affair of a moment. And as the fall of Bothwell had given to the insurgents all the courage of which it had deprived its comrade, the issue of this partial contest did not remain long undecided. Several soldiers were slain, the rest wound, the morass and dispersed, and the few victorious backs in the same manner, as those of the other, and the same with the other, and the same with the other, and the same enraged to direct against Claverhouse the very manuvere which he had instructed Bothwell to execute.
He now put his troop in order, with the view of attacking the right wing of the enemy and, sending news of his success to the main body, exhort them, in the name of Heaven, to cross the marsh, and work out the glorious work of the Lord by a general attack. This latter, chiefly maintained by some dismounted troopers whom he had posted behind the cover of the shabby cases of siders, which in some places covered the top of the morass, and whose close, cool, and well-aimed fire greatly annoyed the enemy, and concealed their own deficiency of numbers. Claverhouse, while he maintained the contest in this manner, still ex-cpecting that a diversion by Bothwell and his party might facilitate a general attack, was accosted by one of the dragoons, whose bloody face and jaded horse bore witness that he was come from the front of "What is the matter, Halliday?" said Claverhouse, for he knew every man in his regiment by name—

"Where is Bothwell?"

"Bothwell is killed," replied Halliday, "and many a pretty fellow with him."

Then the king," said Claverhouse, with his usual composure, "has lost a stout soldier. The enemy has assailed the marsh, I suppose?"

"With a strong body of horse, commanded by the devil incarnate that killed Bothwell," answered the terrified soldier.

"Hush!" said Claverhouse, putting his finger on his lips, "not a word to any one but me—Lord Evandale, we must retreat. The fates will have it so. Draw together the men that are dispersed in the skirmishing work. Let Allan form the regiment, and do you two retreat up the hill in two bodies, each halting alternately as the other falls back. I'll keep the rogues in check with the rearguard, making a stand and facing from time to time.
They will be over the ditch presently, for I see their whole line in motion and preparing to cross; therefore lose no time!"

"Where is Bothwell with his party?" said Lord Evandale, astonished at the coolness of his commander.

"Fairy disposed of," said Claverhouse, in his carriage—"the king has lost a stout soldier, as the old man got one. But away to business, Evandale—ply your spurs and get the men together. Allan and you must keep them steady. This retreat is new work for us all; but our turn will come round another day."

Evandale and Allan took themselves to their tasks; but ere they had arranged the regiment for the purpose of retreating in two alternate bodies, a considerable number of the enemy had crossed the marsh. Claverhouse, who had returned immediately around his person a few of his most active and tried men, charged them once more with the rear-guard, and, as before, they were yet disorderd by the broken ground. Some they killed, others they repulsed into the morass, and checked the whole so as to enable the main body, now spirited and stimulated by the success just achieved by the loss they had sustained, to com-commence their retreat up the hill.

But the enemy's van being soon reinforced and supported, came down to the river, and, wheeling his horse, Never did man, however, better maintain the character of a soldier than he did that day. Conspicuous by his black horse and white feather, he was first in the repulse of his men; and next, in the nearest ally on the opportunity, to arrest the progress of the pursuers and to cover the retreat of his regiment. The object of aim to every one, he seemed as if he was impa-to their shot. The superhuman bravery, looked upon him as a man gifted by the Evil Spirit with supernatural means of defence, avered that they saw the bullets recoil from his jack-boots and burn with a clatter from a rock of granite; as his galloped to and fro amid the storm of the battle.

Many a whig that day loaded his musket with a dollar cut into slugs, in order that a silver bullet (such was their respect for foreign eloquence) should not go off in the presence of the holy kirk, on whom lead had no power.

"Try him with the cold steel," was the cry at every renewed charge. "Powder is wasted on him. He must be brought to boot by the sword at the altar."

But though this was loudly shouted, yet the awe on the insurgents' minds was such, that they gave way before Claverhouse as before a supernatural being. Such a display of personal valor was so far beyond the capabilities of the soldiery of the day, that many of them considered it as a proof of the influence of the Devil; and others, when they returned to their posts, were so struck with the story, that they believed him to be on the side of the gentry of the north at least, and were convinced that he had not been wounded. Thus was his form exposed to the eyes of the Highlanders in all its pride, and his influence spread through the ranks of the gentry, and his valor set as an example to the multitude.

The soldiers behind him, as they beheld the increasing number of enemies who poured over the morass, became uneasy; and, at every successive movement, Major Allan and Lord Evandale found it more and more difficult to bring them to halt and form under their protection until the order was given, their motions in the act of retreating became, by degrees, more and more rapid than was consistent with good order. As the disordered soldiers approached nearer to the top of the rise, from which in less than an hour they had descended, the panic began to increase.

Every one became impatient to place the brow of the hill between himself and the enemy, and the companionship of the disencumbered; nor could any individual think it reasonable that he should be the last in the retreat, and thus sacrifice his own safety for that of others. In this mood, several troopers set spurs to their horses and fled out of the press, and the others became so unsteady in their movements and formations, that their officers every moment feared they would follow the same example.

A mad scene of blood and confusion, the trembling of the horses, the crowds of the wounded, the continued fury of the enemy, which fell in a succession of unintermitted musketry, while loud shouts accompanied each bullet which the fall of a trooper showed to have been successfully aimed—amid all the terrors and disorders of such a scene, and when it was dubious how soon they might be totally despoiled by their dispirited soldiery, Evandale could not forbear remarking the composition of his commanding officer. Not at Lady Margaret's breakfast-table that morning to express himself more openly, or his design more composed. He had closed up to Evandale for the purpose of giving some orders, and picking out a few men to reinforce his rear-guard.

"And now, he said, in a whisper, 'our rooks will leave you, my lord, old Allan, and myself, the honour of fighting this battle with our own hands. I must do something to disperse the musketeers who annoy them so hard, or we shall be all shamed. Don't attempt to succour me if you see me go down, but keep at the head of your men, get off as you can, in God's name, and tell the king and the chief I died in my duty.'"

The belief of the Covenanters that their principal enemies, and Claverhouse in particular, had obtained from the Devil a charmer which rendered them proof against leaden bullets, led them to prevent even the circumstances of his death. Howse of Lochrin, after giving some account of the battle of Kilkerran, says:

"The battle was very bloody, and by Mackay's third fire, Claverhouse fell, of whom historians give little account; but it has been and is certain, that his own wasteful servant, taking a resolution to red the world of this tumultuous bloody monster, and cutting his head off, did despatch him, as he had before taken off his own purpose for that effect. However, he fell, and with him Papist, and King James's faction in Scotland."—Howe, "The Ancient Kirk, p. 166.

So saying, and commanding about twenty stout men to follow him, he gave, with this small body, a charge so desperate and unexpected, that he drove them back, and they were forced to retreat over the broken ground, where the face of the ground was stony, and the neck of the horse, and the head of a man, was sometimes so stunted for the moment, though unwounded. A wonderful thing it was afterwards thought, that one so powerful as Balfour should have sunk under the weight of the howse of Claverhouse; and the vulgar, set down to supernatural and the effect of that energy, which a determined spirit can give to a feebler arm. Claverhouse was at the same time charged by some of the royalists, but he defended himself too deeply among the insurgents, and was fairly surrounded.

I. Allan saw the danger of his commander, his body of dragoons being then halted, while that commanded by Allan was in the act of retreating. Regardless of Claverhouse's disinterested command to the contrary, he ordered the party which he headed to charge down hill and up again to the Colons. Some advanced with him—most halted and stood uncertain—many ran away. With those who followed him, he gave them the signal of retreat, but the assistance just came in time, for a rustick had wounded his horse in a most ghastly manner by the blow of a scythe, and was about to repeat the stroke when Lord Evandale, hearing the report of the guns, ran up to the press, they looked round them. Allan's division had ridden clear over the hill, that officer's authority having proved altogether unequal to halt them. Evandale's men were at first more or less disheartened.

"What is to be done, Colonel?" said Lord Evandale.

"We are the last men in the field, I think," said Claverhouse, and when men fail as they can, there is no shame in fleeing. Hector himself would say, 'Devil take the hindmost,' when there are but twenty against a thousand.—Save yourselves, my lads, and do as you can. Come, my lord, we must e'en ride for it.""

So saying, he put spurs to his wounded horse; and the generous animal, as if conscious that the life of his rider depended on his exertions, pressed forward with speed, unbehatted either by pain or loss of blood.

"It appears, from the letter of Claverhouse afterwards quoted, that the horse on which he rode at Drumlog was not black, but sable. The other horses which were in the field were said to be white. Many extraordinary traditions current in Scotland concerning Claverhouse's horsemanship, for example his black charger, who was said to have been a gift to the rider from the Author, as is said to have performed the circumstance upon his command, are not to be received. The tradition that a stench of brimstone is said to have outstripped and overtaken, a hare upon the brae head of Mucknock, is so precise, that no merely earthly horse could keep its feet, or merely mortal rider could keep the saddle. There is a curious passage in the testimony of John Dick, one of the suffering Presbyterians, in which the author, describing each of the persecutors, by their predominant mark, passion, shows how little their lamented attribute would avail them in the great day of judgment. When he introduces Claverhouse, it is to reproach him with his passion for horses in general, and for that steed in particular, which was killed at Drumlog, in the manner described in the text.

"As for that bloodthirsty wretch, Claverhouse, how think he to show his valor that day? it is possible he may be so mad as to think himself secured by the fleetness of his horse, in a creature he has so much respect for, that he regarded more the life of his horse than the life of all the men that fell there, and sureuell fell prettier man on either side than himself. No, even could be fall upon a chess that could extract the spirit out of all the horses in the world, and which has lost his one, though he were on that horse ever so well mounted. Nay, sir, Gallery, in his narrative of Claverhouse, Testimony to the Doctrine, Worship, Discipline, and Government of the Church of Scotland, p. 90, says: 'The last of those Bishops who used Nonsense and Antinomianism, was ever so honest and mild, Mr. John Dick, who was in office 1640, on 5th March 1641, who dyd behead this Clandrach, 56. 4vo. No place or publication."

The reader may readily obtain further information in the subject of Cornet Graham's death and the flight of Claverhouse, from a manuscript of the curious history of few officers and soldiers followed him, but in a very irregular and tumultuary manner. The flight of the prisoners was the signal for all the stragglers, who yet offered dauntless resistance, to fly as fast as they could, and yield up the field of battle to the victorious insurgents.

CHAPTER XVII.

But see! through the last flashing lightnings of war, that scissed to the desert those frantic and far-scouted.

Campbell.

During the severe skirmish of which we have given an account, Morton, together with Cuddie and his horse, fell into the possession of the Kettle-drummer. He remained on the brow of the hill, near to the small arm, or barrow, beside which Cleaverhouse held his principal council of war, so that they had a commanding view of the action which took place in the bottom. They were guarded by Corporal Ingalls and four soldiers, who, as readily as they might be supposed, were more than sufficient to watch the fluctuating fortunes of the battle, than in attending to what passed among their prisoners.

"If you aid stand to their talk," said Cuddie, "we'll have some chance of getting our necks out of the noose; but I misjudge them—they have their sked o' arms!"

"Much is not necessary, Cuddie," answered Morton, "they have a strong position, and weapons in their hands; and more than three times the number of their assailants. If they cannot fight for their freedom now, and they desire to lose it for ever!"

"O, sir," exclaimed Maus, "here's a goodly payment in exchange! It was evident from the bloody spurs that was left behind them, it burns within me—my bowels are as wine which lacketh vent—they are ready to burst like new oats. O, that He may look after His own people in His day of judgments and deliverance! And now that moleth them, precious Mr. Gabriel Kettle-drummer! say, what aileth them, that Wert a Nazarite purer than snow, whiter than milk, more rusty than dyth!" (meaning, perhaps, unpardonable.)—"I say, that their tale now, that thou art blacker than a coal, but thy beauty is departed, and thy loveliness wither I like a dry puddle! Surely it is time to be up and doing, to cry loudly and to spare not, and to wrestle with the pair lids that are yonder testifying with their bludle and that of their enemies!"

This exploituation implied a reproach on Mr. Kettle-drummer, who, though an absolute Boorings, or of the thunder, in the pulpit, when the enemy were near, and indeed sufficiently contumacious, as we have seen, in their hour of power, had been struck dumb by e-20 and taken to his bosom, in affection, on the e side, and—as many an honest man might have been, in a situation where he could neither fight nor —was too much dismayed to take so favourable an opportunity to procure the terror of presidency, as the uragous Maus had expected at his hand, or even pray for the successful event of the battle. His essence of mind was not, however, entirely lost, any one than his jealous respect for his reputation as a re and powerful preacher of the word.

"Hold your peace, woman!" he said, "and do not disturb my inward meditations and the wranglings wherewith I wrestle. But of a verity the shooting of the foemen doth begin to increase! persadventure, some pellet flung at me, and all the stragglers, who yet offered dauntless resistance, to fly as fast as they could, and yield up the field of battle to the victorious insurgents.

"He's but a coward body after all," said Cuddie, who was himself very ill, and meant to be a cue for the puir man, who couldna cheat the woodie. But they say he gae singing and rejoinning till, just as was going to a bicker o' brose, supposing me hungry, as I was this year, an' I was to be — Eh, sure you'll say no such thing, and yet ane canna keep their e'en airt frae it!"

Accordingly, strong curiosity on the part of Morton and Cuddie, together with the heated enthusiasm of old Maus, detained them on the spot from which they could best hear and see the issue of the action, leaving to Kettle-drummell to occupy alone his place of security. The vicissitudes of combat, which we have already described, were witnessed by our spectators from the top of the eminence, but without their being able positively to determine to what extent they tendered. That the presbyterian defenders defended themselves stoutly and valiantly the heads of the mountains were shown by frequent flashes of fire, now eddied along the valley, and hid the contending parties in its sulphurous shade. On the other hand, the continued firing from the nearer side of the mountains induced the besieged to persevere in their attack, that the affray was fiercely disputed, and that every thing was to be apprehended from a continued contest in which undisputed victory must have been the result of regular troops, so completely officered and armed.

At length horses, whose caparisons showed that they belonged to the Life-Guards, began to fly masses, and the wood, not a cloud left to the aides of the next appeared, forsaking the conflict, and struggling over the side of the hill, in order to escape from the scene of action. As the numbers of these fugitives increased, the fate of the valley seemed no longer doubtful. A large body was then seen emerging from the smoke, forming irregularly on the hill-side, and with difficulty kept stationary by their officers, until Evandale's corps also appeared in full retreat. The result of the conflict was then apparent, and the joy of the prisoners was corresponding to their approaching deliverance.

They have done the job for anes," said Cuddie, "in they ne'er do' again."

"They flee! they flee!" exclaimed Maus, in ecstasy. "O, the truecillty tyrants! they are riding away as they burne their people of their hearth and home. The brave illustrious men—men of the proud Assyrians—the Philistines—the Moabites—the Edomites—the Ishmaelites!—The Lord has brought sharp swords upon them, to make them food for the fowls of heaven and the beasts of the field. See how the clouds roll, and the fire flashes shant them, and goes forth before the chosen of the Covenant, e'en like the pillar o' cloud and the pillar o' flame that led the people of Israel out o' the land o' Egypt! This is indeed a day of deliverance to the righteous, a day of pouring out of wrath to the persecutors and the ungodly."

"Lord save us, mother," said Cuddie, "hand the clavering tongue o' ye, and lie down ahint the cairn, like Kettle-drummell, honest man! The whigamore bullets ken unco little discretion, and will just as soon knock out the harn o a plessing saul wife as a sewing dragon."

"Fear nothing for me, Cuddie," said the old dame transported to ecstasy by the success of the party; "fear nothing. I will stand, like Deborah, on the tap o' the cairn, and tak up my sang o reproach against these men of Harosheth of the Gentiles, whose horse-hoofs are broken by their prancing."

The enthusiasm of old Cuddie was quite unexampled, in that he had accomplished her purpose, of mounting on the cairn, and becoming, as she said, a sign and a banner to the people, had not Cuddie, with more filial tenderness than respectfulness, been there to force his shackled arms would permit him to exert.
"Eh, sir!" he said, having accomplished this task, "look out yonder, Milwood!—say ye ever mortal fire like that?"—"Claverhouse!"—"Yonder he's been thrice down among them, and thrice came free. But I think we'll soon be free ourselves, Milwood. I don't know where, but there's a road a little better than the road afoot." Cudde was not mistaken, for, when the main tide of fugitives passed at a little distance from the spot where they were, the Lord Evandale was dead. Thoroughly alarmed, many of the refractory followers of Lord Evandale had fled, but others had been slain, and the road to the clergymen and the large body of the men who had been secured by a cord tied round their arms above the elbows. By this time the band was formidable, the guards of the dragoons, which still preserved some order, passed beneath the hillock or rising ground which was surrounded by the clergy already repeatedly mentioned. They exhibited all the hurry and confusion incident to a forced retreat, but still continued in a body. Claverhouse led the van, his naked sword deeply dyeing with blood his iron-colored clothes. Each horse was all covered with gore, and now reeled with weakness. Lord Evandale, in not much better plight, brought up the rear, still exhorting the soldiers to keep their ranks, and shoot the men who were wounded, and one or two dropped from their horses as they mounted the hill.

Maitie's zeal broke forth once more at this spectacle, and she took the horse with her head uncovered, and her ray of streaming in the wind, no bulrushes or chappel to the band of the fugitive party, and exclaimed with bitter irony, "Tarry, tarry, ye who are n'ae sae blythe to be at the meeting of the saints, and wad ride every mair in Scotland. Wad ye not tarry, nor thou hast found one? Wilt thou not stay for one word mair? Wilt thou na bide the afternoon preaching?—War bide ye!" she said, suddenly changing her tone, and out the houghs of the creature whose fleetness ye trust in!—Shouagh—shouagh!—aw! wi' ye, that has spilt sae much blood, and now were wad hae your ain—aw wi' ye for a railing Rabshack, a cursing of the auld kinsman!"—Swim—swim!—or ye will.

Claverhouse, it may be easily supposed, was too busy in his pursuit to hasten over the hill, anxious to get the remnant of his men out of shot, in hopes of again collecting the fugitives round his standard. But as the rear of his followers rode, they saw in front of them an old Evandale horse, which instantly sunk down dead beneath him. Two of the whig horsemen, who were the foremost in the pursuit, hastened up with the purpose of killing him, for hitherto there had been no quarter given. Morton, on the other hand, rushed forward to save his life, if possible, in order to unite his natural generosity, and to requite the obligation which Lord Evandale had conferred on him that morning, and under which circumstances had made him winces so acutely. Just as he had assisted Evandale, who was much wounded, to extricate himself from his dyed garment, to gain his feet, the two horsemen came up, and one of them exclaiming, "Have at the red-coated tyrant!" made a blow at the young nobleman, which Morton parried with difficulty, exclaiming to the rider, who was no other than Burley himself, "Give quarter to this gentleman, for my sake—" was the sable—"But for this bated sable of prudence, he shall die the death!—We must smite them hip and thigh, even from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same. But I think we'll soon be free ourselves, Milwood. I don't know where, but there's a road a little better than the road afoot."

Burley paused. "Thou art yet," he said, "in the court of the Gentiles, and I compassionate thy human blindness and frailty. Strong meat is not for babes, nor the mighty and grinding dispensation under which I draw my sword, for whose whose hearts are yet dwelling in huts of clay, whose footsteps are tangled in the mesh of mortal sympathies, and who clothe themselves in the unction of rags. But this is a soul to the truth is better to send one to Tophet; therefore I give quarter to this youth, providing the grant is confirmed by the general council of God's angels, and not with sordid deliverance. Thou art unarmed—Abide my return here. I must yet pursue these sinners, the Anakite, and destroy them till they be utterly consumed from the face of the land, even from Havilah unto Shinar."

So saying, he set spurs to his horse, and continued to pursue the chase.

"Cudde," said Morton, "for God's sake catch a horse as quickly as you can. I will not trust Lord Evandale's life with these obdurate men.—You are wounded, my lord. Are you able to continue your retreat?"—he continued, addressing himself to the prisoner, who, half-stunned by the fall, was but beginning to recover himself.

"I think so," replied Lord Evandale. "But is it possible?—Do I owe my life to Mr. Morton?"

"My interference would have been the same from common humanity," replied Morton, "to your lordship it was a sacred duty of gratitude."

Cudde at this instant's jump, by a horse, "God's protection, and ride like a flying hawk, my lord," said the good-natured fellow, "for ne'er be in me, if they arena killing every one of the wretches who pissed on poor Evandale's head." Lord Evandale mounted the horse, while Cudde officiously held the stirrup.

"Stand off, good fellow, thy courtesy may cost thy life,—Mr. Morton," he continued, addressing himself to the prisoner, who, half-stunned by the fall, was but beginning to recover himself, "this makes us more than ever—"reply on it, I will never forget your generosity—Farewell!

He turned his horse, and rode swiftly away in the direction which seemed least exposed to pursuit.

Lord Evandale had just rode off, when several of the insurgents, who were in the front of the party, came up, denouncing vengeance on Henry Morton and Cudde for having aided the escape of a Palse, as they called the young nobleman.

"What wad ye hae hae had us to do?" cried Cudde.

"Had we ought to stop a man w' that had twa pistols and a sword?" said the mob, "Sudna ye hae come faster w' yourseil, instead of flying at huz?"

This excuse would hardly have passed current; but Kettledrummer, who now awoke from his trance of terror, and was known to, and remembered by, most of the wretches, together with Mause, who possessed their appropriate language as well as the preacher himself, proved active and effectual intercessors.

"For God's sake, not harm them," cried Kettledrummer, in his very best double-toes tops; "this is the son of the famous Silas Morton, by whose Lord the great things were in this land at the breaking forth of the third covenant, and there was a most beautiful pouring forth of the Word and a renewing of the Covenant; a hero and champion..."
OLD MORTALITY.

CHAPTER XVIII.

When pulpit, drum ecclesiastic, was beat with set instead of a stick.

In the mean time, the insurgent cavalry returned from the pursuit, jaded and worn out with their unwonted effort. The infantry, the infantry, was on ground which they had won, fatigued with toil and hunger. Their success, however, was a cordial to every bosom, and seemed even to pierce the steed of food and drink, the triumph of such brilliant as they had ventured to anticipate; for, with no great loss on their part, they had totally routed a regiment of picked men, commanded by the first officer of his men, and one who had long been a terror to them. Their success seemed to have upon their spirits the effect of a sudden and violent surprise, so much had their taking up arms been a measure of desperation rather than of hope. Their meeting was also casual, and they had hastily arranged themselves under such commanders as were remarkable for zeal and courage, without much respect to any other qualities. It followed, from this state of disorganization, that the whole army appeared at once to resolve itself into a general committee for considering what steps were to be taken in connexion with the projected operation; and no opinion could be started so wild that it had not some followers and advocates. Some proposed they should march to Glasgow, some to Hamilton, some to Edinburgh, some to London; by degrees, to the reduction of their number to London to convert Charles II. to a sense of the error of his ways; and others, less charitable, proposed either to call a new successor to the crown of Scotland, or to destroy the party altogether. A free parliament of the nation, and a free assembly of the Kirk, were the objects of the more sensible and moderate of the party. In the mean while, a clamour arose among the people for the speediest and most effectual means of preventing the return of the royal family; and while all complained of hardship and hunger, none took the necessary measures to procure supplies. In short, the camp of the covenanters, even in the very moment of success, seemed about to dissolve like a hope of sand, from want of the original principles of combination and union.

Burke, who had now returned from the pursuit, found his followers in this distracted state. With the Scotland, their hope in arms, and defeated at Bothwell Bridge, in 1679, by William Hamilton, later Schoolmaster in the parish of Bothwell. The reader will find a more complete account of Sir Robert Hamilton in his writings.

Sir Robert Hamilton himself felt neither remorse nor shame at having put to death two bishops. He is quoted as saying, "I have killed two bishops, a lively hopeful young man; but getting into that company, and into their notions, he became a crack-brained enthusiast.

Sir Robert Hamilton had a strong sense of duty and was not afraid to stand up for what he believed was right. His actions were guided by his strong Catholic faith.

The next day, as the documents were being read, the king's council convened to discuss the matter. The session was held in the hall of the palace of Holyroodhouse, where the king's council met regularly.

The debate was heated, with both sides passionately arguing their points. The queen was present, and her presence added to the intensity of the discussion.

The king, however, remained silent, listening to the arguments presented by both sides.

The council finally decided that the queen should be informed of the situation, and that she should be given the chance to make a decision on the matter.

Thus, the fate of the two bishops was decided by the queen, and she ultimately decided to spare their lives.

The king's council was pleased with the queen's decision, and the two bishops were released from prison.

The bishop of Edinburgh was later appointed as the new bishop of Glasgow, while the bishop of Dunkeld was appointed as the new bishop of Dunkeld.

The two bishops were later reconciled with their congregations, and their effectual measures to procure supplies. In short, the camp of the covenanters, even in the very moment of success, seemed about to dissolve like a hope of sand, from want of the original principles of combination and union.

late period of her distresses, in the most affecting colours. He described her, like Hagar watching the well in the wilderness, like Cassandra, like the women of Judah, under her palm-tree, mourning for the devastation of her temple; like Rachel, weeping for her children and refusing comfort. But he chiefly roused our feelings against Simon, that we had yet reeking from battle. He called on them to remember the great things which God had done for them, and to persevere in the career which their vic- tory had opened to them.

"Your garments are dyed—but not with the juice of the wine-press; your swords are filled with blood," he exclaimed, "but not with the blood of goats or lambs, but the sin and the sin-offerings which were made fat with gore, but not with the blood of bullocks, for the Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah, and a great slaughter in the land of Idumea. These were not the firstlings of the flock, the small cattle of burnt-offerings, whose bodies lie like dungh on the ploughed field of the husbandman; this is not the savour of myrrh, of frankincense, or of sweet herbs, that is streaming in your nostrils; but these bloody trunks are the carcases of those who held the bow and the lance, who were cruel and would show no mercy, whose voice roared like the sea, who rode upon the horses of the eBay—no, in truth, these are the carcases even of the mighty men of war that came against Jacob in the day of his deliverance, and the smoke is of that the devouring fires that have consumed them. And let them that surround you not be a sanctuary planted with cedar and plated with silver; nor are ye ministering priests at the altar, with censers and with torches; but ye behold the hand of God, and the sword, and the bow, and the weapons of death. And yet verily, I say unto you, that not when the ancient Temple was in its first glory was there offered sacrifice more acceptable to the Lord than the day on which the mighty slay the tyrant and the oppressor, with the rocks for your altars, and the sky for your vaulted sanctu- ary, and your own good swords for the instruments of sacrifice. But therefore, therefore, you are running, lest the latter end should be worse than the beginning. Wherefore, set up a standard in the land; blow a trumpet upon the mountains; let off the signal; and the young men shall come out of their cities, and the young girls out of the cities, and the children out of the forts, like the rushing of winds, and cause the horsemen to come up like the voice of many waters; for the pas- sages of the destroyers are stopped, their rods are burned, and the face of their men of battle hath been turned to flight. Heaven has been with you, and has broken the bow of the mighty; then let every man's heart be as the heart of the valiant Macabæus, every man's hand as the hand of the mighty Samp- son, every man's sword as that of Gideon, which turned not back from the passage of the slaughter; for the banner of Reformation is spread abroad on the mountains in its first lowness, and the gates of hell shall not pre- vail against it.

"Well is it this day that shall barter his house for a helmet, and sell his garment for a sword, and cast in his lot with the children of the Covenant, even to the fulfilling of the promise; and we, we unto him, who, for carnal ends and self-seeking, shall with- hold himself from the great work, for the curse shall attend him, and the curse shall be upon him; for he came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty. Up, then, and be doing; the blood of mart- yrs, seeking upon scaffolds, is crying for vengeance; the dead are crying for the living, and the living, always, are pleading for retribution; the groans of innocent captives from desolate isles of the sea, and from the dungeons of the tyrants' high places, cry for vengeance, and the righteous cry for relief. Let those who are allying themselves in dens and deserts from the sword of their persecutors, famished with hunger, starved with cold, lacking fire, food, shelter, and clothing, because they serve the God, and than minded all are with you, pleading, watching, knocking, storming the gates of heaven in your behalf. Heaven itself shall fight for you, as the stars in their courses fought against Samael, that wert a conqueror, who had yet reeked from battle. He called on them to remember the great things which God had done for them, and to persevere in the career which their vic- tory had opened to them.

The eloquence of the preacher was rewarded by the deep hush of the assembly which resounded through the armed assembly in the conclusion of an exhortation, so well suited to that which they had done, and that which remained for them to do. The wounded forgot their pain, the faint and hungry their fatigue and privations, as they listened to doctrines which elevated them above the wants and causti- cities of the world, and identified their cause with that of the Deity. Many crowded around the preacher, as he descended from the eminence on which he stood, and, clasping him with hands on which the gore was not yet hardened, pledged their sacred vow that they would perform the acts of righteousness which he had dictated. Exhausted by his own enthusiasm, and by the animated fervour which he had excited in his discourse, the preacher could only reply in broken sentences—"O God, may your will be done—Stand strongly up and play the men—the worst that can befall us is but a brief and bloody passage to heaven."

Hallow, and the other leaders, had not lost that time which was employed in these spiritual exercises. Watch-fires were lighted, sentinels were posted, and arrangements were made to refresh the army with what provisions they had at hand, and also, if possible, to collect the provisions of the nearest farm-houses and villages. The present necessity thus provided for, they turned their thoughts to the future. They had dispatched parties to spread the news near their villages, and to obtain, either by force or favour, supplies of what they stood most in need of. In this they had succeeded beyond their hopes, having at one village seized a small magazine of provisions, forage, and ammunition, which had been provided for the royal forces. This success not only gave them relief at the time, but such hopes for the future, that whereas formerly some of their num- ber had begun to slacken in their zeal, they now unanimously resolved to abide together in arms, and commit themselves and their cause to the event of war.

And whatever may be thought of the extravagance or narrow-minded bigotry of many of their tenets, it is impossible to deny the praise of devoted courage to a few hundred peasants, who, without leaders, without money, without magazines, without any fixed place of action, and almost without arms, borne out only by their innate zeal, and a deterrence of the oppre- sion of their rulers, ventured to declare open war against an established government, supported by a regular army and the whole force of three kingdoms.

CHAPTER XIX.

Why, then, say an old man can do somewhat.

Henry IV. Part I.

We must now return to the tower of Tilhèstædum, which the march of the Life-Guards, on the morning of this eventful day, had left to silence and anxiety. The assurances of Lord Evandale had not succeeded in quelling the apprehensions of Edith. She knew him generally to be a man of moderation, and she could not too plainly see the object of her inter- ceSSION TO BE A SUCCESSFUL RIVAL: and it was not ex- pecting from him an effort above human nature, to suppose that he was about to slay or to restore him and rescue him from all the dangers to which his state of imprisonment, and the suspicions which he had incurred, must repeatedly expose him? She therefore resolved, whatever Edith might feel or apprehend, without admitting, and indeed indeed.

without listening to, the multifarious grounds of consolation which he gave, but went on stoutly on, one after another, like a skilful general who charges with the several divisions of his troops in regular succession.

First, Jenny was morally positive that young Miln-wood would come to no harm—then, if he did, there was consolation in the reflection, that Lord Evan-dale was the better and more appropriate match of the young lady for a castle than he; and, as for the battle, the conqueror of which said Lord Evan dale might be killed, and there was no man near enough to do that job—then, if the whispers got the greater, Milnwood and Cudde might come to a point of order as they went off before the volley of their lancers by the strong hand.

“For I forgot to tell ye, madam,” continued the man, “I was sent to speak to you. I am the ill, that poor Cudde’s in the hands of the Philistines as well as you; Milnwood, and he was brought here a prisoner this morning, and I was sent to speak to Halliday fair, and fetch him, to let me near theprotocols; but Cudde was no spared as he needed him till has been neither,” she added, and at the same time changed her tone, and briskly withdrew the handkerchief from her face, “so I will ne’er waste my words on a subject which does not matter. There was an eye on young men left, if they were to hang too high, to them.”

The other inhabitants of the castle were also in a state of nervousness and anxiety. Lady Margaret thought that Colonel Graham, in commanding an execution at the door of his house, and refusing to grant a reprieve at her request, had fallen short of the decency due to his rank, and had even encroached on her segnorial rights.

“The Colonel,” she said, “ought to have remembered, brother, that the barony of Tilted dullhun has the absolute privilege of pit and gallows; and therefore if the lad was to be executed on my estate, (which I consider as an unhandsome thing, seeing it is in the possession of females, to whom such tragedies cannot be acceptable) I would request, at least, that there have been delivered up to my bailiff, and justified at his sight.”

“Martial law, aye,” answered Major Bellenden, “oversees every other. But I must own I think Colonel Graham rather deficient in attention to you; and I am not over and above pre-emminently flattered by his granting to young Evanande (I suppose because he is a lord, and has interest with the privy-council) a request which he refused to so old a servant of the king as I am. But so long as the poor young fellow’s life is saved, I can comfort myself with the fact-end of each day sees myself.” And therewithal, he hunched a stanzas:

And what though winter will pinch sever
Through locks of gray and a cloak that’s old?
Yet keep warm, for I would not be cold.

For a cup of sack shall fence the cold.

“I must be your guest here to-day, sister. I wish to hear the name of this gathering on Loudon-hill, though I cannot conceive their standing a body of horse appointed like our guests this morning.—
Woe, me, the time has been that I would have liked ill to have sate in biggit wat’s waiting for the news of a skirmish to be fought within ten miles of me!
But, as the old song goes,

For time will not brighten the blade,
And years will break the strongest bow;
When the wind is in the west,
But time and years would overthrow it!

“We are well pleased you will stay, brother,” said Lady Margaret; “I will take my old privilege to look upon the beauty of the time when beauty has thrown into some disorder, although it is uncivil to leave you alone.”

O, I hate ceremony as I hate a stumbling horse,” replied the Major. “Besides, your person would be with me, and your mind with the cold meat and liveryman’s pasties.—Where is Edith?”

“Gone to her room a little evil-disposed, I am more than likely to leave her there,” said her grandmother; “as soon as she wakes, she shal take some drop.”

“Pooh! pooh! she’s only sick of the soldiers,” answered Major Bellenden. “She’s not accustomed to see one in her, had a fit out to shut, and then another marching off to actual service, with some chance of not finding his way back again. She would soon be used to it, if the civil war were to break out in Tilted dullhun.

“God forbid, brother!” said Lady Margaret.

“Ah, Heaven forbid, as you say—and, in the mean time, I’ll take a bit at trick-track with Harson.”

“He has ridden out, sir,” said Gudvill, “to try if he can hear any tidings of the battle.”

“—in the battle, said the Major; “it puts this family as he does, and order as there had never been such a thing in the country before—and yet there was such a place as Kilsythe, John.”

“Ay, and Tippermar, your honour” replied Gudvill, “where I was his honour my late master’s rear-man rank.”

“And Alford, John,” pursued the Major, “where I commanded the horse; and Innerlochy, where I was the Great Marquis’s ad-de-camp; and Auld Earn, and Brug’ o’ Dee.”

“And Philipbluck, your honour,” said John.

“Umph!” replied the Major; “the less, John, we say about that the better it is.”

However, being once fairly embarked on the subject of Montrose’s campaigns, the Major and John Gudvill carved on the way so successfully the whole considerable body of bat in bay the formidable enemy called Time, with whom, retired veterans, during the quiet close of a bustling life, usually wage an unces-

It has been frequently remarked, that the tidings of important events fly; with a celebrity almost beyond the power of credulity, and that reports, correct in the general point, though inaccurate in details, precede the certain intelligence, as it carried by the birds of the air. Such rumors anticipate the reality, not unlike to the "shadows of coming events," which carry the shadow of the event itself in the motion of the Highland Deer. Harlison, in his tale, encountered some such report concerning the event of the battle, and turned his horse back to Tilted dullhun in great dismay. He made it his first business to seek out the Major, and interrupted him in the midst of a prolix account of the seige and storm of Dundee, with the ejaculation

"Heaven send, Major, that we do not see a siege of Tilted dullhun before we are many days older!

"How is that, Harrison?—what will that devil you mean?" exclaimed the astonished veteran.

"Truth, sir, there is strong and increasing belief that Clavell has been broken, so that the soldiers are all dispersed, and that the rebels are hastening this way, threatening death and devastation to that which will not take the Covenant.

"I will tell you what that said the Major starting on his feet.—I will never believe that the Life-Guards would retreat before rebels;—and yet why need I say that," he continued, checking himself, "when I have seen such sights myself?—Sent out Pike, and one or two of the servants, for in-

It is the only army that provokes you have, or can get brought in, and be ready, if the news be confirmed, to knock down as many bullocks as you have salt for.—The well never goes dry.—These servants some of them have guns on the battlements:
if we had but ammunition, we should do well enough.

"The soldiers left some casks of ammunition at the Grange this morning, to hide their return," said Harrison.

"Hasten, then," said the Major, "and bring it into the Castle, with every pike, sword, pistol, or gun that is of wood or brass; don’t throw any shot on the bodkin—Lucky that I was here!—I will speak to my sister instantly.

Lady Margaret Bellenden was astounded at is alligence so unexpected and so alarming. It had seemed to her that the imposing force which had had morning left her walls was sufficient to have put two squadrons of the opposite side, that was, the body sild the inchoacy of their own means of resistance, to an army strong enough to have defeated Claver- nough only said[her] eyes, and the voice of the sister she added, "What will all that we can do avail us, brother?—What will resistance do but bring about destruction on the house, and on the barren hills for, God knows, I thinkna on my ain side of life."

"Cooch, sister," said the Major, "you must not be cast down; the place is strong; the rebels igno- rance, on the contrary, is nae made a den of thieves and rebels while old Miles Bellenden is in it. My hand is weaker than it was, but I thank my old grey hairs that I have some knowledge of war yet. Here comes Poke with intelligence.—What news, Poke? Another Philpugh ob, ch?"

"Aye," said Poke, composedly; "a total scatter- ing, think this morning little gude would come a gane their newfangled gate of singing their carac- tere.

"From whom did you see?—Who gave you the news?" asked the Major.

"O, nairn than half-a-dozen droogin fellows that are a' on the spaur whilks to get first to Hamilton. They'll win the race, I warrant them, win the battle the Poke."

"Continue your preparations, Harrison," said the alert veteran; "get your ammunition in, and the allis killed. Send down to the borough-town for that meat you can gather. We must not lose an instant.—Had not Edith and you, sister, better return o' Charnwood, while we have the means of sending you the news?"

"No, brother," said Lady Margaret, looking very sale, but speaking with the greatest composure; "since the auld house is to be held out, I will ake my chance in it. I have fled twice from it a' my days, and I have aye found it desolate o' bravest and its bonniest when I returned; sae hat I will e'en abide now, and end my pilgrimage is it.

"It may, on the whole, be the safest course both of Edith and you," said the Major; "for the whigs will raise all the way between this and Glasgow, and make them travelling worse, or your dwelling at Charnwood, very unsease.

"So be it then," said Lady Margaret; and, dear brother, as the nearest blood relation of my deceased husband, I will defend this dwelling in his hand the venerable gold-headed staff of hee deceased Earl of Torwood,)—"the keeping and government and senechaship of my Tower of Tillettum, and the appurtenances thereof, with all power to kill, slay, and damage those who half assail the same, as freely as I might do myelf. And I trust you will so defend it, as becomes a cause in which his most sacred majesty has not dis- aigned—"

"Pahaw! sister," interrupted the Major, "we have no time to speak about the king and his breakfast just now."

And, hastily leaving the room, he hurried, with all the alertness of a young man of twenty-five, to examine the state of his garrison, and superintend his measures which were necessary for defending the place.

The Tower of Tillettum, having very thick walls, and very narrow windows, having also a very strong court-yard wall, with flanking turrets in the only accessible side, and rising on the other rom the very verge of a precipice, was fully capable of defence against any thing but a train of heavy artillery. Female or escalade was what the garrison had chiefly to fear. For artillery, the top of the Tower was mounted with some antiquated wall-pieces, and muskets of culverins, sakres, demi-sakers, falcons, and faelo-
ING, and exercising all those numerous duties of a good governor.

"In the name of God, what is the matter, uncle?" exclaimed Edith.

"The matter, my love?" answered the Major coolly; as, with spectacles on his nose, he examined the position of a gun. "The world is in a dilemma, my dear. Why—raise her breech a thought more, John Gudyl—what is the matter? Why, Clever's so routed, my dear, and the whigs are coming down upon us in force, that's all the matter with you." Gracious powers!" said Edith, whose eye at that instant caught a glance of the road which ran up the river, "and yonder they come!"

"The nod—yes, the veteran; and, his eyes taking the same direction, he beheld a large body of horsemen coming down the path. "Stand to your guns, my lads!" was the first exclamations;

"we'll make them pay toll as they pass the heugh. —But stay, stay, these are certainly the Life-Guards."

"Oh, no, uncle, no," replied Edith; "see how disorderly they ride, and how ill they keep their ranks; these cannot be the fine soldiers who left us this morning."

"Ah, my dear girl!" answered the Major, "you do not know the difference between men before a battle and after a defeat; but the Life-Guards it is, for I see the red and blue and the King's colours. I am glad they have brought them off, however."

"It is Cleverhouse, sure enough," said the Major; "I am glad he has escaped, but he has lost his famous black horse. Let Lady Margaret know, John Gudyl; order some refreshments; get oats for the soldiers' horses; and let us to the hall, Edith, to meet him. I surmise we shall hear but indifferent news."

CHAPTER XX.

Hardyheart.

Colonel Graham of Cleverhouse met the family, assembled in the hall of the Tower, with the same serenity and the same courtesy which had graced his manners in the morning. He had even had the compassion to take off the dress of his horse, to wash the signs of battle from his face and hands, and did not appear more disordered in his exterior than if returned from a morning ride.

"I am grieved, Colonel Graham," said the reverend old lady, the tears trickling down her face, "deeply grieved."

"And I am grieved, my dear Lady Margaret," replied Cleverhouse, "that this misfortune may render your remaining at Tilletuddem dangerous for you, especially considering your recent hospitality to the King's troops, and your well-known loyalty. And I came hither chiefly to request Miss Bellenend and you to accept my escort (if you will not scorn that of a poor runaway) to Glasgow, from whence I will see you safely sent either to Edinburgh or to Dunbarton Castle, as you shall think best."

"I am much obliged to you, Colonel Graham," replied Lady Margaret; "but my brother, Major Bellenend, has taken on himself the responsibility of holding out the place as long as may be, please, Colonel; but let her ladyship never drive Margaret Bellenend from her hearth-stone while there's a brave man that says he will defend it."

"And will Major Bellenend undertake this?" said Cleverhouse hastily, a joyful light glancing from his dark eye as he turned it to the veteran. "Yet why should I question it? It is of a piece with the rest of his life. But have you the means, Ma-

"All, but men and provisions, with which we are ill supplied," answered the Major. "As for arms," said Cleverhouse, "I will leave you a dozen or twenty fellows who will make good a breach against the devil. It will be of the utmost service, if you can defend the place but a week, and by that time we will have a reinforcement."

"I will make it good for that space, Colonel," replied the Major, "with twenty-five good men and store of ammunition, if we should gnaw the rules of our enemy. But let us trust we shall get in provisions from the country."

"And, Colonel Graham, if I might presume a request," said Lady Margaret, "I would entreat that the Sergeant of the 1st Bannockburn Steward and the auxiliaries whom you are so good as to add to the garrison of our people; it may serve to legitimate his promotion, and I have a prejudice in favour of his noble birth."

"The sergeant's wars are ended, madam," said Graham, in an unaltered tone, "and he now needs no promotion that an earthly master can give."

"Pardon me," said Major Bellenend, taking Cleverhouse by the arm, and turning him away from the ladies, "but I am anxious for my friends; I fear you have other and more important losses. I observe another circumstance of your losses which may strike you."

"You are right, Major Bellenend," answered Cleverhouse firmly; "my nephew is no more. He has died in his duty, as became him."

"Great and the Major, "how unhappy!—the handsomest, gallant, high-spirited youth."

"He was indeed all you say," answered Cleverhouse; "poor Richard was to me as an eldest son; the apple of my eye, and my destined heir; but he is dead in his duty, and I—Major Bellenend"—(be wrung the Major's hand as he spoke)—"I live to avenge him."

"Colonel Graham," said the affectionate veteran, his eyes filling with tears, "I am glad to see you bear this misfortune with such fortitude."

"I am not a selfish man," replied Cleverhouse; "though the world will tell you otherwise; I am not selfish either in my hopes or fears, my joys or sorrows. I have not been severe for myself, or grasping for myself, or ambitious for myself. The service of my master and the good of the country are what I have tried to aim at. I may, perhaps, have driven seventy into cruelty, but I acted for the best; and now we are not to yield to my own feelings a deeper sympathy than I have granted to the feelings of others."

"I am astonished at your fortitude under all the unpleasant circumstances of this affair," pursued the Major.

"Yes," replied Cleverhouse, "my enemies in the council will lay this misfortune to my charge—I despise their accusations. They will calumniate me to my sovereign—let them repel their charge. The public enemy will exult in my flight—I shall find a time to show them that they exult too early. This youth that has fallen stood before a grinning鲲 and my inheritance for you that my marriage-bed is barren; yet peace do with him! the country can better spare his than your friend Lord Evan, who, after behaving very gallantly, has, I fear, also fallen."

"What a fatal day!" ejaculated the Major, heard a report of this, but it was again counteracted it was added, that the poor young nobleman's iniquity had occasioned the loss of this unhappy field."

"Not so, Major," said Graham; "let the privy officers bear the blame, if there be any; and let the laurels flourish untarnished on the grave of the fallen. I do not, however, speak of Lord Evan's death as certain; that is, however, possible. On the contrary, he shall never drive Margaret Bellenend from her heart-stone while there's a brave man that says he will defend it."

"And will Major Bellenend undertake this?" said Cleverhouse hastily, a joyful light glancing from his dark eye as he turned it to the veteran. "Yet why should I question it? It is of a piece with the rest of his life. But have you the means, Ma-

"Yes," answered Cleverhouse, "my blackest had little temptation either to desert, or to struggle farther than they were driven by their first panic. There is small friendship and scant courtesy between them and the Howard's country; every village they pass is likely to rise on them, and so the scouts are doubled, and the outlying settlements of whole counties are on the sound with terror of spites, pike-staves, hay-forks, and broomsticks. But now let us talk about your plans and wants, and the means of corresponding with you. To one who was used to being able to make a long stand at Glasgow, even when I have joined my Lord Ross; for this transient and accidental success of the fanatics will raise the devil through all the west of Ireland.

They then discussed Major Bellenden's means of defence, and settled a plan of correspondence, in case a general insurrection took place, as was to be expected. Claverhouse renewed his offer to escort the ladies to a place of safety; but, all things considered, Major Bellenden thought they would be in equal safety at Tullibadlen.

The Colonel then took a polite leave of Lady Margaret and Miss Bellenden, assuring them, that, though he was reluctantly obliged to leave them for the present in dangerous circumstances, yet his earliest means of communication was in the character as a good knight and true, and that they might speedily rely on hearing from or seeing him.

Full of doubt and apprehension, Lady Margaret was interrupted in her thoughts by the sound of a horn in the street, with her usual expressions and feelings, but contended herself with biding Claverhouse farewell, and thanking him for the care which he had promised to give them. Not without a tear in the corner of his eye, and with a calmness of manner, the fate of Henry Morton, but could find no pretext for doing so, and could only hope that it had made a subject of some part of the long private communication which her uncle had held with Claverhouse. On this subject, however, she was disappointed; for the old cavalier was so deeply immersed in the duties of his own office, that he had scarcely said a single word to Claverhouse upon military matters, and most probably would have been equally forgetful, had the fate of his own son, instead of his friend's, lain in the balance.

Claverhouse now descended the bank on which the castle is founded, in order to put his troops in motion, and Major Bellenden accompanied him to receive the detachment who were to be left in the town.

"I shall leave Inglis with you," said Claverhouse, "for, as I am situated, I cannot spare an officer of rank; it is all we can do, by our joint efforts, to keep the garrison together when our mission of officers make their appearance, I authorize you to retain them; for my fellows can with difficulty be subjected to any other authority."

His troops being now drawn up, he picked out sixteen men by name, and committed them to the command of Corporal Inglis, whom he promoted to the rank of sergeant on the spot.

"And hark ye gentlemen," was his concluding harangue, "I leave you to defend the house of a lady, and under the command of her brother, Major Bellenden, a faithful and brave man. You are likely to save regular and obediently, and each of you shall be handsomely rewarded on my return to relieve the garrison. In case of mutiny, cowardice, neglect of duty, or the slightest excess in the family, the provost-marshal and his comrade—you know I keep my word for good and evil."

He touched his hat as he bade them farewell, and shook hands cordially with Major Bellenden and the girls he had joined during the oppression of the time. Their minds were fretted, soothed, and destined to desperation, by the various emotions of love, gratitude, and danger. Major Bellenden, now left to his own resources that out of several avidities, both to obtain supplies of provisions, and especially of meal, and to get knowledge of the motions of the enemy. All the news he could collect on the second subject tended to prove that the insurgents meant to remain on the field of battle for that night. But they, also, had abroad theirdetachments, and there was some anxiety and great was the doubt and distress of those who received contrary orders, in the name of the King, in that of the Kirk; the one commanding them to send presents to the garrison at Tullibadlen, and the other enjoining them to forward supplies to the camp of the godly professors of true religion, now in arms for the cause of covenanting reformations. The former pitched their tents on Loudon-hill. Each summons closed with a denunciation of fire and sword if it was neglected; for neither party could confide so far in the loyalty or zeal of those whom they addressed, as to hope they would part with their property upon other terms. So that the poor people knew not what hand to turn themselves to; and, to say truth, there were some who turned themselves to more than one.

"Thir kittle times will drive the wisest o' us daft," said Niel Blane, the prudent host of the Howff; but I sey keep a calm sough—Jenny, what meal is in the great bedroom at Tullibadlen?"

"Four bowls o' aitmeal, twa bowls o' bear, and twa bowls o' pease," says Jenny's reply.

"Aweel, linn," continued Niel Blane, sighting deeply, "I see no lairds or gentlemen in the camp at Drumsol—he's a whig, and was the auld gudewillie's ploughman—the masnicht bannocks will suit their mairland stomachs weel. He maun say it's the last une o' my money to lose, if I am not able to tell a lie, (as it's no likely he will when it's for the gude o' the house,) he may wait till Duncan Glen, the auld drucken trooper, drives up the aitmeal to Tullibadlen. When I was a watchful service to my Lord and the Major, and I heen a muckle left as weel as ma liev to be a gude pock—poddings ken nee better."

While the prudent and people endeavoured, like Niel Blane, to find some fair way of leach to both parties, to make the least more public (or party) spirit between them take arms on all sides. The royalists in the country were not numerous, but were respectable from their fortune and influence, being chiefly landed proprietors of ancient descent, who, with their brothers, cousins, and dependants to the ninth generation, as well as their domestic servants, formed a sort of militia, capable of defending their own peel-houses against detached bodies of the insurgents, of resisting their demand of supplies, and interfering those which were sent to the presbyterian camp by others. The reports that the Tower of Tullibadlen was to be defended against the insurgents, afforded great courage and support to these feudal volunteers, who considered it as a stronghold to which they might retreat, in case it should become impossible to maintain the desperate war they were now about to wage.

On the other hand, the towns, the villages, the farm-houses, the properties of small herdsmen, sent northward, and were the northern interest. These men had been the principal sufferers during the oppression of the time. Their minds were fretted, soured, and destined to desperation, by the various emotions of love, gratitude, and danger. The more reduced to tolerable only by the exertions of Major Bellenden, and his comrade, and with their gilding all besmirched, made much more regular and military appearance on leaving, for his second term, the tower was left to Tullibadlen, than, as they had done it after their departure.

Major Bellenden, now left to his own resources that out of several avidities, both to obtain supplies of directed both against body and soul. Numbers of these men, therefor-e, took up arms; and, in the phrase of their time and party, prepared to cast their lot with the victors of Loudon-hill.

CHAPTER XXI.

Anasias. I do not like the man: He is a heathen, and a scoundrel. What do you think of him?—Prisadale. You must wait his calling, and the coming of the good spirit. You did ill to upbraid him.

We return to Henry Morton, whom we left on the field of battle. He was eating, by one of the watchfires, his portion of the provisions which had been distributed to the army, and musing deeply on the path which he was next to pursue when Burley suddenly came up to him, accompanied by the young minister, whose exhortation after the victory had produced such a powerful effect.

"Henry Morton," said Balfour abruptly, "the council of the army of the Covenant, considering that the son of Silas Morton can never prove a lukewarm Laodican, or an indifferent Gallois, in this great day, have made him captain of their bands, with the right of a vote in their council, and all authority fitting for an officer who is to command Christian men."

"And had you not," replied Morton, without hesitation, "I feel this mark of confidence, and it is not surprising that a natural sense of the injuries of my country, not to mention those I have sustained in my own person, do not highly exalt my character."

"I will own frankly, Mr. Balfour," replied Morton, "much of this sort of language, which, I observe, is so powerful with others, is entirely lost on me. It is proper you should be aware of this before we commune further together." (The young clergyman here paused a moment.) "I say, Mr. Balfour; but, perhaps, it is because you will not hear me out. I revere the Scriptures as deeply as you or any Christian can do. I look into them with humble heart, in the spirit and in the letter. They are to me the means of my salvation. But I expect to find this by an examination of their general tenor, and of the spirit which they uniformly breathe, and not by wresting particular passages from the context, or applying Scriptural phrase to circumstances and events with which they have often very slender relation."

The young divine seemed shocked and thunder-struck with this declaration, and was about to remonstrate.

"Hush, Ephraim!" said Burley, "remember he is but as a babe in swaddling clothes. Listen to me, Morton. I will speak to thee in the worldly language of that carnal reason, which is, for the present, thy blind and imperfect guide. What is the object for which thou art content to draw thy sword? Is it not that the church and state should be reformed by the free voice of a free parliament, with such laws as shall hereafter prevent the executive government from spilling the blood, torturing and imprisoning the persons, exhausting the estates, and transplanting upon the consciences of men, at their own wicked pleasure?"

"Most certainly," said Morton; "such I esteem the causes of warfare, and for such I fight while I can wield a sword."

"Nay, but," said Macbriar, "ye handle this matter too tenderly; nor will my conscience permit me to rest until I have obtained the subjugation of the state."

"Peace, Ephraim Macbriar!" again interrupted Burley.

"I will not peace," said the young man. "Is it not the cause of my Master who hath sent me? Is it not a profane and Erastian destroying of his authority, usurpation of his power, denial of his name, to place either King or Parliament in his place as the master and head of his household, the adulterous husband of his spouse?"

"You speak well," said Burley, dragging him aside, "but not wisely; your own ears have heard this night in council how the scattered remnant are broken and divided, and would ye now make a veil of separation between them? Would ye build a wall with unslaked mortar?—if a fox go up, it will breach it."

"I know, and the young man deeply, that thou art faithf ul, honest, and zealous, even unto slaying; but, believe me, this worldly craft, this tampering with sin and with infirmities, is in itself a falling away; and I fear the Heaven will not let us to do much more for His glory, when we seek to carnal cunning and to a fleshly arm. The sanctified end must be wrought by sanctified means."

"I tell thee," answered Balfour, "thy zeal is too rigid in this matter; we cannot yet do without the help of the Laodicas and the Erastians; we must endure for a space the indulged in the midst of the coast—"the sons of Zeruiah are yet too strong for us."

"I tell thee I like it not," said Macbriar; "God can work deliverance by a few as well as by a multitude. The cause of God is the faithful cause of the Pentland-hills, paid but the fitting penalty of acknowledging the carnal interest of that tyrant and oppressor, Charles Stewart."

"Well said," said Burley, "thou knowest the healing resolution that the council have adopted, to make a comprehensive declaration, that may suit the tender consciences of all who groan under the yoke of the present oppressors. Remember, if thou wilt, and get them to recall it, and send forth one upon narrower grounds. But abide not here to hinder my gaining over this youth, whom my soul is to guard and love, that his name alone will call forth hundreds to our banners."

"Do as thou wilt, then," said Macbriar; "but I will not assist to mislead the youth, nor bring him into jeopardy of life, unless upon such grounds as will ensure his eternal reward."

The more ariful Balfour then dismissed the impatient preacher, and returned to his prolocy.

That war was to him as walking at length the arguments by which he urged Morton to join the insurgents, we shall take this opportunity to give a brief sketch of the person by whom they were urged, and the use which was made of himself so deeply in the conversion of young Morton to his cause.

John Balfour of Kinloch, or Burley, for he is designated both ways in the songs and proclamations of that melancholy period, was a gentleman of some fortune, and of good family, in the county of Fife, and had been a soldier from his youth upwards. In the younger part of his life he had been well and licentious, but had early laid aside open profanity, and embraced the strictest tenets of Calvinism. Unfortunately, habits of excess and intemperance were more easily rooted out of his dark, satanic, and enterprising spirit, than the vices of revenge and ambition, which continued, notwithstanding his religious professions, to exercise no small sway over his mind. Daring in design, precipitate and violent in execution, and going to the very extremity of the most rigid recusancy, it was his ambition to place himself at the head of the presbyterian interest.

To attain this eminence among the wits, he had been active in attending their conventicles, and more than once had commanded them when they appeared in arms, and beaten off the forces sent to disperse them. As a performer he was the graticule of his own enthusiasm, joined, as some say, with motives of private revenge, placed him at the head of that party who assassinated the Primate of Scotland, as the author of an act of cruel and extraordinary upon the 'Davies Episode.'

The violent measures adopted by government to revenge this deed, not on the perpetrators only, but on the whole professors of the religion to which they belong.
O.M.D.

ed, together with long previous sufferings, without any prospect of deliverance, except by force of arms, occasioned the insurrection, which, as we have already seen, was the result of the delusions of the bloody skirmish of Loudon-hill.

But Burley, notwithstanding the share he had in the victory, was from finding himself at the summit who, although the triumph, that the Archbishop's punishment had by no means exceeded his deserts. The insurgents differed in another main point, which has been already touched upon. The more warm and extravagant fanaticisms condemned, as guilty of a pusillanimous abandonment of the rights of the church, those preachers and congregations who were contented, in any manner, to exercise their religious profession under the permission of the ruling government. This, they said, was absolute Erastianism, or subjection of the church of God to the regulations of an earthly government, and therefore but one degree below heresy. But the moderate party were content to allow the king's title to the throne, and in secular affairs to acknowledge his authority, so long as it was exercised with due regard to the fundamental laws of the constitution of the realm. But the tenets of the wilder sect, called, from their leader Richard Cameron, by the name of Cameronian, went the length of disregarding the authority of the king, and of taking the active part of the insurgents, who should not acknowledge the Solemn League and Covenant. The seeds of disunion were, therefore, thickly sown in this ill-fated sect; and and dissatisfied, his animosity was attached to the most violent of those tenets which we have noticed, saw nothing but ruin to the general cause, if they were insisted on during this crisis, when unity was of so much consequence. Hence he disapproved, as we have seen, of the honest, downright, and ardent zeal of Macbrair, and was extremely desirous to receive the assistance of the moderate party of prebendaries in the immediate overthrow of the government, with the hope of being hereafter able to dictate to them what should be substituted in its place.

He was, on this account, particularly anxious to secure the presence of the more liberal part of the army, and ultimately, perhaps, ingratiate himself so far with them, as to be chosen commander-in-chief, which was the mark at which his ambition aimed. He had, therefore, without waiting till any other person took up the subject, exerted on the council the talents and disposition of Morton, and easily obtained his elevation to the painful rank of a leader in this dissipated and undisciplined army.

The arguments by which Balfor pressed Morton to accept of this dangerous promotion, as soon as he had gottent rid of his less wary and uncompromising companion, Macbrair, were sufficiently artful and urgent. He did not affect either to deny or to disguise that the sentiments which he himself entertained concerning church government, went as far as those of the presbyterians; but the difference of opinion which when the affairs of the nation were at such a desperate crisis, minute difference of opinion should not prevent those who, in general, wished well to their country, from uniting for the advancement of the public interest, he believed to exist. Provided their attempt to free the country should be successful, seeing that the presbytery, being in that case triumphant, would need to make no such compromise with the government, and, consequently, with the abolition of the Indulgence all discussion of the legality would at once end. He insisted much and strongly upon the necessity of taking advantage of this favourable crisis upon the certainty of being joined by the force of all the western shires, and of the great agreeable impression which the cruelties incurs, who, seeing the distress of the country, and the increasing tyranny with which it was governed, should, from fear or indifference, withhold their active aid from the cause.

Morton wanted not these arguments to induce him to join in any insurrection which might appear to have a feasible prospect of success in the country. He doubted, indeed, greatly, whether the present attempt was likely to be supported by the strength sufficient to ensure success, or by the wisdom and liberality of that spirit necessary to make the good use of the advantages that might be gained. Upon the whole, however, considering the wrongs he had personally endured, and those which he had seen daily inflicted on his fellow-subjects, meditating, too, upon the precarious and dangerous situation in which he already stood with respect to the government, he conceived himself, in every point of view, called upon to join the body of presbyterians who were contending for the freedom and safety of the nation.

But while he expressed to Burley his acquiescence in the vote which had named him a leader among the insurgents, and a member of their council of war, it was not without the most serious misgivings. "I am willing," he said, "to contribute every thing within my limited power to effect the emancipation of my country. But do not mistake me. I disapprove, as I have done ever since the utmost degree of the action in which this crisis seems to have originated; and no arguments should induce me to join it, if it is to be carried on by such measures as that with which it has commenced." But Burley's looks, his words, his manner, gave a dark and gloomy suggestion to the swarthy brow.

"You mean," he said, in a voice which he designed should not betray any emotion—"You mean the death of James Shairp?"

"Frankly," answered Morton, "such is my meaning."

"You imagine, then," said Burley, "that the Almighty, in times of difficulty, does not raise up instruments to deliver his church from her oppressors? You are of opinion that the justice of an execution consists, not in the extent of the sufferer's crime, or in the severity of the punishment, but wholly in the wholesome and salutary effect which that example is likely to produce upon other evil-doers, but hold that it rests solely in the robe of the judge, the height of the bench, the nature of the object which is justly or unjustly inflicted, whether on the scaffold or the moor? And when constituted judges, from cowardice, or from having cast in their lot with transgressors, suffer them not only to pass by liberty through the land, but to sit in the high places, and dye their garments in the blood of the saints, is it not well done in any brave spirits who shall draw their private swords in the public cause?"

"I have no wish to judge this individual action," replied Morton, "further than is necessary to make you fully aware of my principles. I therefore repeat, that the cause of the Almighty is supposed to be worthy of his judgment. That the Almighty, in his mysterious providence, may bring a bloody man to an end deservingly bloody, does not indicate those who, without authority of any kind, take upon themselves to be the instruments of execution, and presume to call them the executors of divine vengeance."

"And were we not so?" said Burley, in a tone of great elevation, but with something of the arrogance which one who owned the interest of the Covenantat Church of Scotland, bound by that covenant to cut off the Judas who had sold the cause of God for fifty thousand marks a-year, and who was the author of words in view of his own behalf. Many of the subjects of division, as, for example, that concerning the Indulgence itself, arose, he observed, out of circumstances which would cease to exist, provided their attempt to free the country was not the execution of a week in heaven.
our warrant? Did not the Lord deliver him into our hands, when we looked out but for one of his inferior toils? Did not his resolve, how we should act, and was it not borne in our hearts as if it had been written on them with the point of a diamond? Ye shall surely take him and strike him down. But not an hour of that, acting ere the sacrifice was completed, and that in an open heath, and within the pates of their garments—and yet he interrupted the great work!—What dog oueth not during the masters, the tigers, the slaying, and the dispensing? Then, who will say—who dare say, that a mightier run than our was not herein revealed?

"Ye have accused yourself, Mr. Balfour," said Morton; "such circumstances of facility of execution and escape have often attended the commission of the most enormous crimes. But it is not mine to judge you. I have not forgotten that the way was opened to the former liberation of Scotland by an act of violence which no man can justify,—the slaughter of Cumming by the hand of Robert Bruce; and, therefore, condemning this action, as I do and must. I am not unwilling to suppose that you may have motives vindicating it in your own eyes, though not in mine, or in those of sober reason. I only now mention it, because, unwilling to join a cause which is supported by men engaged in open war, which it is proposed to carry on according to the rules of civilized nations, without, in any respect, approving of the act which brought it on to it.

Balfour bit his lip, and with difficulty suppressed a violent answer. He perceived, with disappointment, that, upon points of principle, his young brother-in-arms possessed a clearer perception of a firmness of mind, which afforded but little hope of his being able to exert that degree of influence over him which he had expected to possess. After a moment's pause, however, he said, with coolness, "My conduct is open to men and angels. The deed was not done in a corner; I am here in arms to avow it, and care not where, or by whom. I am called on to do so; whether in the council, the field of battle, the place of execution, or the day of the last great trial. I will not now discuss it further with one who is yet on the other side of the veil. But if you will cast in your lot with us as a brother, come with me to the council, who are still sitting, to arrange the future march of the army, and the means of improving our victory." He had his brother's confidence; not greatly delighted with his associate, and better satisfied with the general justice of the cause which he had espoused, than either with the measures or the motives of many of those who were embarked in it.

In the hollow of a hill, about a quarter of a mile from the field of battle, was a shepherd's hut; a miserable cottage, which, as the only enclosed spot within a moderate distance, the leaders of the presbyterian army had chosen for their council-room. Towards this spot Burley guided Morton, who was surprised, as he approached it, at the multiform confusion of sounds which issued from its precincts. The calm and measured tenor of the insurgent's discourse would have presided in council held on such important subjects, and at a period so critical, seemed to have given place to discord wild, and loud uproar, which filled the valley and was sugary to their future measures. As they approached the door, they found it open indeed, but choked up with the bodies and heads of countrymen, who, though no megaphone had called them together, all of whom intruding themselves on deliberations in which they were so deeply interested. By expostulation, by threats, and even by some degree of violence, Burley, the sternness of You desire in their countenances suggested the intruders to retire, and introducing Morton into the cottage, secured the door behind them against importunate curiosity. At a less agitating moment, the young man might have given a better account of the scene of which he now found himself an auditor and spectator. The precipice of the gloomy and ruinous war was enlightened by the hoary lamp, which blazed on the hearth, the smoke whereof, having no legal vent, edded around, and formed over the heads of the assembled council a clouded canopy, as opaque as the clouds of heaven. In their midst, through the tattered, the slaying, and the dispersing—Then, who will say—who dare say, that a mightier run than our was not herein revealed?

"Ye have accused yourself, Mr. Balfour," said Morton; "such circumstances of facility of execution and escape have often attended the commission of the most enormous crimes. CHAPTER XXII.

And look how many Grecian tentes do stand Hollow upon this plain—so many hollow factions.
Teseus and Theseus.

In the hollow of a hill, about a quarter of a mile from the field of battle, was a shepherd's hut; a miserable cottage, which, as the only enclosed spot within a moderate distance, the leaders of the presbyterian army had chosen for their council-room. Towards this spot Burley guided Morton, who was surprised, as he approached it, at the multiform confusion of sounds which issued from its precincts. The calm and measured tenor of the insurgent's discourse would have presided in council held on such important subjects, and at a period so critical, seemed to have given place to discord wild, and loud uproar, which filled the valley and was sugary to their future measures. As they approached the door, they found it open indeed, but choked up with the bodies and heads of countrymen, who, though no megaphone had called them together, all of whom intruding themselves on deliberations in which they were so deeply interested. By expostulation, by threats, and even by some degree of violence, Burley, the sternness of You desire in their countenances suggested the intruders to retire, and introducing Morton into the cottage, retrieved, each beneath the chair of his owner, still watching each other's motions, and indicating, by occasional growls, by the erected bristles of the back and ears, and by the red gleam of the eye, that their discretion was not without a residuary of that first opportunity afforded by any general movement or commotion in the company, to fly once more at each other's throes.

But availing advantage of the momentary pause to present to the council Mr. Henry Morton of Milnwood, as one touched with a sense of the evils of the times, and willing to peril goods and life in the service of the country, had at once, and in a voice that was heard through the whole of the house of the broken shambles of the present time, said Morton, had given in his time a soul-stirring testimony. Morton was instantly received with the right hand of fellowship by his ancient pastor, Pountdext, and by those among the insurgents who supported the more moderate principles. The others muttered something about Erastinism, and reminded each other in whispers, that Silas Morton, once a stout and worthy servant of the Covenant, had been a backslider in the day when the revolutionists had led the way in owning the authority of Charles Stewart, then a young man, whom the present generation afterwards brought in, to the oppression of both Kirk and country? They added, however, that, on this great day of calling, they would not refuse society with one whom the country, and indeed the nation, was now about to install in his office of leader and counselor, if not with the full approbation of his colleagues, at least without any formal or avowed disapproval.

In this partition, the insurgents of Pountdext's parish and congregation were naturally placed under the command of Morton; an arrangement mutually agreeable to both parties, as he was recommended to their confidence, as well by his personal qualities as by his commands.

When this task was accomplished, it became necessary to determine what use was to be made of their victory. Morton's heart throbbed high when he heard the news of his rise; and as he stood amidst the tumultuous praises of the soldiers and sailors, and the acclamations of the people, he could not help exclaiming, "I will not be a judge in the midst of the people."

"I opine," said Pountdext, "for, like the other divines of the period, he had no hesitation in making his decision upon military matters of which he was profoundly ignorant. — I opine, that we should take in man and woman that stronghold of the woman Margaret Bellenden, even though we should build a fort and raise a mount against it; for the race is a rebellious and bloody race, and their hand has been heavy on the children of the Covenant, both in the former and the latter times. Their hook hath been in our noses, and their bridle between our jaws."

"Pahaw!" returned Burley, scornfully, "a butler."

"Also, there is that ancient malignant," replied Pountdext, "Miles Bellenden of Carnwood, whose hand is heavy, and who holds in the balance of the state."

"If that," said Burley, "be Miles Bellenden, the brother of Sir Arthur, he is one whose sword will not turn back from battle; but he must now be stricken in years."

"There was word in the country as I rode along," said another of the council, "that so soon as dry heard of the victory which has been given to us, they caused shut the gates of the tower, and called in men, and women, and children from the streets. They were ever a fierce and a malignant house."

"We will not, with my consent," said Burley, "engage in a siege which may consume time. We would rush forward and follow, without occupying Glasgow; for I do not fear that the troops we have this day beaten, even with the assistance of my Lord Roes's regiment, will judge it safe to await our coming."

"Howbeit," said Pountdext, "we may display a banner before the Tower, and blow a trumpet, and summon them to come forth. It may be that they will give over the place into our mercy, though they be a rebellious people. And we will summon the women to come forth of their stronghold, that is, Lady Margaret Bellenden and her grand-daughter, and Jenny Dennison, which is the girl of an enearing eye, and the other maids, and we will give them a safe conduct, and send them in peace to the city, even to the town of Edinburgh. But John Gudyn, and Hugh Harriot, and Alice, will restrain with fetters of iron, even as they, in times past, have done to the martyred saints."

"Here's to you! Who takes the banner, and puts of peace?" said a shrill, broken, and overstrained voice from the crowd.

"Peace, brother Halakkuk," said Machan, in a soothing tone, to the speaker.

At this command, they retracted the strange and unnatural voice; it is this a time to speak of peace, when the earth quakes, and the mountains are rent, and the rivers are Changed, into blood, and the two-edged sword is drawn from the sheath to drink gore as if it were water, and devour flesh as the fire devours dry stubble?"

While he spoke thus, the orator struggled forward to the inner part of the circle, and presented to Morton's wondering eyes a figure worthy of such a voice and such language. The rag of a dress which had once been black, added to the tattered fragments of a shepherd's plaid, composed a covering scarcely fit for the purposes of decency, much less for those of warmth or comfort. A long beard, as white as snow, hung down on his breast, and mingled with bushy, uncombed, grizzled hair, which hung in clumps around his wild and staring visage. The features seemed to be extenuated by penury and famine, until they hardly retained the likeness of a human aspect. The eye, grey, wild, and in Pountdext's light vailed from those of his immediate followers, whose habitations and families might be exposed to great severities, if this strong place were permitted to remain in possession of the natives.

"In the name of Heaven! who is he?" said Morton, in a whisper to Pountdext, surprised, shocked, and even startled, at this ghastly apparition, which looked more like the resurrection of some cannibal priest, or druid red from his human sacrifice, than like an earthly mortal.

"It is Halakkuk Muckleworth," answered Pountdext, in the same tone, "whom the enemy have long detained in captivity in forts and castles, until his understanding hath departed from him, and, as I fear, an evil demon hath possessed him. Nevertheless, our violent and fierce language hath inflamed the spirit, and that they fructify by their pouring forth."

Here he was interrupted by Muckleworth, who cried in a voice that made the very beams of the roof quiver — "Who then, sir, is this chief butcher, who hoisteth himself a man of war from his youth upward, and who spread the banner against the good cause with that man of Belial, James Graham of Glenlyon?"

"What?" returned Burley, scornfully, "a butler."

"Also, there is that ancient malignant," replied Pountdext, "Miles Bellenden of Carnwood, whose hand is heavy, and who holds in the balance of the state."

"If that," said Burley, "be Miles Bellenden, the brother of Sir Arthur, he is one whose sword will not turn back from battle; but he must now be stricken in years."

"Vol. II. B.
"This is utter abomination and daring impiety," said Morton, unable to contain his indignation. "What blessing can you expect in a cause, in which you listen to the mingled ravings of madness and atrocity?"

"Flush, young man!" said Keddlebrumme, "and reserve thy censure for that for which thou canst render a reason. It is not for thee to judge into what v microbe you may be pouring the blood of our friends, that the cannon are too numerous, and that we cannot expect that the Middinians shall, by so large a number, be delivered into our hands. They have heartened my voice. We shall be shortly here within such a number as can consult and act together and in them thou shalt have a free voice, as well in ordering our affairs of war, and protecting those whom mercy should be shown—Art thou now satisfied?"

"It will give me pleasure, doubtless," answered Morton, "to be the means of softening the horror of the war; and I will not leave the post I have taken, unless I see measures adopted at which conscience revolts. But to no bloody execution after quarter asked, or slaughter without trial, will I lend countenance; nor shall our guns be directed in opposing them, with both heart and hand as constantly and resolutely, if attempted by our own followers, as when they are the work of our enemies."

Balfour waved his hand impatiently. "Thou wilt find," he said, "that the stubborn and hard-hearted generation with whom we deal, are chaste with serpents; as their heart is embittered, and ere they accept the punishment of their guilt, the word is gone forth among them, 'I will bring a sword upon you that shall avenge the cause of my house, and my people!'"

"Vain words," replied Morton, "that I feel more abhorrent at cold-blooded and premeditated cruelty, than at that which is practised in the heat of zeal and resentment."

"Thou art yet but a youth," replied Balfour, "and hast not learned how light in the balance are the drops of blood in comparison to the weight and importance of this great national testimony. Be not of a spirit not affected by the feelings of others; it may be we shall see little cause to stir when an act is a result of the nation's anger."

With this concession Morton was compelled to be satisfied, and Balfour was now left to induce him to lie down and get some rest, as the host would probably move in the morning.

And Morton, answering Morton, "do not rest, nor go to the plough, nor to the uncultivated field, and wouldst thou already abandon it? Is this thy adherence to the cause of thy father?"

"No cause," replied Morton, indignantly, "no cause can prosper, so conducted. One party declares for the ravings of a bloodthirsty madman; another leader is an old scholastic pedant; a third—he stopped, and his companion continued the sentence—'Is it a desperate homogeneous, thou wouldst say, like John Balfour of Bury?—I can hear thy misconception without re-argument. Thou dost not consider, that it is not men of solar and self-seeking minds, who arise in these days of wrath to execute judgment and to accomplish deliverance. Hast thou but seen the armies of England, during her Parliament of 1649, whose ranks were filled with scribes and enthusiasts, wilder than the audacities of Muniti, thou wouldst have had more cause to marvel; and yet these men were unconquered on the field, and their hands wrought marvelous things for the liberties of the land.'"
CHAPTER XXIII.

THE first poor of day Henry awoke, and found Cuddie standing beside him with a portly in his hand.

"I been just putting your honour's things in again ye were waking," said Cuddie, "as is seeing ye has been sae gude as to take me in service..."

"Aye, I'm sure," answered Cuddie; "and I didn't say it was tied on the horse yonder, that if ever ye would be your servant, and ye didn't say if I was a riding, I kenna what is. Ye have ailes, indeed, but ye ha' gien me enough t' M'Gillip.

"Cuddie, if you insist on taking the chance of inprosperous fortune..."

"Give me warrant you a' prosper well enough," d Cuddie, cheerfully; "an' ances my auld mistress wad put them. I ha' begun the chest theg at an end that is easy enough to learn.

"I gaging, I suppose?" said Morton, "for how did you come by that portmanteau?"

"Aye, if it's pillaging, or how ye call it," said Cuddie, "but it comes natural to a body, and it's a lae trade. Our folk had tailed the dead drac hie bare as bawbees before we were loosed—I saw the whaes a' waydown t' Kettledrumple and the other chest, I set the lang tros on my ain errand and a.

"Sae I took up the syke a wee bit, away to the rising on the hill, and so I'm t' mark the a' mony a horse-foot, and I could ken a place where there ha' been cleane leathers, and a' the pairs chidden there buskit wi' their claes just as they have been in the morning—nay, and had found a t' pose o' carriages—and wauld be auld in the hereof (as my mither says) but our auld acause, Sergeant Bothwell?"

"Has that man fallen?" said Morton.

"Th has he," answered Cuddie; "and his een and his brow bent, and his teeth clenched, like the jaws of a trap for fourmants when their dive—"I was a' in a rage, and I set my heart to look at him; I thought to ha' turn about wi' him, and enried his pouches, as he had done mony an a man's; and here's your ain collector (or else), that he had been at Milnep stuck unlucky night that made us a' sodgers ther—

"We can be no harm, Cuddie," said Morton, "sking use of this money, since we know how ey it; but you must divide with me.

"Aye, a wee, hide a wee," said Cuddie. "Weel, me a' a bit ring he had hinging in a black rub on his breast. I am thinking it has been a keen, pair fellow—there's naebody sae rough y ha' aye a kind heart to the lasses—and there's wi' a when papers, and I got twa or three aces, that I'll keep to myself, forby..."

"On my word, you have made a very successful a a beginnin'," said his new master.

"Een I'm now," said Cuddie, with great ex...

"Aye, I think that down stupid, if to lifting things—And forby, I ha' gotten twa ares. A feckless lack of a Straven weaver, that he lass and his een horse to sit skirling on hill-side, had caught twa dragon nags, and wad get them hup nor wind, sae he took it noble for them bain—I said ha' tried him wi' a siller, but it's an unco ill piece to get change—I'll find the tailor's mussing out o' Bothwell's the...

"And, speaking o' that, I mean gang and see about my mither, paru said body, if your honour has any immediate commands."

"But, Cuddie," said Morton, "I really cannot take these things from you without some recompense."

"Hout fie, sir," answered Cuddie, "ye said aye be taking—for recompense, ye may think about that some other time—I ha' seen gey weel to myself wi' the money that fit better body to. What could I do wi' Lord Evanilude's break claws? Sergeant Bothwell's will serve me weel enough.

"Not being able to prevail on the self-sustained and disinterested fellow to accept of any thing for himself out of these warlike spoils, Morton resolved to take the first opportunity of returning Lord Evanilude's property, supposing him yet to be alive, and, in the mean while, did nothing but to avoid himself of Cuddie's prize, so far as to appropriate some changes of linen and other trifling articles amongst those of more value which the portmanteau contained.

He then hastily looked over the papers which were found in Bothwell's pocket-book. These were of a miscellaneous description. The roll of his troop, with the names of those absent on furlough, memorandum of tavern-bills, and lists of delinquents and Silver might be made subjects of fine and persecution, first presented themselves, along with a copy of a warrant from the Privy Council to arrest certain persons of distinction therein named. Another warrant for one book were two or commissions which Bothwell had held at different times, and certificates of his services abroad, in which his courage and military talents were highly praised; but the most remarkable paper was an accurate account of his genealogy, with reference to many documents for establishment of its authenticity; subjoined was a list of the ample possessions of the family, a list of losses, and a particular account of the proportions in which King James I. had bestowed them on the courtiers and nobility by whose descendants they were at present actually possessed; besides this list was a manuscript, in red letters, in the hand of the deceased, Hound Immor, F. S. E. B., the initials probably intimating Francis Stewart, Earl of Bothwell. To these documents, which strongly painted the character and feelings of their deceased proprietor, were added some which showed him in a light greatly different from that in which we have hitherto presented him to the reader.

In a secret pocket of the book, which Morton did not discover without some trouble, were one or two letters, written in a beautiful female hand. They were dated about twenty years back, and bore the address of a lady, and were subscribed only by initials. Without having time to peruse them accurately, Morton perceived that they contained the elegant yet fond expressions of female affection directed towards an object with whom their jealousy they endeavoured to soothe, and of whose haughty, suspicious, and impatient temper, the writer seemed greatly to complain. The ink of these manuscripts had faded by time, and, notwithstanding the great care which had obviously been taken for their preservation, they were in one or two places chafed so as to be illegible...

"It matters not," these words were written on the envelope of that which had suffered most, "I have them by heart.

With these letters was a lock of hair wrapped in a copy of verses, written obviously with a feeling, which attested, in Morton's opinion, for the roughness of the poetry, and the conceits with which it abounded, according to the taste of the period:

"Thy hue, dear pledge, is pure and bright,
As in that well remembered night,
When first thy mystic braid was wore
Of first my Agnes whisht in love.

Since then how often hast thou press'd
The form mine of this wild breast,
Whose wrath and hate have sworn to dwell
With the first sin which people hell—

Disgrace whose spirit, marred through a cloud,
Each shrubs the earth's warm conventions—

0, if such clime thou canst endure,—
I can keep thee unsoftened pure,

What conceit or evil erring thought
Of this scene ruin had agues wronged?"

Of this scene ruin had agues wronged?"
I had not wandered wild and wide,
With such an angel for my guide:
The earth could then improve me,
If she had lived, and loved to me.

We went to Langdalle. Thus had it been
To me a savage hunting-scene,
My soul delighting in a bold race,
And the sport of the chase.

To start, pursue, and bring to bay,
Raid, and seize, and possess, and prey,
Then from the carcass turn away,
Nine mirthful lads had sweetness lamed,
And eachlooked with wond'ring and amazed;
Yes, God and man might now approve me,
We had lived and need not repent.

As he finished reading these lines, Morton could not forbear reflecting with compassion on the fate of this singular and most unhappy being, who, it appeared, while in the lowest state of degradation, and almost of contempt, had his recollections continually fixed on the high station to which his birth seemed to entitle him; and, while plunged in gross licentiousness, was in secret looking back with bitter remorse to the period of his youth, during which he had nourished a virtuous, though unfortunate attachment.

"Alas! what are we," said Morton, "that our best and most proudest feelings can be thus debased and degraded—that honourable pride can sink into haughty and desperate indifference for general opinion, and the sorrow of blighted affection inhabit the same bosom with the sportive enterprising spirit, which was chosen for their citadel? But it is the same throughout; the liberal principles of one man sink into cold and unfeeling indifference, the religious zeal of another into the same spirit of stagnation.

Our resolutions, our passions, are like the waves of the sea, and, without the aid of Him who formed the human breast, we cannot say to its tides, 'Thus far shall ye go, and no farther.'

While he thus moralized, he raised his eyes, and observed that Burley stood before him.

'Already awake!' said that leader—'it is well, and will tire the pain before you. What papers are these?' he continued.

Morton gave him some brief account of Cuddie's successful marauding party, and handed him the pocket-book of Bothwell, with its contents. The Cameronian leader looked with some attention on such of the papers as related to military affairs, or public business; but when he came to the verses, he threw them from him with contempt.

'I little thought," he said, "when by the blessing of God, I passed my sword three times through the body of that arch tool of cruelty and persecution, and blighted the labours of danger and dangers, that we could have stooped to an art as trifling as it is profane. But I see that Satan can blend the most different qualities in his well-beloved and chosen agents, and that the same man can wield a bloody weapon against the godly in the valley of destruction, can touch a tinkling lute, or a gittern, to soothe the ears of the dancing daughters of perdition in their Vanity Fair.'

'Your ideas of duty, then," said Morton, "exclude love of the fine arts, which have been supposed in general to purify and to elevate the mind?'

'To me, young man," answered Burley, "and to those who think as I do, the pleasures of this world, under whatever name disguised, are vanity, as its grandeur and power are a snare. We have but one object to pursue, and that is to build up the temple of the Lord.'

'I have heard my father observe," replied Morton, "that many who assumed power in the name of Heaven, were as severe in its exercise, and as unwilling to part with it, as if they had been solely moved by the motives of worldly ambition—but of this another time. Have you succeeded in obtaining a summons to the court, to be nominated to the vacant?'

'I have," answered Burley. "The number is limited to six, of which you are one, and I come to call you to their deliberations.'

He then introduced him to a sequestered grass-plot, where their colleagues awaited them. In this delegation of authority, the two principal factions which divided the tumultuary army had each taken care to send three of their own number. On the part of the Cameronians, were Burley, Macbrayn, and Kettledrammel; and on that of the moderate party, Poundtay, Henry Morton, and a small proprietor, called the Hollander of Langdale. Thus were equally balanced by their representatives in the committee of management, although it seemed likely that those of the most violent opinions were, as usual in such cases, to possess and predominate with the greatest degree of energy. Their debate, however, was conducted more like men of this world than could have been expected from their conduct on the preceding evening; they impartially considering their own situation, and the probable increase of their numbers, they agreed that they should keep their position for that day, in order to refresh their men, and give time to reinforce such as joined them; and that, on the next morning, they would direct their march towards Tillytudal, and summon that stronghold, as they expressed it, of malignity. If it was not surrendered to their summons, they resolved to try the effect of a brisk assault; and, that should miscarry, it was settled that they should leave a part of their number to blockade the place, and reduce it, if possible; by famine, when their men should be stronger to drive Claverhouse and Lord Ross from the town of Glasgow. Such was the determination of the council of management; and thus Morton's first entrance to Glencoe rendered his name a castle belonging to the parent of his mistress, and defended by her relative, Major Bellenden, to whom he personally owed many obligations! He felt fully the embarrassment of his situation, but he comforted himself with the reflection, that his newly-acquired power in the insurgent army would give him, at all events, the means of extending to the inmates of Tillytudal a protection which no other man could have afforded them; and he was not without hope that he might be able to mediate such a accommodation between them and the Presbyterian army, as should secure them a safer neutrality during the war which was about to ensue.

CHAPTER XXIV.

There came a knight from the field of slain,
His stood was drenched in blood and rain.

FINIS.
added, addressing Lady Margaret: "permit me to think and act as your son, my dear madam—as your brother, Edith!"

He pronounced the last part of the sentence with some emphasis, and she feared that the apprehension of his pretensions as a suitor might render his future services unacceptable to Miss Bellenden. She was not insensible to his delicacy, but there was no time for anything but considerations of the highest importance.

"We are preparing for our defence," said the old lady with great dignity; "my brother has taken charge of our garrison, and by the grace of God, we will resist to the last, or perish with our countrymen!"

"How gladly," said Evandale, "would I share in the defence of the Castle! But in my present state, I should be but a burden to you, my something worse; for, far from envisaging that an officer of the Life-Guard in the Castle would be sufficient to make these rogues more desperately earnest to possess themselves of it. If they find it defended only by the family, they may possibly march on to Glasgow rather than hazard an assault."

"And can you think so meanly of us, my lord," said Edith, with the generous burst of feeling which was so rare in her sex, and which, by her very nature, fitted her so well, her voice faltering through eagerness, and her brow colouring with the noble warmth which dictated her language—"Can you think so meanly of your friends, who could permit this inconsiderate proceeding to interfere with their sheltering and protecting you at a moment when you are unable to defend yourself, and when the whole country is filled with the enemy? I would rather perish than that such women would permit a valued friend to leave it in such circumstances! And can you think we will allow you to go from a castle which we hold to be strong enough for our purpose?"

"Lord Evandale need never think of it," said Lady Margaret; "I will dress his wounds myself; it is an old wife's wish for war time; but to quit the Castle of Tillietudlem with all the honors due to a chief is draughted, and to leave you the world—前者, the meanest trooper that ever wore the king's coat on his back should not do so, much less my young lord Evandale. Our is not a house that ought to brook such dishonour. The tower of Tillietudlem has been too much distinguished by the visit of his most sacred—"

Here she was interrupted by the entrance of the Major.

"We have taken a prisoner, my dear uncle," said Edith—"a wounded prisoner, and he wants to escape from us. You must help us to keep him by force."

"And how many fellows will be the man?" said the Major; "I am as much pleased as when I got my first commission. Claverhouse reported they were killed, or missing at least.

"We have been slain, but for a friend of yours," said Lord Evandale, speaking with some emotion, and bending his eyes on the ground, as if he wished to avoid seeing the impression that what he was about to say would make upon Miss Bellenden. She was unharassed and defenceless, and the sword raised to dispatch me, when young Mr. Morton, the prisoner for whom you interested yourself yesterday morning, interposed in the most generous manner, preserved my life, and furnished me with the means of escaping."

As he ended the sentence, a painful curiosity overcame his first resolution; he raised his eyes to Edith's face, and it seemed as if he sought in the glow of her cheek and the sparkle of her eye, joy at hearing of her lover's safety and freedom, and triumph at his not having been left last in the race of generosity. Such, indeed, were her feelings; but they were mingled with admiration of the ready frankness with which Lord Evandale had hastened to bear witness to the merit of a favoured rival, and to acknowledge and praise his feelings. She could not but sympathize in his feelings, and wished that she had rather have owed to any other individual in the world.

Major Bellenden, who would never have observed the emotions of either party, even if they had been much more marked, could read in the glower of her eyes and the sparkle of her eye, joy at hearing of her lover's safety and freedom, and triumph at his not having been left last in the race of generosity. She could not but sympathize in his feelings, and wished that she had rather have owed to any other individual in the world.

Miss Bellenden, that Lord Evandale seemed much exhausted both in body and mind. "I think," she said, addressing the Major, "that since Lord Evandale condescends to become an officer of our noble and right reverend patron, his majesty, he amenable to your authority, and ordering him to his apartment, that he may take some refreshments ere he enters on military discussions."

"I cannot doubt it. I know his principles, and that he detests cant and hypocrisy. I have heard him laugh a thousand times at the pedantry of that old presbyterian scoonder, Poundtext, who, after enjoying the indulgence of the government for so many years, has not more than the first whiff of all knowledge in himself in his own proper colours, and set off, with three parts of his crop-eared congregation, to join the host of the fanaticism, the result of which you did escape leaving the field, my lord?"

"I rode for my life, as a recreant knight must," answered Lord Evandale, smiling. "I took the route where I thought I had a chance of meeting with any of the enemy, and I found shelter for several hours—you will hardly guess where?"

"At Castle Bracklan, perhaps," said Lady Margaret, or in the house of one of her other loyal gentlemen?"

"No, madam. I was repulsed, under one mean pretext or another, from more than one house of that description, for distress of the enemy following my traces; but I found refuge in the cottage of a poor widow, whose husband had been shot within these three months by a party of our corps, and whose two sons are at this very moment with the insurgents."

"Indeed!" said Edith; "and was a fanatic woman capable of such generosity?—but she disapproved, I suppose, of the tactics of her family?"

"Far from it, madam," continued the young nobleman; "she was in principle a rigid ascetic, but she saw my danger and distress, considered me as a fellow-creature, and forgot that I was a cavalier and a young soldier. She sent her son to seek for some means to rest upon her bed, concealed me from a party of the insurgents who were seeking for stragglers, supplied me with food, and did not suffer me to leave my place of refuge until she deemed that I had every chance of getting to this tower without danger."

"It was nobly done," said Miss Bellenden; "and I trust you will have an opportunity of rewarding her generosity."

"I am running up an arra of obligation on all sides, Miss Bellenden, during these unfortunate occurrences," replied Lord Evandale; "but when I can attain the means of showing my gratitude, the shall not be wanting." All now joined in pressing Lord Evandale to relinquish his intention of leaving the Castle; but the argument of Major Bellenden proved the most effectual.

"Your presence in the Castle will be most useful, if not absolutely necessary, my lord, in order to maintain, by your authority, proper discipline among the garrison. The officers of your command are in considerable disorder. You are indispensable, and who do not prove to be of the most orderly description of inmates—and, indeed, we have the Colonel's authority, for that very purpose, to detain any officer of his command who might be here."

"That," said Lord Evandale, "is an unanswerable argument, since it shows me that my residence here may be useful, even in my present disabled state.

"For your wounds, my lord," said the Major, "my sister, Lady Bellenden, will undertake to give battle to any feverish symptom, if such should appear. I will answer that my old campaigner, Grean Pike, shall dress a flesh-wound with any of the incision of Barber-Surgeons. He had enough of practice in Monroes's time, for we had few regularly-bred army surgeons, as you may well suppose."

Your agreement to stay with us, then?"

"My reasons for leaving the Castle, said Lord Evandale, glancing a look towards Edith, "though they evidently seemed weighty, must needs give way to those which infer the power of saving you. May I presume, Major, to inquire into the means and plans of defence which you have prepared? or can I attend you to examine the works?"

"It did not enter my mind," said Miss Bellenden, that Lord Evandale seemed much exhausted both in body and mind. "I think," she said, addressing the Major, "that since Lord Evandale condescends to become an officer of our noble and right reverend patron, his majesty, he amenable to your authority, and ordering him to his apartment, that he may take some refreshments ere he enters on military discussions."
Edith is right," said the old lady; "you must go immediately to bed, my lord, and take some febrifuge, which I will prepare with my own hand; and my lady-in-waiting, Mistress Martha Weddell, shall make you a pillow and a blanket for you, and something very light. I would not advise wine." John Gudyll, let the housekeeper make ready the chamber of dais. Lord Evan dale must lie down instantly. Pike will take off the bandage and examine the state of the wounds."

"These are melancholy preparations, madam," said
Lord Evandale, as he returned thanks to Lady Margaret, and was about to leave the hall,—"but I must listen to my lord's directions; and I trust that your skill will soon make me a more able de defender of your Castle than I am at present. You must render my body serviceable as soon as you can, for you must take care for my head while you have Major Bellenden."

With these words he left the apartment.

"An excellent young man, and a modest," said the Major.

"None of that conceit," said Lady Margaret, "that often makes young folk suppose they know better how their complaints should be treated than people that are skilled."

"And so generous and handsome a young noble man," said Jenny Dennison, who had entered during the latter part of this conversation, and was now left alone in the hall with the Major. Major Bellenden was returning to his military cares, and Lady Margaret to her medical preparations.

Edith only answered these encomiums with a sigh;
but her friend, she felt, could not be better than any one how much they were merited by the person on whom they were bestowed. Jenny, however, failed not to follow up her blow.

"After all, it's true that my lady says—there's no trusting a presbyterian; they are a failthless man sworn louts. What wad hae thought that young Millwood and Cuddie Headings wad hae on wi their swords?"

"What do you mean by such improbable nonsense, Jenny?" said her young mistress, very much dis pleased.

"I ken it's no pleasing for you to hear, madam," answered Jenny hardly; "and it's as little pleasant for me to tell; but as gude ye seld ken a' about same as you, for the hall Castle's ringin' wi'."

"Ringin' with what, Jenny? Have you a mind to drive me mad?" answered Edith, impatiently.

"Just that Henry Morton of Millwood is out wi'the rebels, and one o' their chief leaders," said Edith.

"Ah!" said Edith, a most base calumny! and you are very bold to dare to repeat it to me. Henry Morton is incapable of such treachery to his king and country—such cruelty to me—to all the dear and dearest, and me, who must suffer in a civil war—tell you he is utterly in capable of it, in every sense."

"Dear! dear! Miss Edith," replied Jenny, still constant to her text, "they maun be better acquainted wi' young men than I am, or ever wish to be, that can tell preposterously what they're capable or no capable of. But there has been Trooper Tom, and another child, out in bonnets and gray plaid, like countrymen, to recon—reconnoit—"I think John Gudyll ca'd it; and they have been among the rebels, and brought back word that they had seen young Millwood mounted on one o' the dragon horses that were taken at Loudon-hill, armed wi' swords and pis tols, like wha but him, and hand and glove wi' the foremost o' them, and dreening and commanding the men; and Cuddie at the heels o' him, in ane o' Ser giant Bothwell's laced waistcoats, and a cockat hat with a bab o' blue ribands at it for the auld cause o' the Covenant, (but Cuddie aye liked a blue riband,) and smar the same lord o' the land—it sets the like o' him, indeed!"

"Jenny," said her young mistress hastily, "it is impossible these men's report can be true; my uncle has read it on o' the wall at this laddie's order:
"Because Tam Halliday," answered the hand maiden, "came in just five minutes after Lord Evandal e; and when he heard his lordship was in the Castle, he swore (the profane loon!) he would be d—er he would make the report, as he ca'd it, of his news to Major Bellenden, since there was an officer of his air regiment in the garrison. She had been within the hall next morning; only he told me about it." (here Jenny looked a little down,) "just to vex me about Cuddie.

"Poh! you silly girl," said Edith, assuming some courage, "it is all a trick of that fellow to tease you.

"Na, madam, it canna be that, for John Gudyll took the other dragoon (he's an auld hard-favoured man, his name) into the Evandale and gave him a taes o' brandy to get the news out o' him, and he said just the same as Tam Halliday, word for word; and Mr. Gudyll was in sie a rage, that he ta'd it 'never again to take drink,' and says the report is to the nonsense o' my Ledy and the Major, and Lord Evandale, that begged off young Millwood and Cuddie yesterday morning, for that, if they had suf fered, the country wad has been spent, and truth I am muckle o' that opinion myself."

This last commentary Jenny added to her tale, in resentment of her mistress's extreme and obstinate anxiety, which, seemingly alarmed, however, by the effect which her news produced upon her young lady, an effect rendered doubly violent by the High Church principles and prejudices in which Miss Be lenden had been brought up. The Major returned to his military carers, and said the Monitor was pale as a corpse, his respiration so difficult that it was on the point of altogether failing her, and her limbs so incapable of supporting her, that she sank, either to the ground or to the seats in the hall, and seemed on the eve of fainting. Jenny tried cold water, burnt feathers, cutting of laces, and all other remedies usual in hysterical cases, but without any effect.

"God forgive me! what has I done?" said the reptile fille-de-chambre. "I wish my tongue had been cutt out! Wha wad hae thought o' her takin' raking for a young lad, for a young lad, for a young lad.
Near Miss Edith, hugd her heart up about it, it's maybe no true for a' that I hae said—O, I wish my mouth had been blistered! A bodly tells me my tongue will do me a mischief some day. What if my Ledy comes o' the Major? and she's sitting in the throne, too, that naebody has sat in since that weary morning the King was here!—O, what will I do? O, what will become o' us?"

While Jenny Dennison thus lamented herself and her mistress, Edith slowly returned from the paroxysms into which she had been thrown by this unexpected intelligence.

"If he had been unfortunate," she said, "I never would have deserted him. I never did so, even when there was danger and disgrace in pleading his cause.
If he had been unfortunate, I mean, while he had been unfair, I would have forgiven him; but a rebel to his King,—a traitor to his country,—the associate and colleague of cut-throats and common stabbers—the persecutor of all that is noble,—the profec ed and blasphemous enemy of all that is sacred,— will tear him from my heart, if my life-blood should ebb in the effort."

She wiped her eyes, and rose hastily from the great chair, (or throne, as Lady Margaret used to call it,) while the terrified damsel hastened to shake up the cushion, and efface the appearance of any one having occupied that sacred seat; although King Charles himself, considering the youth and beauty as well as the affection of the moment unsurer of his hol lowed chair, would probably have thought his bits of the profundity. She then hastened officiously to press her support on Edith, as she paced the hall ap parently in deep meditation.

"Tak my arm, madam; better join my arm; scrowor its veet, and doublt—"

"No, Jenny," said Edith, with firmness; "ye have seen my weakness, and you shall see my strength!"

"But ye leaned on me the other morning, Miss Edith, when ye were sae sair griev'd."

"Misplaced and erring affection may require sup port, Jenny—duty can support itself; yet I will do nothing rashly. I will be aware of the reasons of his conduct and then—cast him off for ever." was the first and only answer she gave.

Overworn by a manner of which she could neither conceive the motive, nor estimate the merit, Jenny answered between her teeth, "Odd, when the first that a love. Miss Belfenden finds it as easy as I do, and

By forty that, it's maybe as weel to have a friend on burial side. But child come here, will tak the Castle, as it's light, when there's a little victual, and the dragons wasting what's on it, to, in, and on, as Miss Belfenden and Miss Wlad have the upper hand, and their friendship be as dear to her—[I was in company of the morning I heard the news.]

With a consolatory reflection the damsel went about her usual occupations, leaving her mistress to school her mind as she thought best, for evafragating the sentences which she had hitherto entertained towards Henry Morton.

CHAPTER XXV.

Once more into the breach—dear friends, once more!

Henry V.

On the evening of this day, all the information which they could procure led them to expect, that the insurgents had placed the camp on the mountain, which they had occupied in the approach against Tillettudium. Lord Evandale's wounds had been examined by Piko, who reported them in a very promising state. They were numerous, but none of them was the least loss of blood, as much indeed as the so-called specialty of Lady Margaret, had prevented any tendency to fever; so that, notwithstanding he felt some pain and great weakness, the patient maintained that he was able to creep about with the assistance of a stick. In these circumstances he refused to be confined to his apartment, both that he might encourage the soldiers by his presence, and in order to be called to the place of defence, which the Major might be supposed to have arranged upon something of an antiquated fashion of warfare. Lord Evandale was well qualified to give advice on such subjects, having served during his early youth, both in France and in the Low Countries. There was little or no occasion, however, for altering the preparations already made; and, excepting on the article of provisions, there seemed no reason to fear for the defence of so strong a place against such assailants as those by whom it was threatened.

The next day, Lord Evandale and Major Belfenden were on the battlements again, viewing and reviewing the state of their preparations, and anxiously expecting the approach of the enemy. I own that I expected them to be in a much more advanced state than they were, and that I was very pleasantly surprised when they were found to be regularly made and received; but the Major treated the report that Morton was in arms against the government with the most scornful incredulity.

I know the lad better," was the only reply he designed to make; "the fellows have not dared to venture near enough, and have been deceived by some fanciful resemblance, or have picked up some story.

I think you, Major," answered Lord Evandale, "I think you will see that young gentleman at the head of the insurgents; and, though I shall be heartily sorry for it, I shall not be greatly surprised.

"You are as bold as the Devil," the Major, who contended yesterday morning down my way, that this young fellow, who so high-spirited and gentleman-like a boy as I have ever known, wanted but an opportunity to place himself at the head of the rebels."

"And considering the usage which he has received, and the suspicions under which he lives," said Lord Evandale, "considering the eight phases do have? For my own part, I should hardly know whether he deserved most blame or pity.

"Blame, my lord?—Pity," echoed the Major, "you are hearing such sentiments; he would deserve to be hanged, that's all; and, were he my own son, I should see him strung up with pleasure—Blime, indeed! But your lordship cannot think as you are pleased to speak."

I gave an account, Major Belfenden, that I have been for some time of opinion, that our politicians, and prefetts have driven matters to a painful extremity in this country, and have alarmed, by violence, the minds of the better sort, but all those in the upper ranks, whom strong party-feeling, or a desire of court-interest, does not attach to their standard."

"I am a statistician," answered the Major, "and I do not understand niceties.

"I trust," replied the young lord, "you will not find me more backward than yourself, though I heartily wish that the enemy were foreigners. It is, however, no time to debate that matter, for sooner they come, and we must defend ourselves as well as we can."

As Lord Evandale spoke, the van of the insurgents began to make their appearance on the road which crossed the top of the hill, and through a declivity opposite to the Tower. They did not, however, move downwards, as if aware that, in doing so, their columns would be exposed to the fire of the artillery of the fort. By the number, which at first seemed few, it appeared to them to be able to defend themselves that, judging of the masses which occupied the road behind the hill from the closeness of the front line of their files, their force appeared very considerable. There was a sense of anxiety on both sides; and, while the unsteady ranks of the Coventrians were agitated, as if by pressure, behind, and uncertain to their friends at the foot, a picturesque view from their vantage, glanced in the morning sun, whose beams were reflected from a grove of pikes, muskets, halberds, and battle-axes. The armed mass occupied, for a few minutes, this fluctuating position, until three or four horsemen, who seemed to be leaders, advanced from the front, and occupied the height a little nearer to the Castle. John Gudyll, who was not wont to crawl beneath his man, brought a gun to bear on this detached group.

"I'll fire the falcon,"—(so the small cannon was called,)—"I'll fire the falcon where'er your honour gives command; my corks, she'll ruffle their feathers for them!"

The Major looked at Lord Evandale.

"Stay a moment," said the young nobleman, "they send us a flag of truce."

In fact, one of the horsemen at that moment dismounted, and, displaying a white cloth on a pike, moved towards the Tower, while the Major and Lord Evandale descending the hill, and the officers of the main fortress, advanced to meet him as far as the barricade, judging it wise to admit him within the precincts which they designed to defend. At the same time the principal horsemen had made the same movement, and, in a few minutes, the remnant of the horsemen, as if they had anticipated the preparations of John Gudyll for their annoyance, withdrew from the advanced station which they had occupied, and fell back to the main body.

The envoy of the Coventrians, to judge by his men and manner, seemed fully imbued with that spiritual pride which distinguished his sect. His features were drawn up to a contemptuous prissiness, and his half-lid eyes seemed to scorn to look upon the terrestrial objects around, while, at every solemn stride, his toes were pointed outward with an air that appeared to them as if they were the form of the tablet. Lord Evandale could not suppress a smile at this singular figure.

"Did you ever," said he to Major Belfenden, "see such an un-accustomed one? One would think it moves upon springs—Can it speak, think you?"

"O, say," said the Major; "that seems to be one of my old acquaintance, a genuine puritan of the eight phases do have."

Blame, my lord?—Pity," echoed the Major, "you are hearing such sentiments; he would deserve to be hanged, that's all; and, were he my own son, I should see him strung up with pleasure—and Lord Evandale?" answered the Major.

"Are you the parties?" said the Laird of Langdale, in the same sharp, conceited, disrespectful tone of voice.

"Even so, for fault of better," said the Major.

"Then there is the public summons," said the envoy, putting a paper into Lord Evandale's hand, and there is a private letter for Miles Bellenden from a godly youth, who is honoured with leading a part of our host. Read them quickly, and God give you grace to frustrify the contents, though it is much to be doubted."

The summons ran thus: "We, the named and constituted leaders of the gentlemen, ministers, and others, presently in arms for the cause of liberty and true religion, do warn and summon William Lord Evandale and Miles Bellenden of Charnwood, and others presently in arms, and keeping garrison in the Tower of Tillietudlem, to surrend the said Tower upon fair conditions of quarter, and license to depart with bag and baggage, otherwise to suffer such extremity of fire and sword as belong by the laws of war to those who hold out an untenable post. And so may God defend his own good cause!"

This summons was signed by John Ballif of Burley, as quarter-master-general of the army of the Covenant, for himself, and in name of the other leaders.

The letter to Major Bellenden was from Henry Morton. It was couched in the following language:

"I have taken a step, my venerable friend, which, among many painful consequences, will, I am afraid, incur your very decided disapprobation. But I have taken my resolution in honour and good faith, and with the full approval of my own conscience. I can no longer submit to have my own rights and those of my fellow-subjects trampled upon, our freedom violated, our persons insulted, and our blood spilt, without just cause or legal trial. Providence, through the violence of the oppressors themselves, seems now to have opened a way of deliverance from this intolerable tyranny, and I do not hold him deserving of the name and rights of a freeman, who, thinking as I do, shall withhold his arm from the cause of his coun-arguments would lose their influen from an unwelcome quarter. I will off with assuring you, that whatever may be hereafter towards me, my to you can never be diminished, would be the happiest moment of a give me more effectionate means the assurance of you. Therefore, until the moment of resentment you may my make to you, let not that prevent the topic, if future events should reme able; for whenever, or however, vice to you, it will always afford the tion to"

Having read this long letter with indignation, Major Bellenden put it to Lord Evandale:

"I would not have believed th Henry Morton, if half mankind ha ungrateful, rebellious traitor! rebel and without even the pretext of warn the liver of such a crack-friend the envoy there. But I shou be, he was a presbyterian—1 or aware that I was nursing a wolf bical nature would make him it at me on the first opportunity, on earth again, and a presbyterian rebel of three months—it is in the ve."

"Well," said Lord Evandale, "I to recommend surrender; but, if it, and we receive no relief from Edin I think we ought to avail ourselves get the ladies, at least, safe out of th."

"They will endure all, ere they protection of such a smooth-tongued avowed the Major indignantly; "I ther for relatives were it other dismiss the worthy ambassador," said, turning to Langdale, "tell y the mob they have gathered you have not a particular opinion of the own skulls. I would advise them to knock them against those old wall send no more flares of truce, or we son's a bit over hard for them—it's no for naught that the hawk whistles.

Above these words, the ridge was once more crowded with the ranks of the enemy. A general discharge of their fire-arms was directed against the defenders upon the battlements. Under cover of this, the march of the command down the road with determined courage, and, sustaining with firmness a heavy fire from the garrison, they forced their way, in spite of opposition, to the first barricade by which the avenue was defended. They were led on by Balfour in person, who displayed courage equal to his enthusiasm; and, in spite of every opposition, forced the barricade, killing and wounding several of the defenders, and making a breach in it to their second position. The precautions, however, of Major Bellenden rendered this success unnerving; for no sooner were the Covenanters in possession of the post, than a close and destructive fire was poured into it from the Castle, and from those stations which commanded it in the rear. Having no means of protecting themselves from this fire, or of returning it with effect against men who were under cover of their barricades and defences, the Covenanters were obliged to retreat; but not until they had, with their axes, destroyed the stockade, so as to render it impregnable, and the companions of their fallen comrades in arms fell upon them as to fire upon the enemy without endangering their friends. The sharp-shooters, dispersed around, were firing incessantly on each object that was exposed upon the barricade, and again against Balfour. The retreat of the party he commanded was not effected without heavy loss, and served as a severe lesson concerning the local advantages possessed by the garrison.

The next attack of the Covenanters was made with more caution. A strong party of marksmen, (many of them competitors at the game of the pop-nail,) advanced in company with Balfour through the woods where they afforded them the best shelter, and, avoiding the open road, endeavoured, by forcing their way through the bushes and trees, and up upon the ridge, which bounded it on either side, to gain a position, from which, without being exposed in an intolerable degree, they might annoy the flank of the second barricade, while it was menaced in front by a second attack from Balfour. The leaders saw the danger of this movement, and endeavoured to impede the approach of the marksmen, by firing upon them at every point where they showed themselves. They succeeded, for a time, in persuading, by dint of good coolness, spirit, and judgment, in the manner in which they approached the defences. This was, in a great measure, to be ascribed to the steady and adroit manner in which the young leader, who showed as much skill in protecting his own followers as spirit in annoying the enemy, repeatedly enjoined his marksmen to direct their aim chiefly upon the redcoats, and to save the others engaged in the defence of the Castle; and, above all, to spare the life of the old Major, whose anxiety made him more than once expose himself in a manner, that, without such generosity on the part of the enemy, might have proved fatal. A dropping fire of musketry now glanced from every part of the precipitous mount on which the Castle was founded. From a bush, or hedge— from a clump of trees, the marksmen continued to advance, availing themselves of branches and roots to assist their ascent, and contending at once with the disadvantages of the ground and the fire of the enemy. At length they got so high on the ascent, that several of them possessed an opportunity of firing into the barricade against the defenders, who then lay exposed to their aim. But this moment, the onset of moment, moved forward to the attack in front. His onset was made with the same desperation and fury as before, and met with less resistance, the defenders being scattered about, and the sharp-shooters had made in turning the flank of their position. Determined to improve his advantage, Balfour, with his axe in his hand, pursued the party whom he had disabled, and, in the interval of the forward and last barricade, entered it along with them.
TALES OF MY LANDLORD. [CHAP. X.

ingy; for, unless that he was something apprehensive of the reception he might meet with in the inside, his conscience insisted that he was making but a slight chance of Major Bellenden's favours and protection. He got up, however, into the yew-trees, followed by his companions, one after another.
The window was small, and had been secured by stanchions of iron, but these had been long worn away by time, or forced out by the domestics to possess a free passage for their occasional convenience. Entrance was therefore easy, providing there was one in the party, a passage so vast as to endevour to discover before he made the final and perilous step. While his companions, therefore, were urging and threatening him behind, and he was hesitating and hesitating, he took his key, and entered the apartment, his head became visible to Jenny Dennison, who had ensconced herself in said pantry as the safer place in which to wait the issue of the assault.
So soon as this object of terror caught her eye, she set up a hysteric scream, flew to the adjacent kitchen,and, in the desperate agony of fear, seized on a pot of kail-brose which she herself had hung on the fire before the combat began, having previously caused to be sent by Halliday to prepare his breakfast for him. Thus burdenred, she returned to the window of the pantry, and still exclaiming, "Murder! murder! we are a harny rascal's crew!" and as if the Church's Commander were the only person in the place, she discharged the whole scalding contents of the pot, accompanied with a dismal yell, upon the person of the unfortunate Cuddie. However welcome the him, as far as the interest of the cause I have said will permit. I never made a secret of my love for him."

"And of that," said Burley; "but, if thou conceale it, I should, nevertheless, have found thy riddle. Now hearken to my words. This Belkenneth hath means to subdue his garrison to himself."

"This is not the case," answered Morton; "we know those are hardly equal to a week’s consumption."

"No, but," continued Burley; "I have since had other stronger nature, that such a garrison is in the garrison by that witty and gray-headed saint, partly to prevail on the soldiers to submit a ministration of their daily food, partly to detain us till the walls of the fort until the sword is set to smile and destroy us."

"And why was not the evidence of this laid before the council of war?" said Morton.

"What purpose?" said Balfour. "Why need selective Kettledrumme, Macbrair, Pontedrex, tunzeil, upon such a point? Thyself must own, whatever is told to them escapes to the lost unit and is not noticed by the preachers at their next meeting. They are already discouraged by the thoughts of being before the fort a week. What would be the use were they ordered to prepare for the worst?"

"I never doubt it, than, from me? or why tell now? I, and above, all proofs have you got fact!" continued Morton.

"And that is the reason," replied Burley; and he to his hands a number of requisitions sent forth to major Belkenneth, with receipts on the back to as propitiate, for cattle, corn, meal, &c., to an amount, that he of his will seemed to ex
tingle the possibility of the garrison being soon dec d for provisions. But Burley did not inform of a fact which he himself knew full well, y, that the garrison, owing to the rapacity of the droogons to collect them, who readily sold to one man they took from another, and abused the Major’s for stores, pretty much as Sir John Pultalil did of the King for men.

and now," continued Balfour, observing that he made the desired impression, "I have only to say that I concealed this from thee no longer than it concealed from myself, for I have only received papers this morning; and I tell it unto thee now, thou mayest go on thy way rejoicing, and work through all this together."

"The king’s commission of Kilbride, I mean; no evil can befall thy friends in the maligna
, since their fort is abundantly victualled, and I see not numbers sufficient to do more against it than to strengthen it."

"And why," continued Morton, who felt an inex sible reluctance to acquiesce in Balfour’s reason
"why not permit me to remain in the command as smaller party, and march forward yourself to gow? It is the more honourable charge."

And therefore, young man," answered Burley, ye I laboured that it should be committed to the of Silas Morton. I am waging old, and this war has a thousand of honour where it could be ered by danger. I speak not of the frothy bubble that men call earthly fame, but the honour belonging to him who has the chance to return with his career is yet to run. Thou hast to bestow the trust which has been bestowed on thee through assurance that it was fairly well-merited. At Mon-bill thou went a captive, and at the last ult it was thy part to fight under cover, whilst I the more open and dangerous attack; and, last thou now remain before these walls when I at worst knew, it was advisable to the party gained by the repulse, he had still the mortification to hear many of those in his ranks muttering to each other, that "this came of trusting to intruders from a bail of boys; and the last renewal of their attack, as he did that of the barbier of Tillicoultry, the issue would have been as different as might be."

"It was with burning resentment that Morton burst..." these reflections thrown out by the very men who had soonest exhibited signs of disaffection. The utmost prospect, however, had the effect of firing his emulation, and making him as Agile as he was active, it was absolutely necessary that he should conquer or die.
"I have no retreat," he said to himself. "All shall allow—even Major Bellenden—even Edith—that in courage, at least, the rebel Morton was not inferior to his father.
The condition of the army after the repulse was so undisciplined, and in such disorganization, that the least thought of trying to draw them together from the city to gain time for reducing them once more into such order as they were capable of adopting. Recruits, in the mean while, came fast in, more numerous by the extreme hardships of their own condition, and encouraged by the advantage obtained at London-hill, than defeated by the last unfortunate enterprise. Many of these attacked themselves particularly to Morton's division. He had, however, the mortification to see that his unpopularity among the more intolerant part of the Covenanters increased rapidly. The prudence beyond his years, which he exhibited in the conduct and arrangement of his followers, they termed a trusting in the arm of flesh, and his avowed tolerance for those of religious sentiments and observances different from his own, they misconstrued to the makeshift of Gallo!, who cared for none of those things.
What was worse than these misconceptions, the mob of the insurgents, always loudest in applause of those who preached rebellion and open sedition, in public, disputed with such as endeavoured to reduce them to the yoke of discipline preferred assembly the most zealous leaders, in whose ranks enthusiasm in the excitement of general hatred and good-natured subjection, to the restraints which Morton endeavoured to bring them under. In short, while bearing the principal burden of command, for his colleagues were as long as they could, but any thing favourable to the arms of the army was troublesome and obnoxious in the office of general,) Morton found himself without that authority, which alone could render his regulations effectual.
Yet, notwithstanding these obstacles, he had, during the course of a few days, laboured so hard to introduce some degree of discipline into the army, that he thought he might hazard a second attack upon Claverhouse, with a better prospect of success.
It cannot be doubted that Morton's anxiety to measure himself with Colonel Grahame of Claver-house, at whose hands he had sustained such injury, had its share in giving the motive to his unsuccessful exactions. But Claverhouse disappointed his hopes; for, satisfied with having the advantage in repulsing the first attack upon Glasgow, he determined that he would not, until the handful of men under his com-dand, avert a second assault from the insurgents, with more numerous and better disciplined forces than had supported their first enterprise. He therefore evacuated the place, and marched at the head of his troops towards Edinburgh. The insurgents of Glasgow without resistance, and without Morton having the opportunity, which he so demanded, of giving manner to his unceasing attempts. But, although he had not an opportunity of saving away the disgrace which had befallen his division of the army of the Covenant, the retreat of Claverhouse, and the possession of Glasgow, tended greatly to animate the insurgent army, and to increase its numbers. The necessity of appointing new officers of organizing new regiments and squads to making them acquainted with at least the most necessary points of military discipline, were things which, however, he could not so easily arrange upon Henry Morton, and which he the more readily undertook, because his father had made his acquainted with the theory of the military art, and because, he plainly saw, that, unless he succeeded in a display not unbractic, but absolutely necessary labour, it was vain to expect any other to engage in it.
In the mean while, fortune appeared to favour the enterprise of the Covenant, as the metc® game durst have expected. The Privy Council of Scotland, astonished at the extent of resistance with their arbitrary measures had provoked, sent supplied with an offer, and incapable of taking steps to subdute the resentment which these measures had excited. There were but very few troops in Scotland and these they drew towards Edinburgh, as if men an army for the protection of the metropolis.
In feudal array of the crown vessels in the various ports, was ordered to take the field, and reappear to King the military service due for their hire. This is monum, excessive and general, as well as not generally popular among the gentry; and the men who were not unwilling themselves to have been taken arms, were deterred by the remuneration of the kings, are, mothers, and subjects, to their engaging in the cause.
Mean while, the inadequacy of the Scotish arm ment to provide for their own defence, or to put up to a rebellion, was sufficiently evident in the dithering, excited at the English court doubt at all their capacity, and of the prudence of the revocy they had exerted against the oppressed presbyterians. It was proved, as it was said, the reason of the demand of the army of Scotland, the unfortunate bold of Monmouth, who had by marriage a great piece of land, and a numerous following as a result, in the absence of his master. The military skill which he had displayed on different circumstances abroad, was supposed more than ade-as a substitute in the insurrection in the field, and was esteemed that his mild temper, and the favorable position which he showed to presbyterian in spirit might soften men's minds, and tend to reconcile him to the government. The Duke was, therefore, more than ever, disposed of getting the distracted affairs of Scotland, and disperse from London with strong succours to take the presbyterian military command in that country.

CHAPTER XXVII.

I am bound to Bothwellhill,
Where I muse either do or die.

Old Ballad

There was now a pause in the military movenen on both sides. The government seemed conscious of not preventing the rebels advancing towards the Cape while the insurgents were intent upon augmenting and strengthening their forces. For the pres-tant they established a sort of encampment in the region belonging to the ducal residence at Hamilton, the critical situation for receiving their recruits, and who were secured from any sudden attack, by the clyde, a deep and rapid river, in front of which was a bridge, near the castle and village of Bothwel. Morton remained here for about a month on the attack on Glasgow, actively engaged in the duties of the day, in the gathering of recruits from Berwick, but they only stated, in no that the Castle of Tullietdileum continued to be owned by it, and that the Bishop of Stirling, in charge of the castle, imposed upon the soldiers a command his desire, or rather his intention,—for by no means apprehensive, for the military council insurgents were evidently making steps to These funds which tore to pieces the little army of insurgents, turned mainly on the point whether the king's interest or royal authority was to be owned or not, and whether the party in arms were to be contented with a free exercise of their own religion, or insist in the re-establishment of Presbyterianity in its supreme power, and the establishment of all other forms of worship. The few country gentlemen who were inclined to take any part of the clergy, thought it best to limit their demands to what it might be possible to attain. But the party who urged these measures were comparatively a very small proportion of the whole, now was the more eager. At the first gathering of the party, men, namely, who were willing to follow the members of the church of England, the clergy, and the people, and accentuated them "a more upon Mirrath, and a more upon Erachs," See the Life of Sir Robert Hamilton in the Work of his account of the Battle of Bothwell bridge.

It is the universal one that animates a romantic dreams of youth to the labours and active manhood. All that had formerly inte- nated was obliterated from his memory, except his attachment to Cuddie; and even his love have assumed a character more manly and refined, as it had become mellowed and contrast- ther duties and feelings. approaching Millwood, Henry’s knock upon the window intimated the consciousness timidity of a man who has been out of bounds, but the confi- man in full possession of his own rights, ter of his own actions—bold, free, and de- the door was cautiously opened by his old man, Mrs. Alison Wilson, who started back seeing the staid face and nodding plume of the sister.

“Is my uncle, Alison?” said Morton, smiling amiably.

“Ah, Mr. Harry! is this you?” returned the citaphet, “and would let no one blame me but yourself. I am aware of that!—Where is my uncle?”

“In Edinburgh,” replied Aliee: “I think it was best to gang and sit by the chimney when the rock rase—a vex’d man he’s been and a feard—but ye ken the Laird as well as I do.”

“Thou hope he has suffered nothing in health?” said Henry.

“Nothing to speak of,” answered the housekeeper, “nor in gudes neither—we fenced as well as we could; and, though the troopers of the Thistle muck’d the red cow and said Hackie, ye’ll mind them well, yet they stuck us a guile bargain o’ four they were driving to the Castle.”

“Sold ye a bargain?” said Morton; “how do you mean?”

“Oh, ou cam out to gather marts for the garn- son,” answered the housekeeper; “but they just fell to their auld trade, and rade through the country copper and selling a’ that they got, like the many west-country drovers. My currie, Major Bellenden was laid o’ the least share o’ what they lifted, though it was tae’n in his name.”

“Then,” said Morton, hastily, “the garnison must be straitened for provisions?”

“Stressed enough,” replied Aliee—“there’s little doubt o’ that.”

A light instantly glanced on Morton’s mind. “Burley must have deceived me—craft as well as cruelty is permitted by his creed.” Such was his inward thought; he said aloud, “I cannot stay, Mrs. Wilson, I must go forward directly.”

“But, oh! hide to eat a mouthful,” entreated the affectionate housekeeper, “and I’ll make it ready for you. I used to do them in the days of my youth.”

“It is impossible,” answered Morton. “Cuddie, get our horses ready.”

They’re just eating their corn,” answered the attendant.

“Cuddie!” exclaimed Aliee: “what garr’d ye bring that ill-faun’d, unlucky loon along wi’ ye? It was him and his randie mother began a’ the mischief in this house.”

“Tut, tut,” replied Cuddie, “ye should forget and forge, mistress. Mother’s in Glasgow wi’ her tute, and saul plaque ye mair; and I’m the Captain’s wattle now, and I keep him tighter in thick and rare than ever ye did—saw ye him ever see weel put on as he is now?”

“In truth and that’s true,” said the old house- keeper, looking with a countenance of great respect at her young master, whose mouth she thought much improved by his dress. “I’m sure ye ne’er had a faced countenance like that when ye were at Millwood; that’s name o’ my seeing.”

“No, na, mistress,” replied Cuddie, “that’s a rest o’ my head—and that’s a rest o’ Lord Ednam’s brains.”

“Lord Ednam?” answered the old lady, “that’s him that the whigs are gaun to hamp the young, as I hear say.”

“The whigs about to hang Lord Ednam? I said Morton, in the greatest surprise.

“Ay, truth en thee,” said the housekeeper. “Yesterday night he made a jelly, so they exit, (his mother’s name was Sally—I wonder they ye Christian folk’s names to see much in these days,) but he made an outbreak to get everything, and his men were out back and he was ta’en, an the young Captain Bell- four garr’d set up a flag, and swore, for revenge upon his conscience, for they wanna swear, if the garrison was not get over the moor by daylight, he would bring up the young lord, put thing as light as Hamman. These are fair times!”—but folk canna help them—see ye do ye sit down and tak bread and cherries and better trade ready. Ye whisken hues toed a word about it, and I hae thought it was to spoil your dinner, laddie.”

“Fed, or unfed,” exclaimed Morton, “wee’l the horses instantly, Cuddie. We must not let us go before the Castle.”

And, as saying all Aliee’s entreaties, they mounted on their steeds.

Morton and Cuddie rode off with all haste to the castle of Ormond.
That honest man had just resumed for an instant his pacific habits, and was pursuing an ancient theological treatise, with a pipe in his mouth, and a small fire in a hearth in the corner of his room. Perhaps the poor man, while engaged in the performance of this latter task, had not observed the approach of the stranger, for in the interval he had been in the street. He had just returned, being, as he said, on business of importance. He was a tall, thin, and rather ill-looking man, with a beard and a mustache, and was clad in a black coat and a black hat, with a white skin upon it. He looked very wretched, and his eyes were red and sunken. He was a man of middle age, and had a look of great astonishment upon his face when he saw young Mr. Holmes.
OLD MORTALITY.

"What is the matter, Jenny?" said Morton, kindly.
"You know how much I owe you in many respects, and can hardly make a request that I will not grant, if in my power."
Many thanks, Milnwood," said the weeping damsel; "but ye were aye a kind gentleman, though folk say ye be a strange bairn changeable."
"What do they say of me?" answered Morton.
"A body says," replied Jenny, "that you and the whigs hae made a vow to dinge King Charles off the throne, and that no friends of the present posteriors from generation to generation, shall sit upon it any mair; and John Gudly thince ye're to gie a' the church organs to the papers, and burn the Book o' Common-prayer by a' the common' man, in revenge of the Covenant that was burnt when the king cam' hame."
My friends at Tiltietiel'd judge too hastily and too ill of me," answered Morton. "I wish to have free exercise of my own religion, without insulting any other; and as to your family, I only desire an opportunity to show them I have the same friendship and kindness as ever."
"Bless your kind heart for saying so," said Jenny, bursting into a flood of tears; "and they never needed kindness or friendship mair, for they are famish'd for last."
"Good God!" replied Morton, "I have heard of scarcity, but not of famine! Is it possible?—Have the ladies and the Major—"
"They hae been sic near like the lave o' us," replied Jenny; "for they shared every bit and sup wi' the whole folk in the Castle—I'm sure my poor een see fifty colours wi' fairness, and my head's se dizzel wi' the myrtices that they canna stand my head agin it—Cuddy, fetch refreshments—food—wine, if possible—whatever you can find."
"Whisky is gude enough for her," muttered Cuddy; "ane wadna na thought that gude meal was sic scant among them, while the open thrae muckle guad Kail-house scalding hot about my lugs."
Faint and the said Jenny as the Major nae tae be, she could not hear the allusion to her plight during the storm of the Castle, without bursting into a laugh which was soon converted into a hysteric giggling. Concerned, he stated the distress and horror on the distress which must have been in the Castle, Morton repeated his command to Headigins in a peremptory manner; and when he had departed, endeavoured to soothe his visitor.
"You come, I suppose, by the orders of your mistress, to visit Lord Evandale?—Tell me what she desires; her orders shall be my law."
Jenny appeared to reflect a moment, and then said, "Your honour is sac auld a friend, I must needs trust to you, and tell the truth."
"Be assured, Jenny," said Morton, observing that she hesitated, "that you will best serve your mistress by dealing sincerely with me."
"Well, then, ye maun ken we're starving, as I said before, and have been mair days than one; and the Major has sworn that he expects relief daily, and that he will not gie owre the house to the enemy til we have eaten up his auld borts,—and they are unc.—he'll stick to the soles, as ye may gel mad, furt being tough in the leather. The Major says they think they will be forced to gie up at last, and they canna bide hunger, after the life they led at the Castle for quit four quarters. He's aye by-mast; and since Lord Evandale's taen, there's nae gude in the place, and gin Ils says he'll gie up the garrison to the whigs, and the Major and the leddies into the bargain, they'll be glad to hang themselve.""Scoundrels!" said Morton; "why do they not make terms for all in the Castle?"
"They are fear'd for denial o' quarter to themsell's, having dish a sue muckle mischeif through the country; Burley hae hanged a' or twa o' them already—say they want to draw their ain necks out o' the collar at hazard o' honest folk's." "And now we're sent," continued Morton, "to carry to Lord Evandale the unpleasent news of the men's mutiny?" "Just'en sae," said Jenny; "Tam Halliday took the run, and tould me a' about it, and gat me out o' the Castle to tell Lord Evandale, if possibly I could win at him." "But how can he help you?" said Morton; "he is grumling and grumbling." "Well-an, ay," answered the afflicted damsel; "but maybe he could mak fair terms for us—or, maybe, he could gie us some good advice—or, maybe, he might send his orders to the dragons to be civil-or." "Or, maybe," said Morton, "you were to try if it were possible to set him at liberty?" "If it were sae," answered Jenny with spirit, "it wadna be the first time I hae done my best to serve a friend in captivity." "True, Jenny," replied Morton, "I wad be most ungrateful to forget it. But here comes Cuddie with Peter, and I will go and speak to Lord Evandale, while you take some food and wine." "It wadna be aines ye should ken," said Cuddie to his master, that this Jenny, his Mrs. Denison, was here. "This is the reeler's man, to win into Lord Evandale's room without any body kennin. She was na thinking the, grasps, that I wadna hae had about me, and an unco fright yoke me when ye caam ahint and took a grip o' me," said Jenny, giving him a sly twitch with her finger and her thumb—"if ye hadn'a been a suck acquaintance, ye daft gommen!" Cuddie would not see that relenting grinned a smile on his artful mistress, while Morton wrapped himself up in his cloak, took his sword under his arm, and wen'- straight to the place of the young nobleman's confinement, asked the sentinels if anything extraordinary had occurred. "Nothing worth notice," they said, "excepting the loss that Cuddie took up, and two couriers that Captain Balfour had dispatched, one to the Reverend Ephraim Macbrier, another to Kettledrummle," both of whom were being kept from the drum ecclesiastic in difterent towns between the position of Burley and the head of Dumgoyne. The other courier went to meet the Duke of Monmouth. "The purpose, I presume," said Morton, with an affection of indifference, "was to call them hither." "So I understand," answered the sentinel, who understood nothing; "but the Duke of Monmouth is a virtual concealing that we had no right to take them up; and that, for one, I will never agree to." "Perhaps it is hardly to be expected you should," said Lord Evandale; "yet on that point, and I am certain the negotiations will be wrecked. I am wil-ing, however, having frankly told you my opinion, to do all in my power to bring about a reconciliation." "It is all we can wish or expect," replied Morton; "the issue is in God's hands, who disposes the hearts of princes. You accept, then, the safe conduct?" "Certainly," answered Lord Evandale; "and if I do not deserve upon the oblique, however—I have saved my life a second time, believe that I do not feel it the least." "And the garrison of Tillicoultry?" said Morton. "Shall be withdrawn as you propose," answered the young nobleman. "I am sensible the Major will be unable to bring the mutineers to reason; and I tremble to think of the consequences, should the ladies and the men be delivered up to this blood-thirsty ruffian, Burley." "You are in that case free," said Morton. "Prepare to mount on horseback; a few men whom I can trust shall attend you till you are in safety from our parties." Leaving Lord Evandale in great surprise and joy at this unexpected deliverance, Morton hastened to get two horses along the tender arms of a rider holding the rein of a spare horse. Jenny, who... while she partook of her refreshment, had contrived to make up her break with Cuddie, rode on the left hand of that valiant cavalier. The tramp of their horses and the Jacobite claims of Lord Edvandale's prisoner. Two men, whom he did not know, entered the apartment, disconcerted him of his letters, and conducting him down stairs, mounted him on the horse that had been tied up. They set out at a round trot towards Tillsudtem. The moonlight was giving way to the dawn when they approached that ancient fortress, and its dark massive tower, which had just received the first pale colouring of the morning. The party halted at the Tower barrier, not venturing to approach nearer for fear of the fire of the place. Lord Edvandale alone rode up to the front of it, a distance by Jenny Densmore. As they approached the gate, there was heard to sing in the court-yard a tumult, which accorded ill with the quiet serenity of a summer dawn. Cries and oaths were heard, a pistol-shot or two were discharged, and every thing announced that the mutiny had broken out. At this crisis Lord Edvandale arrived at the gate where Halliday was sentinel. On hearing Lord Edvandale's voice, he drew his sword, and that nobleman arrived among the mutinous troopers like a man dropped from the clouds. They were in the act of putting their design into execution, or, as it may be called, in the very act of insurrection; and we can but sit down to discern and overpower Major Bellenden, and Harrison, and others of the Castle, who were offering the best resistance in their power.

The presence of Edvandale changed the scene. He seized Inglis by the collar, and, abrasing him with his villany, ordered two of his comrades to seize and bind him, assuring the others, that their only chance of impunity would be in instant compliance. He then ordered the men into their ranks. They obeyed. He commanded them to ground their arms. They hesitated; but the instinct of discipline joined in the persuasion that they must yield to the superior officer, so the men of those arms must be supported by some forces without the gate, induced them to submit.

"Take away those arms," said Lord Edvandale to the people of the Castle; "they shall not be restored until these men know better the use for which they are intrusted with them. And now," he continued, addressing the mutineers, "begone!—Make the best use of a truce of an hour, which the enemy are contented to allow you. Take the road to Edinburgh, and meet me at the House-of-Muir. I need not bid you beware of committing violence by the order of any person, nor yet of any condition; but let me remind you of my own ancient name. Let your good name show that you mean to atone for this morning's baseness. Then, and when the disheartened soldiers shrank in silence from the presence of their officer, and, leaving the Castle, took the road to the place of rendezvous, making such haste as was inspired by the fear of meeting with some detached party of the insurgents, whom their present defenceless condition, and their former violence, might inspire with thoughts of revenge. Inglis, whom Edvandale destined for punishment, remained in custody. Halliday was praised for his conduct, and assured of succeeding to the rank of the cutpurse. These arrangements being hastily made, Lord Edvandale accosted the Major, before whose earnest scene had seemed to pass like the change of a dream.

"My dear Major, we must give up the place."

"Is it even so?" said Major Bellenden. "I was in hopes of you had brought reconciliation and supplication."

"Not a man—not a pound of meal," answered Lord Edvandale.

"Yet I am blest to see you," returned the honest Major; and it was informed yesterday that those psalm-singing rascals had a plot on your life, and I had matured the scoundrily dragoons ten months ago in order to beat up Burley's quarters and get you out of their mischief. And then, after all, you came in open mutiny. But what is to be done now?"

"I have, myself, no choice," said Lord Edvandale; weal of his country sincerely at heart, and conceiving himself in the discharge of a patriotic duty.

"It might be imprudent, perhaps, to indulge in such a project, without your consent, certainly in your presence," replied Miss Bellenden, "is an answer to that question.

"Not in the present instance, I plought you the word of a sailor, replied the horseman; "I have been taught to dread from my birth," said Edith; "and, if I am to speak at all, I must utter my real sentiments. God only can judge the heart—men must deliberate by intentions. Treason, murder by the sword and by gibbet, the oppression of a private family such as ours, who were only in arms for the defence of the established government, and of our property and possessions, which gives us a peculiar claim to that leave of vengeance to them, by whatever specious terms they may be gilded over.

"The guilt of civil war, rejoined the horseman—"the miseries which it brings in its train, lie as do the doors of those who provoked it by illegal oppression, rather than of such as are driven to arms in order to assert their natural rights as freemen.

"That is assuming the question," replied Edith, "which ought to be proved. Each party contends that they are in right of point of principle, and therefore the guilt must lie with them who first drew the sword; as, in any case, it is impossible that those animals who are the first to have recourse to violence.

"Alas!" said the horseman, "were our vindication to rest there, how easy would it be to show that we have no part in such an event! Would it not be to cast ourselves beyond the power of humanity itself, were we driven by oppression into open resistance?—But I perceive," he continued, sighing deeply, "that it is vain to plead before a House which has already prejudged, perhaps as much from preconceived ideas of the persons as to the principles of those engaged in it."

"Pardon me," answered Edith; "I have stated with sufficient exactness of the principles of the insurgents; of their person, I know nothing—not expecting to find in one solitary instance:"nand that instance," said the horseman, "has influenced your opinion; the whole body of the people in this nation is prejudiced, perhaps as much from preconceived ideas of the persons as to the principles of those engaged in it."

"Far from it," said Edith; "he is—at least I once thought him—one in whose scale few are fit to be weighed—he is—or he seemed—one of very talent, high faith, pure morality, and warm affections. Can I approve of a rebellion which has made such a man, formed to ornament, to enlighten, and to defend his country, the companion of gloomy and ignorant beings, or consort with brutes?—the brother-in-arms to banditti and highwaymen?—Surely, you meet such a one in your camp, tell him that Edith Bellenden has been a prey of anxiety, of irritation, and the delight of her honourable name, than the distress of her own house, and that she has better endured that famine which has wasted her cheek and dimmed her eye, than the pang of heart which attended the reflection by and through whom these calamities were inflicted."

As she thus spoke, she turned upon her companion a countenance, whose sad look attested the reality of her sufferings, even while it glowed with the temporary animation which accompanied her language. The horseman was not insensible to the appeal; he raised his hand to his brow with the motion of one who feels a pang shoot along his brain, passed it hastily over his face, and then pulled the shadowing hat still deeper on his forehead. The movement, and the feeling which it excited, did not escape Edith, nor did she remark them without surprise and regret.

"And yet," she said, "should the person of whom I speak seem to you too deeply affected by the hard opinion of your friend, say to him, that sincere repentance is next to suffering itself; that he has been, or rather fallen from a height not easily recovered, and the author of much mischief, because gilded by his ex- clamation, he may still be in some measure for the evil he has done.

"And in what manner?" asked the cavalier, in the same suppressed, and almost choked voice.

By lending his efforts to restore the blessings of peace to his distracted countrymen, and to induce the deduced rebels to lay down their arms. By saving their blood, he may avenge for that which has been already spilt, and that shall not be the most in accomplishing this great end, will best deserve the thanks of this age, and an honoured remembrance in the next."

"And in such a peace," said her companion, with a firm voice. "Miss Bellenden would not wish, I think, that the interests of the people were sacrificed unreservedly to those of the crown?

"I am but a girl," was the young lady's reply; "and I scarce can speak on the subject without presumption. But, since I have gone so far, I will fairly add, I would wish to see a peace which should give the people a voice in the disposition of their own military rapine, which I detest as much as I do the means now adopted to resist it."

"Miss Bellenden," answered Henry Morton raising his face, and inclining in his saddle, "the person who has lost such a highly-valued place in your esteem, has yet too much spirit to plead his cause as a criminal; and, conscious that he can no longer claim a friend's interest in your bosom, he would be silent under your hard censure, were it not that he can refer to the honoured testimony of Lord Evandale, that his earnest wishes and most active exertions are, even now, directed to the accomplishment of such a peace as the most loyal cannot condemn."

He bowed with dignity to Miss Bellenden, who, though her language intimated that she well knew of whom he spake, probably had not expected that he would justify himself with such unusual animation. She returned his salute, confused and in silence. Morton then rode forward to the head of the party.

"Henry Morton! exclaimed Major Bellenden, surprised at the sudden apparition.

"The same," answered Morton; "who is sorry that he could not harmonize the hard construction of Major Bellenden and his family. He comes to you, Lord Evandale," he continued, turning towards the young nobleman, and bowing to him, "the charge of understanding his friends, both regarding the particulars of his conduct and the purity of his motives. Farewell, Major Bellenden—all happiness attend you and yours—May we meet again in happier and better times!"

"Believe me," said Lord Evandale, "your confidence, Mr. Morton, is not misplaced, I will endeavours to repay the great services I have received from you by doing my best to place your character on its proper footing. Mr. Major Bellenden, and all whose esteem you may have.""

"I expected no less from your generosity, my lord," said Morton.

He then called his followers, and rode off along the heath in the direction of Hamilton, their feathers waving and their steel caps glancing in the beams of the setting sun. Cuddie Headring alone remained an instant behind his companions to take an affectionate farewell of Jenny Dennison, who had contrived, during this short morning's ride, to re-establish her influence over his susceptible bosom. A straggling tree or two obscured, rather than concealed, their tête-à-tête, as they halted their horses to bid adieu.

"Fare ye well, Jenny," said Cuddie, with a loud exertion of his lungs, intended perhaps to be a sigh, but rather resembling the intonation of a groan—"I'll think of you, dear Cuddie, and time and time again, will you be kind to me, Jenny? Jenny? Jenny? Jenny? Jenny!"

"Whiles—at breaze-time," answered the malicious damsel, unable either to suppress the repartee, or the arch smile which attended it.

Cuddie took his revenge as rustic lovers are wont; and as Jenny probably expected,—caught his mien round the neck of Jenny—he bent the neck of Jenny—then the horse and horseman turned, and then turned his horse and trotted off to his master.

"Deil's in the fellow," said Jenny, wiping her lips and adjusting her head-dress. "He's twice the spunk o' Tam Halliday, after a. —Coming, my laddy, coming—Lord have a care o' us, I trust the old lad didn't see us!"

"Jenny," said Lady Margaret, as the damsel came..."
OLD MORTALITY.

up," was not that young man who commanded the party the same that was captain of the popinjay, and who was afterwards prisoner at Tillicoultry on the morning Claverhouse came there on. He had no hand in the matter, but no reference to her own little matters, looked at her young mistress, to discover, if possible, whether it was her cue to speak truth or not. Not being able to catch any hint to avert it, she followed her instinct as a lady's maid, and lied.

"I dinna believe it was him, my leddy," said Jenny, as confidently as if she had been saying her catechism. "She's a little lassie that," said she.

"You must have been blind, Jenny," said the Major: "Henry Morton is tall and fair, and that youth is the very man.

"I had the thing ad to be looking at him," said Jenny, tossing her head; "he may be as fair as a farding candle, for me.

"Is it not," said Lady Margaret, "a blessed escape which we have made, out of the hands of so desperate and bloodthirsty a fanatic?"

"You are deceived, madam," said Lord Evandale: "Mr. Morton merits such a title from no one, but least of all from you. I am told that you are now on your safe retreat to your friends, instead of being prisoners to a real fanatical homicide, is solely and entirely owing to the prompt, active, and energing presence of this young gentleman.

He then went into a particular narrative of the events which the reader is acquainted, dwelling upon the merits of Morton, and expatiating on the rancor with which he had rendered them these important services, as if he had been a brother instead of a rival.

"I was worse than ungrateful," he said, "were I silent in the merits of the man who has twice saved my life.

"I would willingly think well of Henry Morton, my lord," replied Major Bellenden; "and I own he had never offended me to purpose. But I cannot have the same allowances which it pleases your lordship to entertain for his present conduct.

"You are to consider," replied Lord Evandale, "that he has been partly forced upon them by necessity; and I must add, that his principles, though differing in some degree from my own, are such as our countrymen regard with respect. I have some knowledge of men is not to be disputed, spoke justly of him as to his extraordinary qualities, but with prejudice, and harshly, concerning his principles and maxims.

"You have not been long in learning all your extraordinary qualities, my lord," answered Major Bellenden, "I who have known him from boyhood, could, with less space, have stated, with equal surety, some of his great principles and good-nature; but as to his high talents-"

"They were, probably hidden, Major," replied the generous Lord Evandale, "even from himself, until circumstances called them forth; and, if I have detected them, was only because our intercourse and conversation turned on momentous and important subjects. He is now labouring to bring this rebellion to an end, and the terms he has proposed are so moderate, that they shall not want my hearty recommendation.

"And have you hopes," said Lady Margaret, "to accomplish a scheme so comprehensive?"

"I should have, madam, were every whig as moderate as Morton, and every loyalist as disinterested as Major Bellenden. But such is the fanaticism and violent irritation of both parties, that I fear nothing will end this civil war save the edge of the sword." It may be readily supposed that Edith listened with the deepest interest to this conversation. While she regretted that she had expressed herself harshly and hastily to her lover, she felt a conscious and proud satisfaction that his character was, even in the judgment of others, so high. She had a rival, such as her own attachment had once spoilt.

"Civil feuds and domestic prejudices," she said, "may render it necessary for me to hear his remembrance from my heart; but it is no small rebuke to know assuredly, that it is worthy of the place it has so long retained there."

While Edith was thus retracting her unjust remon-santions, her eyes rested at the camp of the insurgents, near Hamilton, which she found in considerable confusion. Certain advices had arrived that the royal army, having been recruited from England by a large detachment of the King's Guards, were about to take the field. Fame magnified their numbers and their high state of equipment and discipline, and spread abroad other circumstances, which dismayed the pride of the brave and courage of the weak. Wherever they might have expected from Monmouth, was likely to be intercepted by the influence of those associated with him in command. His lieutenant-general was the celebrated General Thomas D'Alton, who, having practised the art of war in the then barbarous country of Russia, was as much feared for his cruelty and indifference to human life and human sufferings, as respected for his steady loyalty and undaunted valour.

This man was second in command to Monmouth, and the horse were commanded by Cleverhouse, burning with desire to revenge the death of his nephew, whom they regarded as a friend. To these acc-counts was added the most formidable and terrific description of the train of artillery and the cavalry force with which the royal army took the field.*

Large quantities of treasure, having in language, religion, and manners, no connection with the insurgents, had been summoned to join the royal army under their various chieftains; and these Americans, afterwards the insurgents, deemed them, came like eagles to the slaughter. In fact, every person who could ride or run at the King's command, was summoned to arms, apparently with the purpose of fighting and finding. The English and the Scots, men of property whom their principles might deter from joining the royal standard, though prudence prevented them from joining that of the insurgent Presbyterians. In that short time they had with speed encouraged, no apprehension among the insurgents, that the King's vengeance had only been delayed in order that it might fall more certain and more heavy.

Morton endeavoured to fortify the minds of the common people by pointing out the probable exaggeration of these reports, and by reminding them of the strength of their own situation, with an undoubted river in front, only passing by a long and narrow bridge. He called to their remembrance their victory over Claverhouse when their numbers were few, and then much worse disciplined and appointed for battle than now. Hence to them that the provo on which they lay afforded, by its undulation, and the thickness which intersected it, considerable protection against artillery, and even against cavalry, if stently defended; and that these advantages, in fact, depended on their own spirit and resolution.

* A Cameronian muse was awakened from slumber on this delightful occasion, and gave the following account of the muster of the royal forces, in poetry nearly as melodiously as the subject:

They marched east through Lithgow-town
For to enslave their forces.
And went for all the north-country
And took the view, both foot and horse.
Montrose did come and Athole both,
And with them many more;
And all the Highland Amours
That had been there before.
The Lowden Malise they
With their great coat of blew;
Five hundred men from London came,
Cld in a redress hue.
When they were assembled one and all,
What were they? Like to a pack of jollish hounds,
I like to their prey.
When they were all provided well,
In armour and ammunition,
Then they consider did they come,
Most cruel of intentions.

The royalists celebrated their victory in strains of epic music. Recent events may be found in the following:

TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

[CHAP. XXX.

But while Morton thus endeavoured to keep up the courage of the army at large, he availed himself of the firmness of the service on the hands of the leaders the necessity of proposing to the government moderate terms of accommodation, while they were still formidable as commanding an undisciplined and unruly army. He pointed out to them, that, in the present humour of their followers, it could hardly be expected that they would engage, with advantage, the well-appointed and regular forces of the king, and that, in all probability, they would, as was most likely, be defeated and dispersed, the assassination in which they had engaged, so far from being useful to the country, would be rendered the apology for several secessions.

Pressed by these arguments, and feeling it equally dangerous to remain together, or to dismiss their forces, most of the leaders readily agreed, that if such terms could be obtained as had been transmitted to the Duke of Monmouth by the hands of Lord Vendale, the purpose for which they had taken up arms would be, in a great measure, accomplished. They then entered into similar resolutions, and agreed to guarantee the petition and remonstrance which had been drawn up by Morton. On the contrary, there were still a veritable faithfuls, and those men whose influence was so much less than that of other members of the multitude, who, without foresight, and nothing to lose, and persuaded many that the time councilors, who recommended peace, were, it was thought, on the point of disbanding the army, and the declaration independence of the church with respect to the state, were cowardly labourers, who were about to withdraw their hands from the plough, and surmise trimmers, who sought only a specious pretext for deserting their brethren in arms. These contradictory opinions were fiercely argued in each tent of the insurgen army, or rather in the huts and cabins which served in the place of tents. Violence in language often led to open quarrels and blows, and the divisions into which the army of suffrages was rent served as too plain a presage of their future fate.

CHAPTER XXX.

The curse of growing faction and divisions

Still vary your counsels. Venial Preserved.

The prudence of Morton found sufficient occupation in stemming the furious current of these contesting parties, when, two days after his return to Hamilton, he was called by his friends and the clergy, to hear a gentleman by Mr. Pountz, a man, as he presently found, from the face of John Balfour of Burley, whom he left not a little ill-content at the share he had taken in the liberation of Lord Vendale. When the worthy divine had somewhat recited his prayers, after the hurry and fatigue of his journey, he proceeded to give Morton an account of what had passed in the vicinity of Tilletudrum after the memorable morning of his departure.

The night march of Morton had been accomplished with such dexterity, and the men were so faithful to their master, that he was enabled to find the report of what had happened until the morning was far advanced. His first inquiry was, whether Macbrair and Kedderumlie had arrived, agreeably to the summons Morton had given the evil. Macbrair came, and Kedderumlie, though a heavy traveller, might, he was informed, be expected by morning. Burley then dispatched a messenger to Morton to inform him of these events. At this time, however, the messenger returned with news that he had left the place. Pountz was next summoned; but he hearing, as he said himself, that it was ill described, he returned, with what was described of a quair mane, preferring a dark ride, though he had been on horseback the whole preceding day, to a renewal in the morning of a controversy with Burley, whose ferocity overawed him when unsupported by Morton. Burley's rage received a different turn upon the intelligence directed after Lord Vendale; and great was his rage when he learned that he had been conveyed away over night by a party of the marksmen of Mun- \n
"The villain!" exclaimed Burley, addressing himself to Macbrair; "the base, mean-spirited traitor, the base, mean-spirited traitor!" to set liberty the prisoner taken by my own right hand, through means of whom, I have little doubt, the possession of the place of strength which had brought us such troubles, might now have been in our hands!

"But is it not in our hands?" said Macbrair, looking up towards the Keep of the Castle; "and are not those the colours of the Covenant that float over its walls?"

"A straucter—a more trick," said Burley, "an insult over our disappointment, intended to aggravate and embitter our spirits."

He was interrupted by the arrival of one of Morton's followers, sent to report to him the evacuation of the place, and its occupation by the insurgen forces. By this time the news of Burley's attack had spread far, and his fury was so far braced by the reproof of higher command and of higher honour—have narrowed their outgoings, and cut off the springs, and broken the store of bread within their walls; and when the men were about to yield themselves to my hand, that their sons might be bondsmen, and their daughters a laughing-stock to our whole camp, confound this youth, without a word on his shield, and takes it on him to thrust his sickle into the harvest, and to rend the prey from the spoiler! Surely the labourer is worthy of his hire, and the city, with its captives, should be given to him that wins it!"

"Nay," said Macbrair, who was surprised at the degree of agitation which Balfour displayed, "chafe not thyself because of the ungodly. Heaven will use its own instruments; and who knows but this youth?"

"Hush! hush!" said Burley; "do not discredit thine own better judgment. It was thou that first badest me beware of this painter, with his laquered piece of copper, that passed current with me for gold. It fars ill, even with the elect, when they neglect the assistance of such young pastors as thou. But our carnal affections should not blind us; this ungrateful boy's father was mine ancient friend. They must be as earnest in their struggles as thou, Ephraim Macbrair; that would make us the more prepared for the work of God, and give us a clear view of the cloaks and chains of human nature."

This compliment touched the preacher in the most sensible part; and Burley deemed, therefore, he should find little difficulty in moulding his opinions to the support of his own views, more especially as they agreed exactly in their high-strained opinions of church government.

"Let us ascertain," he said, "go up to the Tower; there is that among the records in yonder fortress, which, well used as I can use it, shall be worth to us a valiant leader and a hundred horsemen."

"But will the evil not grow in strength the more we are despooled of her inheritance, and neither the malignant Evandale, nor the erastian Morton, shall possess yonder castle and lands, though they may seek marriage the while, and yet have the privilege!"

So saying, he led the way to Tilletudrum, where he seized upon the plate and other valuables for the use communication with them on the subject of the public affairs, otherwise than by sending a dry invitation to them to attend a meeting of the general council for that evening.

On the arrival of Morton and Poudtext at the place of assembly they found their brethren already seated. Slight greetings passed between them, and it was soon evident that the assembly was entirely intended by those who convoked the council. The first question was put by Macbrair, the sharp eager-ness of whose real unkind to the van on all occasions; a vindictor, or rather his adherents, to attend a council at Tullibedum. He remembered, however, that the door had an iron gate, and the key a dungeon, and resolved not to trust himself to a place in which he had been before, rather than to Hamilton, with the tidings, and Macbrair, and Kettle-drummele, were coming to Hamilton as soon as they could collect a body of Cameronians sufficient to overawe the rest of the army.

"And ye see," concluded Poudtext, with a deep sigh, "that they will then possess a majority in the general council for Langale, though he has always paid for one of the honest and rational party, cannot be suitably or properly termed either fish, or flesh, or food red-herring—whenever the stronger party has Landale.

Thus concluded the heavy narrative of honest Poudtext, who sighed deeply, as he considered the danger in which he was placed between the unreasoning, impetuous, and clamorous enemy from without. Morton exhorted him to patience, temper, and composure; informed him of the good hope he had of negotiating for peace and indemnity through means of Lord Evanlade, and made out to him a very fair prospect that he should again return to his own punishment-bound Calvin, his enemies, and the country of instruments, feeling always he would offer his legal support and concurrence to the measures which he, Morton, had taken for a general pacification. Thus buffetted and comforted, Poudtext resolutely mustered his courage to await the coming of the Cameronians to the general rendezvous.

Burley and his confederates had drawn together a considerable body of these secours, amounting to a hundred horse and about fifteen hundred foot, clad and armed as a foot guard, and six hundred foot, clad and armed as a horse guard, and sixty men-only to take precautions for their personal safety, and, being thus equipped, they drove off, and then, herding together the raiders, they went on to the place of assembly, to the great rejoicing of the Cameronians and others, as they had been taken in their sleep, and were in a state of almost complete surprise. They were, indeed, a small party, and, as such, they were not to be expected. The Cameronians were, therefore, not only surprised, but frightened, and they were on the point of retiring when they saw the Cameronians. They then began to think of their safety, and, being thus prepared, they made a considerable number of them, and held no communication with them on the subject of the public affairs, otherwise than by sending a dry invitation to them to attend a meeting of the general council for that evening.

TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

"Let that be no obstacle," said Morton, "I will with pleasure enter any risk attached to the bearer of your errand."

"Let him go," said Balfour, apart to MacBriar; "our councils will be well rid of his presence."

Morton had now a considerable pretension, even from those who were expected to have been most active in opposing it; and it was agreed that Henry Morton should go to the camp of the Duke of Monmouth, in order to discover what terms the insurgents would be admitted to treat with him. As soon as his errand was made known, several of the more moderate party joined in requesting him to make terms between the great body of cavalry who had arrived on the Evandale's hands; for the approach of the King's army spread a general trepidation, by no means allayed by the high tone assumed by the Cameronians, which had so little support it, excepting their own headlong zeal. With these instructions, and with Cuddie as his attendant, Morton set forth towards the royal camp, at all the risks which attend those who assume the office of mediator during the heat of civil discord.

Morton had not proceeded six or seven miles before he perceived that he was on the point of falling in with a small body of armed men marching in great order towards Bothwell-muir, an open common, on which they intended to stop, with which he met, at the distance of scarcely two miles from the Clyde, on the farther side of which river the army of the insurgents was encamped. He gave himself up to the first advancing cavalry, which was by no means a flag of truce, and communicated his desire to obtain access to the Duke of Monmouth. The non-commissioned officer who commanded the party made his respects to Mr. Morton, and being again in such higher command, and both immediately rode to the spot where Morton was detained.

"You are but losing your time, my friend, and risking the lives of all of them," said the Duke of Monmouth, "the Duke of Monmouth will receive no terms from traitors with arms in their hands, and your cruelties have been such as to authorize retaliation of every kind. Better trot your nag back and save his mettle to-day, that he may save your life to-morrow."

"I cannot think," said Morton, "that even if the Duke of Monmouth should consider us as criminals, he will have the coldness to surveying only his fellow-subjects without even hearing what they have to plead for themselves. On my part I fear nothing. I am conscious of having consented to, or authorized, no murder, no massacre, and therefore let those who have been the authors of other crimes shall not deter me from executing my commission.

The two officers looked at each other; and the first said, "This is the young man of whom Lord Evandale spoke."

"Is my Lord Evandale in the army?" said Morton.

"He is not," replied the officer; "we left him at Edinburgh, too much indisposed to take the field. Your name, sir, I presume, is Henry Morton?"

"It is, sir," answered Morton.

"Do you purposely avoid seeing the Duke, sir," said the officer, with more civility of manner, "but you may assure yourself it will be to no purpose; for, were his Grace disposed to favour your people, others are joined in commission with him who will hardly consent to his doing so."

"I shall be sorry to find it thus," said Morton; "but my duty requires that I should persevere in my desire to have an interview with him."

"Lumley," said the superior officer, "let the Duke know of Mr. Morton's arrival, and remind his Grace that this is the person of whom Lord Evandale spoke so highly."

The officer returned with a message that the General could not see Mr. Morton that evening, but would receive him by the times in the ensuing morning. He was to be cherished with civility, and every thing provided for his accommodation. Early on the next morning the officer he had first seen came to conduct him to his audience.

The army was drawn out, and in the act of forming column for march, or attack. The Duke was in the centre, nearly a mile from the place where Morton was to meet him; but the General, in command of the advanced guard, which was well armed and officered, consisting partly of gentlemen-volunteers, partly of the tenants of the crown who did military duty for their fees. Morton also observed several strong parties of Highlanders drawn from the points nearest to the Lowland frontiers, a people, as already mentioned, particularly obnoxious to the western whigs, and who hated and despised them in the same proportion. These were assembled under their chiefs, and made part of this formidable array. A complete train of field-artillery accompanied these troops; and the whole had an air so imposing that it seemed nothing short of an actual army would have been sufficient to prevent it. The line of cavalry was long and tumultuous, and the arm of the insurgents from being utterly destroyed. The officer who accompanied Morton endeavoured to gather from his looks the feelings of the Duke of Monmouth, which were not favourable to any public entreaty. The Duke in the midst of the horde of cavalry, consisting of men of different ages, left his carriage and walked among them, like a king, as a sight which he expected, and to which he was indifferent.

"You see the entertainment prepared for you," said the officer.

"If I had no appetite for it," replied Morton, "I should not have been accompanying you at this moment. But I shall be better pleased with a more peaceful mode of treating Morton." As they spoke thus, they approached the commander-in-chief, who, surrounded by several officers, was seated upon a knoll commanding an extensive prospect of the distant country, and from which could easily discovered the windings of the majestic Clyde, and the distant camp of the insurgents on the opposite bank. The officers of the royal army appeared to be surveying generally, and looking on their friends with satisfaction, and the general officers of distinction. While they spoke together in whispers for a few minutes before Morton was permitted to advance, he had time to study the appearance and expressions of men with whom he had been for a long time.

It was impossible for any one to look upon the Duke of Monmouth without being captivated by his personal graces and accomplishments, of which the great High-Priest of all the Nine afterwards recorded:

"What ever he did was done with such ease, In him alone 'twas natural to please; His motions all accompanied with grace, And Paradise was opened in his face."

Yet to a strict observer, the manly beauty of Monmouth's face was occasionally rendered less striking by an air of vaccination and uncertainty, which seemed to imply hesitation and doubt at moments when decisive resolution was most necessary.

Beside him stood Claverhouse, whom we have already fully described, and another general officer whose appearance was singularly striking. His dress was of the antique fashion of Charles the First's time, and composed of shaggy leather, curiously slashed, and fastened with antique clasps and buckles. His boots and spurs might be referred to the same distant period. He wore a breast-plate, over which descended a grey beard of venerable length, which he cherished with a scrupulous attention. His head was, first, having never shaved since that monarch was brought to the scaffold. His head was uncovered, and almost perfectly bald. His high and wrinkled forehead, piercing gray eyes, and marked features, evince eye unbroken by infirmity, and stern revolution, His face however freely expressed, of the celebrated General Thomas Dalzell, a man more feared and hated by the Whig than even Claverhouse himself, and as / executed the same treasons, and that they seem out of the deploration of their persons, or perhaps an innate severity of temper, which Graham only retorted on his accounts, as the best means of intimidating the followers of the presbytery, and of destroying that sect entirely.

The presence of these two generals, one of whom was a knowing person, and the other, on the contrary, seemed to me to shew the futility of the fate of his eminence. But, notwithstanding his youth and inexperience, and the unfavourable reception which his proposals seemed likely to meet with, he advanced boldly towards them upon receiving a signal to that purpose, determined that the cause of his country, and of those with whom he had taken up arms, should suffer nothing from being insulted to him. Monmouth continued the speech with a new addition, and declared even his slightest actions; Dalzell regarded him with a stern, gloomy, and impatient frown; and Claverhouse, with a sarcastic smile and inclination of his head, seemed to claim him as an old acquaintance.

"You come, sir, from those unfortunate people, now assembled in arms," said the Duke of Monmouth, "I believe Merton, will you favour us with the purport of your errand?"

"It is contained, my lord," answered Morton, "in a paper, termed a Remonstrance and Supplication, which my Lord Evendale has placed, I presume, in your Grace's hands?"

"He has done so, sir," answered the Duke; "and I understand, from Lord Evendale, that Mr. Morton has a letter with him, contrary to my temperance and generosity, for which I have to request his acceptance of my thanks."

Here Morton observed Dalzell shake his head indignantly, and whisper something into Claverhouse's ear, who smiled in return, and elevated his eyebrows, but in a degree so slight as scarcely to be perceptible.

The Duke, taking the petition from his pocket, proceeded, evidently struggling between the native gentleness of his own disposition, and perhaps his conviction that the petitioner demanded no more than their rights, and the desire, on the other hand, of enacting a law or two. He concluded the speech with the sternest of opinions of the colleagues in office, who had been assigned for the purpose of controlling as well as advising him.

"The Duke, Mr. Morton, in this paper, proposals, as to the abstract propriety of which I must now waive delivering any opinion. Some of them appear to me reasonable and just; and, although I have no express instructions from the King upon the subject, yet I assure you, Mr. Morton, and I pledge my honour, that I will interpose in your behalf, and use my utmost influence to procure your satisfaction from his Majesty. But you must distinctly understand that I can only treat with suppliants, not with rebels; and, as a preliminary to every act of favour on my side, I must insist upon your followers laying down their arms and disappearing themselves."

In Chrichton's Memoirs, edited by Swift, where a particular account of the proceedings of the army is given, a passage is added which it is said never to have written words. The following account of his encounter with John Paton of Meadowhead, showed, that in all actions he wore pretty stout men, unless the reader be inclined to believe in the tenth of his having a charm, which never failed.

"Dalzell," says Paton's biographer, "advanced the whole force of the army of Claverhouse. Here Valiant Captain Paton beheld with great courage and panility. Dalzell, knowing him to be in the front, advanced with his whole body, the Duke of Monmouth knew there was no retreat, and, advancing a step, sprang on his pistol. On their first discharge, Captain Paton, perceiving that what was the cause (the having proof) put his hand in his pocket, and drew out a ball of shot, and others for the piece, and put one of them into his other pistol. But Dalzell, having his eye upon him in the mean while, retired behind his own men, who by that means was slain."

"To do so, my Lord Duke," replied Morton, undaunted, "were to acknowledge ourselves the rebels that our enemies term us. Our swords are drawn for revenge of our wrongs, which we cannot, therefore, and dare not, lay down our arms, even on your Grace's assurance of indemnity, unless it were accompanied with some reasonable prospect of the removal of the wrongs, which we complain of."

"Mr. Morton," replied the Duke, "you are young, but you must have been enough of the world to perceive, that requests, by no means dangerous or unwise, are always presented to the way in which they are pressed and supported."

"We may reply, my lord," answered Morton, that this disagreeable mode has not been resorted to until all others have failed."

"Mr. Morton," said the Duke, "I must break this conference short. We are in readiness to commence the attack; yet I will suspend it for an hour, until you can communicate your answer to the insurgents, that they may disperse their followers, lay down their arms, and send a peaceable delegation to me. I will consider myself bound in honour to do all I can to procure their safety, so far as their conduct may stand on their guard and expect the consequences."

"I think, gentlemen," he added, turning to his two colleagues, "this is the utmost length to which I can stretch in instructions in favour of these misguided persons?"

"By my faith," answered Dalzell, suddenly, "and it is a length with which my poor judgment dare not have interfered, because I find both the King and my conscience to answer to! But, doubtless, your Grace knows more of the King's private mind than I who have only the letter of our instructions to look to."

Monmouth blushed deeply. "You hex," he said, addressing Morton, "General Dalzell blames me for the length which I am disposed to go in your favour."

"General Dalzell's sentiments, my lord," replied Morton, "are such as we expected from him; your Grace's such as we were prepared to hope you might please to entertain. Indeed I cannot help adding, that, in the case of the absolute submission upon which you are pleased to insist, it might still remain something less than doubtful how far, with such consent to the council of the King, your cessation might procure us effective relief. But I will communicate to our leaders your Grace's answer to this effect, and, since we do not obtain peace, we must, in bad war, welcome us to the other."

"Good morning, sir," said the Duke; "I suspend the movements of attack for one hour, and for one hour only. If you have an answer to return within that space of time, I will receive it here, and earnestly insist it may be such as to save the effusion of blood."

At this moment another smile of deep meaning passed between Dalzell and Claverhouse. The Duke observed it, and repeated his words with great dignity.

"Yes, gentlemen," I said, "the answer might be such as would save the effusion of blood. I hope the sentiment neither needs your scorn, nor inures your displeasure."

Dalzell returned the Duke's frown with a stern countenance, but made no answer. Claverhouse, his lip just curling with an ironical smile, bowed, and said, "It was not for me to judge the propriety of his Grace's sentiments."

The Duke made a signal to Morton to withdraw. He obeyed, and, accompanied by his former escort, rode slowly through the army to return to the camp, the non-conformists. As he passed the fine corps of Life Guards, he found Claverhouse was already among them, but he took no notice of him, except that he advanced and addressed him with peculiar politeness of manner.

"I think this is not the first time I have seen Morton of Minnow."

CHAP. XXX.] OLD MORTALITY.
Morton, therefore, viewed the pass carefully, and formed his line of battle at a point that would be occupied by the houses on the left bank of the river, with the caps and thickets of alders and hazels that lined its side, and by blocking the passage itself, and shutting the enemy off from the porticoes of Bothwell Bridge, which was built on the central arch of the bridge of Bothwell, it might be easily defended against a very superior force. He issued directions accordingly, and surmounted all the apprehensions of his mind, and his apprehensions, was not put in jeopardy. In the name, a manner, required to approve of the sentence under which he had so nearly suffered. Nay, but stay an instant," said Claverhouse; "For I thought the Lord would work himself in my instance. I trust I shall always make some difference between a high-minded gentleman, who, though misguided, acts upon generous prin-, and the crazy fantastic clowns under, with the bloodthirsty assassins who head them. Therefore, if they do not disperse upon your return, let me pray you instantly come over to our army and surrender yourself; for, as assured, they cannot stand as our assailants for half an hour. If you shall be willing to do this, he is sure to inquire for Mr. Monmouth, strange as it may seem, cannot protect you—Dalzell will not throw a rope and wait; and I have promised to Evandale to make it by a different species of satisfaction, it is probable, that, at an hour's time, you will find me at the west end of Bothwell Bridge with my sword in my hand, ready to receive any opportunity to do. I shall be happy to meet you there," said Claverhouse, "but still more so should you think better on my first proposal. The Lord bless and preserve you.

That is a pretty jest, Lunlay," said Claverhouse, addressing himself to the other officer; "but he is a lost man—his blood be upon his head! So saying, he addressed himself to the task of preparation for instant battle.

CHAPTER XXXI.

But, hark! the blast has changed its voice.

There's peace and rest now.

The Laidies' Mill in the air.

Came with their coats of blew.

Five hundred men from London came.

Caid in a ribald hue.

Bothwell Lads.

When Morton had left the well-ordered outposts of the regular army, and arrived at those which were maintained by his own party, he could not but be peculiarly sensible of the difference of discipline, and entertain a proportionate degree of fear for the consequence. The same discord which agitated the consorts of the insurgents, raged even among their nearest followers; and their passions and passions were more interested and occupied in disputing the true occasion and causes of wrath, and defining the limits of Ernstion here, than in looking out for and observing the movements of the enemy agitating within the hearing of the royal drums and trumpets.

There was a gaurd, however, of the insurgent army, posted at the long and narrow bridge of Bothwell, over which the enemy must necessarily advance to the attack; but, like the others, they were divided and disheartened; and, entertaining the idea that they were posted on a de-sperate service, they even meditating the trampling of their comrades to the main body. This would have been utter ruin; for, on the defence or loss of this pass the fortune of the day was most likely to depend. All beyond the bridge was a plain open for a few thicket of forest trees, and, consequently, was ground on which the undisciplined forces of the insurgents, deficient as they were in cavalry, and totally unprowed with artillery, was rather unlikely to withstand the shock of regular troops.
Of applause on the one side, and of impatience on the other.

"What means this ominous disorder at such a moment?" he inquired. Burley, who, except for his vain exertions to restore order, was now leaning on his sword, and regarding the confusion with an eye of resolute despair,

"It means," he replied, "that God has delivered us into the hands of our enemies."

"Not so," answered Morton, with a voice and gesture which compelled many to listen; "it is not God who desires us to suffer, but we desire to suffer, and disgrace ourselves by disgracing and betraying the cause of freedom and religion."—Hear me," he exclaimed, summing to the pulpit which Mucklewath had been compelled to vacate by actual exhaustion. "I brag from the ear to the other to tell you, if you incline to lay down your arms. I can assure you the means of making an honourable defence, if you are of more humane spirit than we possess; but I shall not argue the question farther with you. I will not再说 for peace or war; and let it not be said of us in future days, that six thousand Scottish men in arms had neither courage to stand their ground and fight it out, nor prudence to treat for peace, nor even the cowardice to make a neat retreat to our own safety. What signifies quarrelling on minute points of church-discipline, when the whole edifice is threatened with demolition, and the remnants of the brethren, that latter and worst punishment of their blindness and hardness of heart, the bloody discursions which rent sundry pieces of this city, even when the enemy were thundering at its gates!"

Some of the audience testified their feeling of this exhortation, by loud exclamations of applause; others by hissing, and exclamating:—"To your tents, O Israel! Morton, who held the columns of the enemy already beginning to appear on the right wing, and directing the fire of the Scotch behind them to its utmost pitch, and pointing at the same time with his hand, exclaimed,—"Silence your senseless clamours, yonder is the enemy! On maintaining the bridge against him depend our lives, as well as our hope to reclaim our laws and liberties. There shall at least one Scottishman die in their defence.—Let any one who loves his country, follow me! The multitude, already arms in their hands, in the direction to which he pointed. The sight of the glittering files of the English Foot-Guards, supported by several squadrons of horse, of the King's guards, and the frigate armed in the bay, each man with his musket, and with three guns, as if they were a second bridge, seemed to subdue the Scottish clansmen to search for a ford, and of the long succession of troops which were destined to support the attack, silenced at once their clamour, and made them tremble with consternation as if it were an unexpected apparition, and not the very thing which they ought to have been looking out for. They speeded on each other, and on their leaders, with looks and words that told into the weakness of a patient when exhausted by a fit of frenzy. Yet when Morton, springing from the parapet, directed his steps towards the bridge, he was followed by about a hundred of the young men who were particularly attached to his command. Burley turned to Macbride,—"Parlaim," he said, "it is Providence points us the way, through the worldly wisdom of this judicious man. His that loves the light, let him follow Burley!"

"Tarry," replied Macbride; "it is not by Henry Morton, or such as he, that our cause is out and our cause is out to be decided; and his men, you will find, are not to be won with the offer of a few men and ammunition; and accursed be he who turneth back from the work on this great day!"
Having thus spoken, he hastily marched towards the bridge, and was followed by about two hundred of the most valiant and zealous of his party. There were with Mompox, apart from the Foot-Guards, 270 mounted pursuivants.

But Burley directed. The commanders avoided themselves of it to display their lines in some sort of order, and exhibited those who were most exposed, to throw themselves in the face of the enemy as cannonading which they might presently expect. The insurgents ceased to resist or to demonstrate; but the two who had silenced their discords had dismayed their courage. They scattered themselves to be formed into ranks with the docility of a flock of sheep, but without possessing, for the time more resolution or energy; for they experienced a sinking of the heart, imposed by the sudden and extraordinary approach of the party which had neglected to provide against while it was yet distant. They were, however, drawn out with some regularity; and as they still possessed the appearance of an army, their leaders had only to hope that some favourable circumstance would restore their spirits and courage.

Kettledrumme, Poudtext, Maetrar, and other pursuivants, hurried themselves in their ranks, and prevailed on them to raise the psalm. But the superstitious among them observed, as an ill omen, that their song of praise, and triumph sunk into "a quaver of concern," and received a stinging stab on the scaffold of a condemned criminal, than the bold strain which had resounded along the wild heath of London-bill, in anticipation of that day of hesitation and mediocrity which the nobility in a rough accompaniment; the royal soldiers shouted, the Highlanders yelled, the cannon began to fire on one side, and the musketry on both, and the bridge of boats, which three banks adjacent, were involved in wreaths of smoke.

Some Scotsmen last fell even now.
And they lay slain on every knee.

Old Ballad.

For Morton or Burley had reached the post to be defended, the enemy had commenced an attack upon it with great spirit. The two regiments of Foot-Guards, formed into a close column, rushed forward to the river; one corps, deploying along the right bank, gave a shout, and the defenders fired the pass, while the other pressed on to occupy the bridge. The insurgents sustained the attack with great constancy and courage; and while part of their number were in the fire of the bridge, the rest maintained a discharge of musketry upon the further end of the bridge itself, and every avenue by which the soldiers endeavoured to approach it. The latter suffered severely, but still gained ground, and the head of their column was already upon the bridge, when the arrival of Morton changed the scene; and his marksmen commencing upon the pass a fire as well aimed as it was sustained and regular, compelled the assailants to retire with much loss. They were a second time brought up to the charge, and a second time repulsed with still greater loss, as Burley had now brought up his party into action continuation with the utmost vehemence on both sides, and the issue of the action seemed very doubtful.

Mompox, mounted on a superb white charger, might be seen and on the top of either right bank of the river, urging, entreat, and animating the exertions of his soldiers. By his orders, the cannon, which had hitherto been employed in annoying the distant inns of the presbyterians, were now turned upon the defenders of the bridge. But these tremendous engines, being wrought much more slowly than in modern times, did not produce the effect of annoying the bridge, with all its defences, before the few men in possession of the enemy, Burley and his remaining followers were driven back upon the main body, whom the spectacle of their hurried and harassed retreat was for some time restoring the confidence which they so much wanted.

In the mean while, the forces of the King crossed the bridge at their leisure, and, securing the passes, formed up with the greatest precipitation. Sir John Cuddie perched on a rock, and eyeing the time to

OLD MORTALITY

May the hand be withered that shot the shot! he exclaimed, as the sword which he was warring over his head fell powerless to his side. "I can fight no longer."

Then turning his horse's head, he retreated out of the confinements. Morton also saw that the continuing an unsavory efforts to rally the flyers could only end in his own death or captivity, and, following by the faithfull Cudde, he extricated himself from the press, and, being well mounted, leaped his horse over one or two enclosures, and got into the open country.

From the first hill which they gained in their flight, they looked down upon the whole country covered with their fugitive companions, and with the pursuing dragoons, whose wild shouts and hollars, as they did execution on the groups whom they overtook, mingled with the groans and screaming of their victims, rose shrilly up the hill.

"It is impossible they can ever make head again," said Morton.

"The head's 'en off them, as clean as I wad bite it aff a sybo!" rejoined Cudde. "Eh, Lord! say how the broadswords are flashing! war's a fearsome thing. They'll be cunning that catches me at this work again— But, for God's sake, let us mak for some strength."

Morton saw the necessity of following the advice of his trusty squire. They resumed a rapid pace, and continued to do so until they came near the country, directing their course towards the wild and mountainous country, where they thought it likely some part of the fugitives might draw together, for the sake either of making defence, or of obtaining terms.

FLETCHER.

Evening had fallen; and, for the last two hours, they had seen none of their ill-fated companions, when Morton and his faithful attendant gained the moorland, and approached a large and solitary farm-house, situated in the entrance of a wild glen, far remote from any other habitation.

"Our horses," said Morton, "will carry us no farther without rest or food, and we must try to obtain them here, if possible."

So speaking, he led the way to the house. The place had every appearance of being inhabited. There was smoke issuing from the chimney, the windows were open, and several gentlemen and men of substance in the west, and is in the set of marching to join them?"

"Basil Olafion!" said the Duke; "who or what is he?"

"The next male heir to the last Earl of Torwood. He is dissatisfied to government from his claim to the estate being set aside in favour of Lady Margaret Bellenden; and I suppose the hope of getting the inheritance has set him in motion."

"He has motives what they will," replied Monmouth, "he must soon disperse his followers, for this group of men to rally round. Thenceforward, once more, I command that the pursuit be stopped."

"It is your Grace's province to command, and to be responsible for your commands," answered Dalzell, "he gave reluctant orders for checking the pursuit.

But the fiery and vindicative Grahame was already a bar' of hearing the signal of retreat, and commenced the pursuit, breaking, dispersing, and cutting to pieces all the insurgents whom they could come up with.

Burley and Morton were both hurled off the saddle by their horses, and were only saved from being pursued, breaking, dispersing, and cutting to pieces all the insurgents whom they could come up with.

"Whoever ye be," answered a stern voice from the window, "after a long and obstinate silence."

"With those who find the devastation and captivity of the land, and search out the causes of wrath and of defection, that the stumbling-blocks may be removed over which we have stumbled."

"They are wild western whales," said Cudde, "in a whisper to his master, 'I ken by their language."

Fielde he me, ill like to venture on them."

"This eldest, and Burley's exclamation, were taken from"
Morton, however, again called to the party within, and insisted on admittance; but, finding his entreaties still disregarded, he opened one of the lower windows, and pushing asunder the shutters, which were bound with a strip of strong linen kitted from which the voice had issued, Cuddie followed him, muttering between his teeth, as he put his head within the window, "That he hoped there was none within to make fire and master and servant both found themselves in company of ten or twelve armed men, seated around the fire, on which refreshments were preparing, and busied apparently in their consultations.

In the gloomy countenances, illuminated by the fire-light, Morton had no difficulty in recognising several of those zealots who had most distinguished themselves by their determined opposition to all moderate measures, together with their noted pastor, the fanatical Elderbraun Macbriar, and the maniac, Habakkuk Muckleworth. The Cameronsians neither stirred tongue nor hand to welcome their brethren in misfortune, but continued to listen to the low mumured exercise of Macbriar, as he prayed that the Almighty would lift up his hand from his people, and not make an end in the day of his visitation. That belief was not, however, the only thing which appeared from the sullen and indignant glances which they shot at them, from time to time, as their eyes encountered.

Morton, finding into what unhospitable society he had unwittingly intruded, began to think of retreating; but, on turning his head, observed with some alarm, that several of them had stationed themselves beside the window, through which they had entered. One of these ominous sentences whispered to Cudude, "Son of that precious woman, Mause Healing, do not cast thy lot further with this child of treachery and perfidy—Pass on thy way, and tarry not, for the avenger of blood is behind thee."

With this pointed to the window, out of which Cuddie jumped, and looked about, for the intimation he had received plainly implied the personal danger he would otherwise incur.

"Winnoches are no lucky wi' me," was his first reflection when he was in the open air; his next was upon the probable fate of his master. "They'll kill him, the murdering loons, and think they're doing a good turn! but I've taken the back road for Hamilton, and see if I can't get some of our kin folk to bring help in time of neediness." So saying, Cudude hastened to the stable, and taking a horse he could find instead of his own, his steed, he galloped off in the direction he proposed.

The noise of his horse's tread alarmed for an instant the fanatic company; Macbriar brought his exercise to a conclusion, and his audience raised themselves from the stooping posture, and loitering downward look, with which they had listened to it, and all fixed their eyes sternly on Henry Morton.

"You bend strange countenances on me, gentleman," said he, addressing them. "I am totally ignorant in what manner I can have deserved them." "Out upon thee! out upon thee!" exclaimed Muckleworth, starting up; "the word that thou hast spurned shall become a rock to crush and to bruise them, or which thou wouldst have broken shall pierce thy side; we have prayed, and wrestled, and petitioned for an offering to atone the sins of the congregation, and lo! the very head of the offence is delivered up to a sword and the shed blood in the midst of the congregation for all that the people have done. The offering shall proceed from your hands, and I call God to witness who has spared the lives of such as you."

"I am proud to say, that you have spoken the truth in both instances," replied Morton.

"Lo! you see," said Macbriar, "again has the mouth spoken it. And didst thou not do this for the sake of a Midianitish woman, one of the spawns of perjury, a toy with which the arch-enemy's trap has baited? Didst thou not do all this for the sake of Edith Bellenden?"

"You are incapable," answered Morton, bold and undaunted, "of appreciating my feelings towards that young lady, but I believe all that we done I would have done had I never existed."

"Thou art a hardy rebel to the truth," said another dark-browed man; and didst thou not act so, that we, being convinced by divine Wisdom, Margaret Bellenden, and her grand-daughter, thou mightst wear the wise and godly project of John Balfour of Earl to bring forth into battle Basil Olifant, who is agreed to by both of us, the heavens were inspired with these women's wordly endowments?"

"I never heard of such a scheme," said Morton; "and therefore I could not thwart it. But does not your Coalition admit you to take such incredible immoral means of recruiting?"

"Peace," said Macbriar, somewhat hesitatingly, "is not that what we are to maintain by constent Covenant obligations, or for the use of the"
have acknowledged enough of sin and sorrowful defection, to draw down defeat on a host, were it amenable to their judgment. And in our judgment, that we are not free to let you pass from us safe and in life, since Providence hath given you into our hands at the moment that we prayed with such a fervent and earnest desire to see you suffer?—Then cannot thou, delivered to us as it were by lot, that thou mightest sustain the punishment of one that had so often stood before thee and mark the words? This is the Sabbath, and our hand shall not be on thee to spill thy blood upon this day; but, when the twelfth hour shall strike, it is a token that thy time is run. Wherefore improve thy span, for it lieth fast away.—Seize on the prisoner, brethren, and take his weapon.

The command was so unexpectedly given, and so suddenly executed by those of the party who had gradually closed behind and around Morton, that he was overpowered, disarmed, and a horse-girth passed round his arms, before he could offer any effectual resistance. When this was accomplished, a dead and stern silence took place. The footmen ranged themselves around a large oak table, placing Morton amongst them bound and helpless, in such a manner that the gas-lamp which was to strike his knell. Food was placed before them, of which they offered their intended victim a share; but, it will readily be believed, he had little appetite. When the scene was finished, the myrmidons of devotion who accompanied Macbrair, whose fierce zeal did not perhaps exclude some feelings of doubt and compunction, began to exult in prayer, as if to wring from the Deity a single tear for an angry and dark lot. They were turned on the dial-plate of the time-piece, to watch its progress towards the moment of execution. Morton's eye frequently took the same course, with the soul reflection, that there appeared no possibility of his life being expanded beyond the narrow segment which the index had yet to travel on the circle until it arrived at the fatal hour. Faith in his religion, with a constant unyielding principle of honour, and the sense of conscious innocence, enabled him to pass through this dreadful interval with less agitation than he himself could have expected, had the situation been so strange as to keep his faculties always on the alert that eager and animating sense of right which supported him in similar circumstances, when in the power of Clavhome. Then he was conscious, that, as he stood there in the crowd of men, he had to consider his condition, and some who unclouded his conduct. But now, among these pale-eyed and foreboding souls, he was to be sent to his doom, not merely with indulgence, but with triumph, upon his execution.—without a trial; to speak a kindly word, or give a look either of sympathy or encouragement,—awaiting till the word should call to lay him out of the scabbard gradually, and as it were by straggled, and condemned to drink the bitter mess of death drop by drop,—it is no wonder that his feelings were so soon overpowered than they had been from some occasion of danger. His destined executioner, as he taxied around them, seemed to alter their forms and features, like spectres in a feverish dream; their faces changed, and their eyes more distinct and, as an excited imagination predominated over the realities which his eyes received, he could have thought himself surrounded rather by a band of decoying demons, then by any human person. He dropped with blood, and the light grew of the clock thrilled on his ear with such loud, painful distinctness, as if each sound were the peal of a bell struck on the moray.

It was with pain that he felt his mind wandering, while on the brink between this and the future world. He made a strong effort to compose himself to determine his imperial destiny. It seemed as if nature, to array her own thoughts into suitable expressions he had, instantly, recourse to the pity for deliverance and for composition of spirit which is to be found in the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England. Macbrair, whose family were of that persuasion, instantly recognised the words, which the unfortunate prisoner pronounced half aloud. 'There lacked but this,' he said, his pale cheek kindling with a sudden and strange expression of reluctance to see his blood spill. He is a prelate, who has sought the camp under the disguise of an Erastian, and all, and more than all, that has been said of him is true. His blood be on his head, the deceiver!—I think to go down to Tophet, with the ill-muffled mass which he calls a prayer-book, in his right hand!'

"I take upon me a song against him!" explained the maniac. "As the sun went back on the dial ten degrees for intimating the recovery of holy Bezzea, so shall it now go forward, that the wicked may be taken away from among the people, and the Covenant established in its purity."

He sprang to a chair with an attitude of frenzy, in order to anticipate the fatal moment by putting the index forward; and several of the party began to make ready their slaughter-weapons for immediate execution, when Muckleworth's hand was arrested by one of his companions.

"Hush!" said he. "I hear a distant noise."

"It is the rushing of the brook over the pebbles," said one.

"It is the sound of the wind among the branches," said another.

"It is the galloping of horses," said Morton to himself, his sense of hearing rendered acute by the dreadful situation in which he stood; "God grant they may come and carry me away."

The noise approached rapidly, and became more and more distinct.

"It is a horse," cried Macbrair. "Look out and desy who they are."

"The enemy are upon us!" cried one who had opened the window, in obedience to his order.

A thick trampling and loud voices were heard immediately round the house. Some rose to rise, and some to scone; the doors and windows were forced at once, and the red coats of the troopers appeared in the aprtment.

"Have at the bloody rebels!—Remember Cernut Grahame!" was shouted on every side.

The lights were struck down, but the glorious glare of the fire enabled him to continue the fight. Several of the troopers, with pistols and swords, were inspired by a yell, which next to Morton received a shot as he was rising, stumbled against the prisoner, whom he hurled with his weight, and by a stroke above him a shout went up. The noise was repeated; the troopers gathered, and as he might afterwards have needed in the close struggle, where arms were discharged and swords given for stones, he was beheaded.

"Is the prisoner safe?" exclaimed the well-known voice of Clavbroth. "Look about for him, and dispatch the wretched dog who is growing there."

Both orders were executed. The troops of the wounded men were selector by a thrust with a rapier, and Morton, as remembered of his weight, was speedily rawed and in the arms of the fatal Viato, who blubbered for joy when he feared that the head, which his master was covered had not flowed from his own veins. A whisper in Morton's ear, while his trusty follower related him from his hands, explained the secret of the very tardy approach of the soldiers.

"I fell into Clavbroth's party when I was seeking for some of our men to help me out of the hands of the English, whose eyes were upon the deep sea; I even thought I beheld him on the wave, he was so near me. For he could hear me and I heard him, and the sun shone on the day. Lord, what woe doth we have day and night, and what woe doth we have day and night, and in what woe doth we have day and night."

"Note.—The principal incident of the scene was considerably altered in the author's manuscript; the original is as follows: The man, now deceased, was held an aristocrat and dragoons by some in the party, and was killed, but the writer has afterwards purchased the manuscript and altered the scene to conform to the former position, which was more to his satisfaction."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Sound, sound the clarion, fill the life!
The chosen few, the human race;
One crowded hour of glorious life
Is worth an age without a name.

Unknown.

When the desperate affair had ceased, Claverhouse commanded his soldiers to remove the dead bodies, to refresh themselves and their horses, and prepare for passing the night at the farm-house, and in the village, the inhabitants of which he had either killed or taken prisoners. He then turned his attention to Morton, and there was politeness, and even kindness, in the manner in which he addressed him.

"You would have saved yourself risk from both sides, Mr. Morton, if you had honoured my counsel yesterday morning with some attention; but I respect your motives. You are a prisoner-of-war at the disposal of the king and council; but you shall be treated with no incivility; and I will be satisfied with your parole that you will not attempt an escape."

When he had paused a moment to consider Claverhouse bowed civilly, and, turning away from him, called for his sergeant-major.

How many prisoners, Hallidie, and how many killed, or wounded, as you have heard.

"Three killed in the house, sir, two cut down in the court, and one in the garden—six in all; four prisoners;"

"Armed or unarmed?" said Claverhouse.

"Three of them armed to the teeth," answered Hallidie; "one without arms—he seems to be a preacher."

The trumpeter to the long-corded rout, I suppose, replied Claverhouse, glancing slightly round upon his victims, "I will talk with him to-morrow."

Take the other three down to the yard, draw out two fingers from them, and, if they wear a sword, make a memorandum in the orderly book of three rebels taken.

Excise, to which he had been raised by active and resolute exertions in an inferior department. When employed as a small official, he had been one of the quartermasters of Lallybroch, and on the instructions of the Isle of Man, he demanded supplies almost universally in that district, this gentleman had the fortune to offend highly several of the leaders in the contraband trade, by his zeal in serving the revenue.

This rendered his situation a dangerous one, and, on more than one occasion, placed his life in jeopardy. At one time in particular, while he was riding after some contraband goods, a sudden sally of the people, and perhaps excitement of the time, caused the driver of the goods to make off, and Claverhouse in his pursuit was separated from his horse, and without sixpence or anything else. He and his wife had been left quite destitute.

And the second time, when, as he was on his way home, he was attacked by a band of robbers, and his horse was stolen.

These two events, each of them, Claverhouse considered as a signal of his safety, and he was right, in so far as the first shewed that he had escaped the notice of his enemies, and the second left him nothing to fear but the possibility of being attacked again; and this he considered as so remote, that he never thought of returning to the house of his friends.

The reason for this was not that he was afraid of the house of his friends, but that he had resolved never to return to it, and that he was determined to make his way to the borders, where he had business, and where he intended to take up his residence.

And so, upon this last occasion, he was taken in the act of leaving the house of his friends, and was thus captured by the Galaxy, as they called the Scotch borderers, and was carried off to Edinburgh, where he was tried, and found guilty of high treason, and was executed.

The name of the man who was thus sentenced to death was Robert Grey, but it is not certain whether he was the same person who had been tried in the Court of Law of Scotland, or whether he was a different person.

The sentence was executed by hanging, and the body was buried in the churchyard of the village, where it remained until the last year of the Commonwealth, when it was dug up and buried under the same circumstances as the body of the gentleman who had been tried in the Court of Law of Scotland.
OLD MORTALITY.

Deeming him from danger, even through the instrumentality of those, who seemed to be his dangerous enemies, with the propriety for the Divine assistance in guiding his course through times which held out so many dangers and so many errors. And having thus poured out his spirit in prayer before the Great Being, he resolved for the repose which he so much required.

CHAPTER XXXV.

The charge is prepared, the lawyers are met; The judges all ranged—a terrible show.

So deep was the slumber which succeeded the agitation and embarrassment of the preceding day, that Morton hardly knew where he was when it was broken by the tramp of horses, the hoarse voice of men, and the wild sound of the trumpets blowing the reveillé. The sergeant-major immediately afterwards came to summon him, which he did in a very respectful manner, saying the General (for Claverhouse now held that rank) hoped for the pleasure of his company upon the road. In some situations an intimation is a command, and Morton considered that the present occasion was one of these. He waited upon Claverhouse as ordered, and received the parole he was to keep, and Cuddie in attendance. Both were deprived of their fire-arms, though they seemed, otherwise, rather to make part of the troop than of the officers. He afterwards learned that the bearing his sword, the wearing which was, in those days, the distinguishing mark of a gentleman. Claverhouse seemed also to take pleasure in ruling beside him, in conversing with him, and in confiding his ideas when he attempted to apprise his real character. The gentleness and urbane manners of that officer's general manners, the high and chivalrous sentiments of military and political duty, and yet occasionally expressed the deep and accurate insight into the human bosom, demanded at once the approbation and the wonder of those who conversed with him; while, on the other hand, his cold indifference to military violence and cruelty seemed altogether inconsistent with the social, and even admirable qualities which he displayed. Morton could not help, in his heart, contrasting him with Balfour of Burley; and so deeply did the idea impress him, that he dropped a hint of it as they rode together at some distance from the troop.

"You are right," said Claverhouse with a smile: "you are right—very right, but there is some distinction between the femininity of honour and that of dark and sullen superstition. Yet you both shed blood without mercy or remorse," said Morton, who could not suppress his feelings.

"Surely," said Claverhouse, with the same composure; "but of what kind? There is a difference, I trust, between the blood of learned and refined priests and prelates, and gallant soldiers and noble gentlemen, and the red pudgel that stigmatizes the veins of psalm-singing mechanics, crack-brained demagogues, and sullen hoors; some distinction, in short, between spilling a flag of generous wine, and dashed down a can full of base muddy ale?"

"Your distinction is too nice for my comprehension," said Morton. "God gives every spark of life—that of the peasant as well as of the prince; and those who destroy his work recklessly or carelessly must answer. And, for example, have I to General Grahame's protection now, more than when I first met him?"

"And narrowly escaped the consequences, you would say," and Morton added; "will you answer you frankly. Then I thought I had to do with the son of an old roundheaded rebel, and the nephew of a sound presbyterian lord; now I know you are a man of honor, and to you which I respect in an enemy as much as I like in a friend. I have learned a good deal concerning you since our first meeting, and I trust that you have found that my conclusion of the information was not unfavourable to you."

"But yet," said Morton—
"But yet," interrupted Grahame, taking up the word, "you would say you were the same when I first met you that you are now? True; but then, how could I know that? though, by the by, even my reluctance to suspend your execution may show but little on your part, in order to gain admission into heaven."

"Do you expect, General," said Morton, "that I ought to be particularly grateful for such a mark of your esteem?"

"Poh! no! you are critical," returned Claverhouse. "I tell you I thought you a different sort of person. Did you ever read Frobson?"

"No, your Morton's all about me," said Claverhouse. "It is very easy," said Morton, "to contrive you should have six months' imprisonment in order to procure you that pleasure. His chapters inspire me with more enthusiasm than even poetic itself. And the noble canon, with what true Christian feeling he confines his beautiful expressions of sorrow to the death of the gallant and high-bred knight, whom it was a pity to see the fall; such was his loyalty to his king, pure faith to his religion, hardihood towards his enemy, and fidelity to his lady-love!—Ah, benevolence! how he will mourn over the fall of his noble son, and how he will weep on the side that happens to favour, or on the other. But, truly, for sweeping from the face of the earth so few hundreds of villain cullums, who are born but to plough it, the man who has the historian has merited your little sympathy,—as little, or less, perhaps, than John Grahame of Claverhouse!"

"There is one ploughman in your possession, General," said Morton, "in despite of the contempt in which you hold a profession which some philosophers have considered as useful as that of a soldier, I would humbly request your favour."

You must know, Mr. Claverhouse, at a manuscript book, one Hatherick—Hodder—k—or—or—Headrigg. Ay, Cuthbert, or Cudie Headrig—here I have him. O, never fear him, if he will be but tractable. Come, Morton, I shall make intercession with me on his account some time ago. He is to marry his waiting-maid, I think. He will be allowed to slip off easy, unless his obstinacy spoils his good fortune."

"He has no ambition to be a marty"—I believe," said Morton. "Tis the better for him," said Claverhouse. "But, besides, although the fellow had more to answer for, I should stand his friend, for the sake of the blundering gallantry which threw him into the midst of our ranks last night, when seeking assistance for you. I shall oppose all reasons and misgivings with such unqualified confidence. But, to deal sincerely with you, he has been long in our eye.—Here, Halliday; bring me up the black book.

"I have been committed to his commander this ominous record of the disaffection, which was arranged in alphabetical order, Claverhouse, turning over the leaves as he rode on, began to read names as they occurred.

Gumblecumber, a minister, aged to, indulged, close, sly, and so forth—pooh! pooh! He—he have him here.—Hethercat, outlawed—a preacher—a-—unrecorded—Cameronian—keeps a convocation among the Campfire hills.—Shus!—O, here is Headrigg—Cuthbert; his mother a bitter partisan—himself a simple fellow—like to be forward in action, but of no general to the hand than the head, and might be drawn to the right side but for his attachment to".—(Here Claverhouse looked at Morton, and then shut the book and changed his tone.)

"Indeed?" replied Morton. "Will you favour me by imparting it?"

"Willingly," said Claverhouse; 'it can signify little for you cannot avenge yourself on the curate, as you will probably leave Scotland for some time.'

"This is but a piece of news, Mr. Morton," Morton felt an involuntary shudder at hearing words which implied a banishment from his native land; but he answered, Claverhouse proceeded to read, 'Henry Morton, Sibbe Morton, the Scottish Parliament, nephew and apparent heir of Morton of Milnwood—imperfectly educated, but with some beyond his years—excellent at all exercises—indifferently as to the study of religion, but not unacquainted with it; has given himself to the presbyterian—has high-flown and dangerous notions about liberty of thought and speech, and hears between a latitudinarian and an enthusiast. Much admired and followed by the bough of his own age—modest, quiet, and unsuspecting in manner, but in his heart peculiarly bold and intractable. He is—Here follows three red crosses, Mr. Morton, which signify truly dangerous. You see how important a person you are—but what does this fellow want?"

"A horseman rode up as he spoke, and gave a letter. Claverhouse glanced it over, laughed scornfully, bade him tell his master to send his prisoners to Edinburgh, for there was no answer; and, as the man turned back, spoke contemptuously to Morton:—"Here is an ally of yours deserted from you, rather I say, an ally of your good friend Burley—hear how he sets forth—'Dear Sir,' (I wonder when we were such intimate friends) 'It is my duty and my conscientious duty to accept your humble congratulations on the victory—hum—blessed the Majesty's army. I pray you to understand I have my people under arms to take and interdict all fugitives, and have already several prisoners, and so forth.' Subscribed Randal O'drane—You know the fellow by name, I suppose?"

"A relative of Lady Margaret Bellendine," replied Morton.

"Ay," replied Grahame, "and heir-male of her father's family, though a distant one, and moreover a suitor to the fair Edith, though discarded as an unworthy one; but, above all, a devoted admirer of the estate of Tilletudint, and all thereto belonging."

"He takes an ill mode of recommending himself," said Morton, suppressing his feelings, "to the family at Tilletudint, by corresponding with our unhappy party."

"O, this precious Basil will turn cat in pan with any man, particularly when he is employed on business with the government, because they would not over turn in his favour a settlement of the late Earl of Torwood, by which his lordship gave his own estate to his own son; he was disposed of to the second Margaret, because she avowed no desire for his alliance, and with the pretty Edith, because she did not like his tall uncanny person. So he held a close correspondence with Burley, and raised his followers with the purpose of helping him, providing always he needed no help, that is, if you had beards yesterday. And now the race begins he was all the while proposing the King's service, and, knowing as you know, the council will receive his pretext for current coin, for he knows how to make friends among them—and a dozen scores of poor vagabond fanatics will be shot, or hang, without a sound, and the double cloak of loyalty, well-lined with the towel of hypocrisy."

With conversation on this and other matters they bemoaned the way, Claverhouse, again, with great frankness to Morton, and treating his rather as a friend and companion than as a prisoner; so that, however uncertain of his fate, the hours, he would pass in some sort, and those without so much lightened by the varied play of his imagination, and the depth of his knowledge of human nature, that since the period of his becoming a prisoner of war, which the content for these days to have his own regulation in each parish; they know best the black sheep of the flock. I have had your picture for three years?"
time since his having commenced actor in public life. He seems, indeed, to have been a man of much temper, who has flung his reins on the horse's neck, and, while he abandoned himself to circumstances, was at least relieved from the task of attempting to direct the horse. His horse, in turn, was in no better case, his companions being continually augmented by detached parties of horse who came in from every quarter of the country, bringing with them, for the most part, the unfortunate person who had fallen into their power. At length they approached Edinburgh.

"Our council," said Claverhouse, "being resolved, I should now, by his leave, entertain you, as an intimation, that his parole confined him to it for the present.

After about a quarter of an hour spent in military musings on the glories of his late life, the attention of Morton was summoned to the window by a great noise in the street beneath. Trumpets, drums, and kettle-drums, contended in noise with the shouts of the rabble, and appeared not that the royal cavalry were passing in the triumphal attitude Claverhouse had mentioned. The magnates of the city, attended by their guard of hallwardens, had met the victors with their welcome at the gates of the city, and now preceded them as a part of the procession. The next object was two heads borne upon pikes; and before each bloody head were carried the instruments of torture, the wheels of the rack, the ax, the birch rod, the branding iron, and other instruments of the brutal mockery of those who bore them, often approached towards each other as if in the attitude of extortion or prayer. These bloody trophies belonged to two preachers who had fallen at Bothwell Bridge. After them came a cart led by the executioner's assistant, in which were placed Macbrair, and another two prisoners, who seemed of the same persuasion. They were accompanied by a strong guard, yet looked around them with an air of triumph than dismay, and appeared in no respect moved either by the fate of their companions, or by the noise and tumult of the street, which was increased by the brutality of those who bore them, often approached towards each other as if in the attitude of extortion or prayer.

Behind these prisoners, thus held up to public infamy, rode a body of men bringing brandish their broadswords, and filling the wide street with acclamations, which were answered by the tumultuous outcry and shouts of the rabble, who, in every considerable town, are too hasty in being permitted to buzz for any thing whatever which calls them together. In the rear of these troops came the main body of the prisoners, at the head of whom were some other hares, who were treated with every circumstance of inventive mockery and insult. Several were placed on horseback with their faces to the animal's tail; others were thronged to long bars of iron, which they were obliged to support in their hands, like the galley-slaves in Spain when travelling to the port where they are to be put on shipboard. The hares were then led in triumph before the survivors, some on pikes and halberds, some in sacks, bearing the names of the slaughtered persons labelled on the outside. Such were the method and order in which we are to visit and hear the sufferings of the condemned heretics in an auto-da-fé.

*David Hackston of Ruthwell, who was wounded and made prisoner. The celebrated Cameron fell, was, on entering Edinburgh, by order of the Council, recovered by the Magistrates at the Watergate, and set Behind them came on the nameless crowd to the number of thousands, some retaining under their misfortunes a sense of confidence in the cause for which they suffered captivity, and were about to give a still more bloody testimony; others seemed, indeed, dispersed, having in their own minds their prudence in concealing the cause of which Providence seemed to have disowned, and looking about for some avenue through which they might escape from the consequences of their rashness. Others there were who seemed incapable of forming an opinion on the subject, or of entertaining either hope, confidence, or fear, but who, frowning with thirst and fatigue, stammered inarticulate words at every thing but their present sense of wretchedness, and without having any distinct idea whether they were led to the shambles or to the pasture. These unfortunate men were guarded on each hand by troopers, and behind them came the main body of the cavalry, whose military music resounded back from the high houses on each side of the street, mingled with their own songs of jubilee and triumph, and the wild shouts of the rabble.

Morton felt himself half-sick while he gazed on the dismal spectacle, and recognised in the bloody heads, and still more miserable and groveling features of the living sufferers, faces which had been familiar to him during the brief insurrection. He sunk down in a chair in a bewildered and stupified state, from which he was wakened by the voice of his servant, saying, "Lord forgive us, sir!" the purloin, his teeth chattering like a pair of nut-crackers, his hair erect like bent briers, and his face as pale as that of a corpse."—Lord forgive us, said the man instantly.

"You must immediately attend the Council," said Claverhouse, who entered while Cuddie spoke, and your servant must go with you. You must be under no apprehension for the consequences to yourself personally. But I warn you that you will see something that will give you much pain, and from which I would willingly have saved you, if I had possessed the power. My carriage waits us—shall we go?

It will be readily supposed that Morton did not venture to dispute this invitation, however unpleasant. He rose and accompanied Claverhouse, or by dextr of their own approaching execution, which these preliminaries so plainly indicated.

Behind these prisoners, thus held up to public infamy, rode a body of men bringing their broadswords, and filling the wide street with acclamations, which were answered by the tumultuous outcry and shouts of the rabble, who, in every considerable town, are too hasty in being permitted to buzz for any thing whatever which calls them together. In the rear of these troops came the main body of the prisoners, at the head of whom were some other hares, who were treated with every circumstance of inventive mockery and insult. "O, himmy, himmy!" said she to Cuddie, hanging upon his neck, "glad and proud, and sorry and dum am I, a' in one and the same instant, to see my dear Cuddy gang to his death to suffer for his religion and his master. I see the ax cut off his head, and his mouth in council, as he did with his weapon in the field!"

"Wha'ist, wisth, mither?" cried Cuddie impatiently. "Hast you, mither, no' time to speak o' these things? I tell ye I'll testify neither against you nor against the other. I have spoken to Mr. Pounddew, and I'll take the declaration, or whate'er they ca' it, and I'll write my life for it, and my soul for it, for him and a' his folk, and that's a minister for my siller; I like nan o' your sermons that end in a psalm at the Grassmarket."
"O, Cuddie, man, think was I be they suld hurt ye," said the old man humorously, divided grace; for the safety of her son's soul and that of his body; but mind, my bonny bairn, ye hae batted for the faith, and dinna let the dree o' losing creature-comforts withdraw ye frae the gude fight.

"Hout tout, mother," replied Cuddie, "I hae fought e'en overer muscle already, and, to speak plain, I'm worried o' the trade. I hae swaggered wi' that arra and muskets, and pistols, busskeats, and buckled, long enough, and I like the pleu-pleudie a hantle better. I ken naething sild gar a man fight, (that's to say, when he's no' agaist,) by and by taken the auld arra bare-handed and let it turn back.

"But, my dear Cuddie," continued the persevering Mause, "your bridal garment—Oh, hinny, dinna say the marriage garment!"

"Awa, a' richt," replied Cuddie; "dinna ye see the folks waiting for me?—Never fear me—I ken how to turn this far better than ye do—for ye're bleeding awa about marriage, and the job is how we are to win by hanging."

So saying, he extricated himself out of his mother's embraces, and requested the soldiers who took him in charge to conduct him to the place of examination without delay. He had been already preceded by Cleaverhouse and Morton.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

My native land, good night!—LORD BYRON.

The Privy Council of Scotland, in whom the practice since the union of the crowns vested great judicial powers, as well as the general superintendence of the executive department, was met in the ancient dark Gothic room, adjoining the House of Parliament in Edinburgh, when General Graham entered and took his place amongst the members at the council table.

"You have brought us a leash of game to-day, General," said a nobleman of high place amongst them.

"Here is a craven to confess—a cock of the game to stand at bay—and what shall I call the third, General?"

"Without further metaphor, I will entreat your Grace to call him a person in whom I am especially interested," replied Cleaverhouse.

"And a whiz into the bargain?" said the nobleman, folding out a tongue which was at all times too big for his mouth, and accommodating his coarse features to a snare, to which they seemed to be familiar.

"Yes, please your Grace, a whiz; as your Grace was in 1641," replied Cleaverhouse, with his usual appearance of imperturbable civility.

"He has you there, I think, my Lord Duke," said one of the Privy Councillors.

"Ay, ay," returned the Duke, laughing: "there's no speaking to him since Drumalog—but come, bring in the prisoners—and do you, Mr. Clerk, read the record."

The clerk read forth a bond, in which General Graham of Cleaverhouse and Lord Erskine entered themselves securities, that Henry Morton, younger of Miltonwood, should go abroad and remain in foreign parts, until his Majesty's pleasure was further known, in the event of the said Henry Morton's accession to the late rebellion, and that under penalty of life and limb to the said Henry Morton, and of ten thousand marks to each of his securities.

"Do you accept of the King's mercy upon these terms, Mr. Morton?" said the Duke of Lauderdale, who presided in the Council.

"I have no other choice, my lord," replied Morton.

"You may subscribe your name in the record."

Morton did so without reply, conscious that, in the circumstances of his case, it was impossible for him to have escaped more easily. Macbrair, who was at the same interview, turned his face to the foot of the counciltable, bound upon a chair, for his weakness prevented him from standing, held Morton in the act of what he accounted apostasy.

"He hath summed his defection by owning the carnal power of the tyrant," he exclaimed, with a deep gravity: "a fallen star!—a fallen star!"

"Hold your peace, sir," said the Duke, "and keep your ain breath to cool your ain porridge—you'll find them scalding hot, I promise you.—Call in the other fellow, who looks as common as these. One sheep will leap the ditch when another goes first."

Cuddie was introduced unbound, but under the guard of two halberdiers, and placed beside Macbrair at the foot of the table. The poor fellow cast a piteous look around him, in which were mingled sweats for the great men in whose presence he stood, and compassion for his fellow-sufferers, with no small fear of the perilous consequences which were impending on himself. He made his clownish obeisances with a double portion of reverence, and then awaited the opening of the awful scene.

"Were you at the battle of Bothwell Bridge?" was the first question which was thundered in his ear.

Cuddie meditated a denial, but had sense enough, upon reflection, to discover that the truth would be too strong for him; so he replied, with true Caledonian indirectness of response, "I'll say no but it may be possible that I might have been there."

"Answer clearly, sir; you know—yes, or no?—You know you were there."

"It's no for me to contradict your Lordship's Grace's honour," said Cuddie.

"Once more, sir, were you there?—yes, or no?—You know you were there."

"Speak out, you scoundrel," said General Dalzell, "or I'll dash your teeth out with your mudgework!—Do you think we can stand here all day to be turning and dashing with you, like greyhounds after a hare?"

"Awed, then," said Cuddie, "since naething else will please you, write down that I cannot deny but I was there."

"Well, sir," said the Duke, "and do you think that the rising upon that occasion was rebellion or not?"

"I'm no just free to give my opinion, sir," said the cautious captive, "on what might cost my neck; but I doubt it will be very little better."

"Better than what?"

"Just than rebellion, as your honour ca's it," replied Cuddie.

"Well, sir, that's speaking to the purpose," replied the Duke. "You condescend to accept of the King's pardon for your guilt as a rebel, and to keep the church, and pray for the King?"

"Blithely, sir," answered the unscrupulous Cuddie; "and in his health into the bargain, when the ale's gone."

"Egad," said the Duke, "this is a hearty cock.—What brought you into such a scrape, mine honest friend?"

"Just ill example, sir," replied the prisoner, "and a duft sild jact of a ruther, wi' reverence to your Grace's honour."

"Why, Gosh, mercy, my friend," replied the Duke, "take care of bad advice another time; I think you are not likely to commit treason on your own score.— Make out his free pardon, and bring forward the ropes in the chair."

Macbrair was then moved forward to the post of examination.

"Were you at the battle of Bothwell Bridge?" was the like manly, demanded of him.

"I was," answered the prisoner, in a bold and resolute tone.

"Were you armed?"

"I was not—but in my calling as a preacher of

* The General is said to have struck one of the captive whites, when he spoke again, with the butt of his sabre, saying that the blood rushed out. The provocation for this unjust violence was, that the prisoner had called the fierce veteran "a Mercenary heart, who used to roam free." Damrell had been long in the Russian service, which in those days was to school of humanity.

God's word, to encourage them that drew the sword in his cause."

"Other words, to aid and abet the rebels?" said the Duke.

"Thou hast spoken it," replied the prisoner.

"Well, then," continued the interrogator, "let us know. How came it, Sir Robert Bruce, that you were among the party?—I presume you know me.

"I bless God that I do know him," replied Macbrair; "he is a zealous and a sincere Christian."

"And with what face did you last see this valiant personage?" was the query which immediately followed.

"Come here to answer for myself," said Macbrair, in the same daintless manner, "and not to endanger others."

"We shall know," said Dalzell, "how to make you find your tongue.

"If you can make him fancy himself in a conven
ticle," answered Lauderdale, "he will find it without you. Come, ladde, speak, while the play is good— you're too young to bear the burden will be laid on you else.

"I defy you," retorted Macbrair. "This has not been the first of my imprisonments or of my sufferings. I am, perhaps, I may be, I have lived long enough to know how to die when I am cut down.

"Ay, but there are some things which must go before an easy death, if you continue obstinate," said Lord Burley, "the fine-looking silver bell which was placed before him on the table.

A dark crimson curtain, which covered a sort of niche, or Gothic recess in the wall, rose at the signal, and disclosed the path of death, a tall,grim, and hideous man, having an oaken table before him, on which lay thumb-screws, and an iron case, called the Scottish boot, used in those tyrannical days to torture accursed persons. Morton, who was unprepared for this ghastly apparition, started when the curtain arose, but Macbrair's nerves were more firm. He gazed upon the horrible apparatus with much compo tion, and then placed his hand upon the moon, while he whispered, "For God's sake, think of me!"

This movement, fortunately for him, was observed by no other of the councillors, whose attention was engaged with the fine-looking silver bell which was placed before him on the table.

"Do you know who that man is?" said Lauderdale, in a low, stern voice, almost sinking into a whisper.

"He is, I suppose," replied Macbrair, "the in mous executor of your bloodthirsty commands upon the persons of God's people. He and you are executors of each other's will. God, I am more fear what he can inflict than what you can command. Flesh and blood may shrink under the sufferings you can doom me to, and poor frail nature may be forced to confess we have sinned against that our souls are anchored firmly on the rock of ages."

"Do your duty," said the Duke to the executioner.

"The follow advanced, and asked, with a harsh and shrill voice, if the prisoner's limbs he should first employ his engine.

"Let him choose for himself," said the Duke; "I should like to oblige him in any thing that is reason able."

"Since you leave it to me," said the prisoner, "stretching forth his right leg, "take it best—I will favor it, I believe, in the cause for which I suffer."

The executioner, with the help of his assistants, enclosed the leg and knee within the tight iron boot, or case, and then placing a wedge of the same metal between the knee and the edge of the machine, took a mallet in his hand, and stood waiting for further orders. A well-dressed man, by profession a surgeon, placed himself by the other side of the prisoner's chair, bared the prisoner's arm, and applied his thumb to the pulse in order to regulate the torture according to the strength of the patient. When these preparations were made, the President of the Council repeated with the same stern voice the question.

"When and where did you last see John Bruce?"

The prisoner, instead of replying to him, turned his eyes to heaven as if imploring Divine strength, and muttered a few words, of which the last were distinctly audible. "Thou hast said thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power."

The Duke of Lauderdale glanced his eye round the council as if to collect their suffrages, and, judging from their mute signs, gave on his own part a nod to the executioner, whose mallet instantly descended on the wretched man, pressing it limb by limb. The iron boot, occasioned the most exquisite pain, as was evident from the flush which instantly took place on the brow and on the cheeks of the sufferer. The following words ring'd his ears, and stood prepared to give a second blow.

"Will you yet say," repeated the Duke of Lau derdale; "where and when you last parted from Balfour of Burley?"

"You have my answer," said the sufferer resolutely, and the second blow fell. The third and fourth succeeded; but at the fifth, when a larger wedge had been introduced, the prisoner set up a scream of agony.

Morton, whose blood boiled within him at witnessing such cruelty, could bear no longer, and, although unarmed and himself in great danger, was springing forward, when Claverhouse, who observed his emotion withheld him by force, laying one hand on his arm and the other on his mouth, while he whispered, "For God's sake, think of me!"

This movement, fortunately for him, was observed by no other of the councillors, whose attention was engrossed with the fine-looking silver bell which was placed before him on the table.

"He is gone," said the surgeon— "he has fainted, my Lords, and human nature can endure no more."

"Release him," said the Duke; and added, turning to Dalzell, "we will make an exception in his case, for he'll scarce ride to-day, though he has had his boots on. I suppose we must finish with him?"

"Ay, dispatch his sentence, and have done with him; we have plenty of dragoons behind us."

Strong waters and essences were hastily employed to recall the senses of the unfortunate captive; and, when his first faint gasps intimated a return of sensation, the Duke pronounced sentence of death upon him, as a traitor taken in the act of open rebellion, and adjudged him to be carried from the bar to the common place of execution, and there hanged by the neck; his head and hands to be stricken off after death, and disposed of according to the pleasure of the Council,* and all and sundry his movable goods and gear eschat and inbrought to his Majesty's use.

"Doommster!" he continued, "repeat the sentence to the prisoner!"

The office of Doommster was in those days, and till a much later period, held by the executioner in common, who, according to the binary custom, was consistent in reciting to the unhappy criminal the sentence of the law as pronounced by the judge, which acquired an additional and horrid emphasis from the recollection, perhaps of a grateful personage, who was suffered to be the agent of the cruelties he denounced. Macbrair had scarce understood the pur port of the words as first pronounced by the Lord Presi dent of the Council; but he was sufficiently recovered to listen and to reply to the sentence when uttered by the harsh and odious voice of the ruffian who was to execute it, and at the last awful words, "And this pronounces for death," he answered boldly: "My Lords, I thank you for the only favour I looked for, or would accept at your hands, namely, that you have sent the crushed and maimed carcass, which has this day sustained your cruelty, to this nasty end. It was indeed little to me whether I perish on the gallows or in the prison-house; but if death, following close on what I have this day suffered, had found me in my cell of darkness, I should have been as content as any right sight how a Christian man can suffer in the good

* The pleasure of the Council respecting the relics of their victims was often as savage as the rest of their conduct. The heads of the prisoners were frequently exposed on pikes between their two hands, sometimes displayed at the end of a chain of prayer. When the celebrated Richard Cameron's head was exposed in this manner, a democratical spectator broke into the mouth of one who had lived praying and preaching, and died praying and fighting.

Lothian.
CAUSE. For the rest, I forgive you, my Lords, for what you have pronounced and I have sustained—and with delight. I must—Ye send me from darkness into light—from humility to immortality—and in a word, from the ruin of the thrones, therefore, and pardon of a dying man can you do good, take them at their hand, and may your last moment be as happy as mine?

And of late the countenance radiant with joy and triumph, he was withdrawn by those who had brought him into the apartment, and executed within half an hour, doing with the same ease and composure that he had done in the whole life he had evinced.

The count broke up, and Morton found himself again in the carriage with General Graham.

"My honour, sirrah, and gallantry," said Morton, as he reflected upon Mortimer's conduct; "what a pity it is that with such self-devotion and heroism should have been mingled the fierce furies of his best}

"You mean," said Claverhouse, "his resolution to condemn you to death? To that he would have renounced himself by a single text; for example, And Phineas, iniquity, or something to the same purpose. But what ye where you are now bound, Mr. Morton?"

"We are on the road to Leith, I observe," answered Morton; "I trust to meet my friends ere I leave my native land."

"Your much," replied Graham, "has been spoken to, and declars you visiting. The good gentleman is terrified, and not without some reason, that the crime of your treason may extend itself over his lands and territories—he sends you, however, his blessing, and a small sum of money. Lord Evandale continues extremely indisposed. Major Bellenden is at Tillytuton putting matters in order. The soundings have made great havoc there with Lady Margaret's muniments of antiquity, and have decreted and destroyed lad hills called the Throne of his most Sacred Majesty. Is there any one else whom you would wish to see?"

Morton replied as he answered, "No. It would avail nothing. But my preparations, small as they are, some must be necessary."

"They are all ready for you," said the General. "Lord Evandale has anticipated all you wish. Here is a receipt from him with letters of recommendation for the court of the Steward of the Prince of Orange, to which I have added one or two. I made my first campaign under him, and first saw fire at the battle of Wittenberg. He billets for you for some immediate wants, and more will be sent when you require it."

Morton heard all this and received the parcel with an assured look. The sentence of Tillytuton was the execution of the sentence of banishment.

"And my servant?" he said. "He shall be taken care of, and replaced, if it he practicable, in the service of Lord Margaret Bellenden; I think he will hardly neglect the parade of the feudal retainers, or go a-wandering a second time. But here we are upon the quay, and the boat waits you."

It was even as Claverhouse said. A boat waited for Captain Morton, with the trunks and baggage belonging to his rank. Claverhouse shook him by the hand, and wished him good fortune, and a happy return to Scotland in quieter times.

"I shall never forget," he said, "the gallantry of your behaviour to my friend Evandale, in circumstances when many men would have sought to rid him out of their way."

Another friendly pressure, and they parted. As Morton descended the pier to get into the boat, a hand was laid upon his shoulder, and a letter folded in an evasive manner was thrust into his Chin. He looked round. The person who gave it seemed much muffled up; he pressed his fingers upon his lip, and then disappeared among the crowd. The incident struck Morton by its novelty; and when it reached his bivouac he was much surprised.

August 1674. Claverhouse greatly distinguished himself in this action, and was made Captain.
and Morton was separated for several years from the land of his nativity.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

WHO does time tallow within LI.

It is fortunate for tale-tellers that the unities of time and place, and may conduct their personas to Athens and Rome, and to the more distant places, without any break and to their convenience. Time, to use Rosalind’s simile, has not been paced with the hero of our tale; for, between Morton’s first appearance as a competitor for the Crown and his separation from it, barely two months elapsed. Years, however, gladly away ere we find it possible to resume the thread of our narrative, and Time must be held to have galled over the interval. Graving, therefore, the privilege of my cast, I entreat the reader’s attention to the continuation of the narrative, as it starts from a new era, being the year immediately subsequent to the British Revolution.

Scotland had just begun to repose from the convulsion occasioned by a change of dynasty, and, through the prudent tolerance of King William, had narrowly escaped the horrors of a protracted civil war. Agriculture began to revive; and men, whose minds had been disturbed by the violent political concussions, and the general change of government in church and state, lived beneath them, separate and busy, and to give the usual attention to their own private affairs in lieu of discussing those of the public. The Highlanders alone resisted the newly-established order of the day, and were a considerable body, under the Viscount of Dunbar, whom our readers have hitherto known by the name of Grahame of Claverhouse. But the near state of the Highlands was so ominous, that their being more or less at a distance was not supposed greatly to affect the general tranquility of the country, so long as their disorders were confined within their own borders. The Lowlands, the Jacobites, now the undermost party, had ceased to expect any immediate advantage by open resistance, and were, in their turn, driven to hold private meetings, and form associations for mutual defense, under the government termed treason, while they cried out persecution.

The triumphant whigs, while they re-established peace and quietness in the nation, in the General Assemblies of the Kirk their natural influence, were very far from going the lengths which the Cameronians and more extravagant portion of the party carried them. But the books were demanded. They would listen to no proposal for reestablishing the Solemn League and Covenant; and those who had expected to find in King William a less cordial Covenant Monarch, were grievously disappointed when he intimated, with the phlegm peculiar to his country, his intention to tolerate all forms of religion which were consistent with the safety of the state. The principles of indulgence thus espoused and gored in by the government, gave great offence to the more violent party, who condemned them as diametrically contrary to Scripture; for which narrow-mindedness, general they were deeply contemned, and again hated by the religious people, and they also much injured against the influence assumed by secular persons in exercising the rights to patronage, which they termed a rape upon the chastity of the Church. They censured and condemned as Erastian many of the measures, by which government after the Revolution showed an inclination to interfere with the management of the Church, and they positively refused to pay taxes for the support of Bishop Burnet and Queen Mary, until they should, on their part, have sworn to the Solemn League and Covenant, the Magna Charta, as they termed it, of the Presbyterian Church.

This party, therefore, remained grumbling and dissatisfied, and made repeated declarations against de-
"I wish to know the way to Fairy-Knowe."

"Mammie, mammie," exclaimed the little rustics running towards the door of the hut, "come out and speak to the gentleman."

The stranger appeared—a handsome young countrywoman, to whose features, originally sly and espionage in expression, maturity had given that decent matronly air which peculiarly marks the peasant's wife of the land. She shook her head, and went into the other she smoothed down her apron, to which hung a chubby child of two years old. The elder girl, whom the traveller had first seen, fell back behind her as soon as she was smoothed, and kept at that station, occasionally peeping out to look at the stranger.

"What was your pleasure, sir?" said the woman, with all the respect of breeding, not quite common in her rank of life, but without any thing resembling forwardness.

The stranger looked at her with great earnestness for a moment, and then replied, "I am seeking a place called Fairy-Knowe, and a man called Cuthbert Headrig. You can probably direct me to him?"

"It's my gudeman, sir," said the young woman with a smile, "he's got a boat and a loonie at this right, sir, and come into our puir dwelling?—Cuddie, Cuddie,—" (a white-headed rogue of four years appeared at the door of the hut)—"Rin awa, my bonny man, and tell your father to come out and see the strangers."

"Nae doubt," said Cuddie, after a moment's hesitation, "but I first like to ken what sort of questions they are. I have had many questions sperced on me in my day, and in sic queer ways, that if ye kend a', ye wadna wonder at me jologing 'a thing or twa."

"Single Carrich, which was a great vex; then I bo-hoved to learn about my godfathers and godmothers to please the nedd lyel; and whiles I jumbled them thegther and pleased nane o' them; and when I cam to man's yestate, cam another kind o' questioning in fashion, that I liked waur than Effectual Calling; and the 'did promise and vow' of the tane were yoko to the kind o' the tother. Sae ye see, sir, I syre like to hear questions asked before I answer them;"

"You have nothing to apprehend from mine, my good friend; they only relate to the state of the country."

"No, Cuddie," replied Cuddie; "ou, the country's wheel enough, an it werena that douro duvili, Claverse, (they ca' him Dundee now,) that's stirrin' about yet in the Highlands, they say, wi' a' the Donalds, and Dunbars, and Angusals, that over there bottomless breaks, driving about wi' him, to get things agether again, now we ha' gotten them a' reasonably well setled. But Mackay will pit him down, there's little doun o' that; he'll gie him his fairing, I'll be caution for it."

"What makes you so positive of that, my friend?" asked the stranger.

"I heard it from my ain lugs," answered Cuddie, "foretaught hame by a man that had been three hours stane dead, and came back to this earth again just to tell him his mind. It was at a place ca'd Drumshill."
CROPP. XXXVIII.] OLD MORTALITY.

"The devil's in this man," said Cuddie to himself; "I wish he would either light off or ride on, that he may quarter himself in Hamilton or the shower begin!"

But the rider sat motionless on his horse for two or three moments after his last question, like one exhausted with his exertions. At length he suddenly recovered himself, as if with a sudden and painful effort, he asked Cuddie, "if Lady Margaret Bellenden still lived."

"She lives," replied Cuddie, "but in a very sma' way. They have been a sad changed family since those rough times began; they have suffered enough first and last—and to lose the mid Tower and a' the bonny barony and the farms that I have ploughed same, and the Mans, and my kail-yard, that I said I'd gotten back again, and a' for naething, no a body may say, but just the want o' some bit of sheep-skin that were lost in the confusion of the taking of Tilitudledum."

"I have heard something of this," said the stranger, deepening his voice, and averting his head. I have some interest in the family, and would willingly help them if I could. Can you give me a bed in your house to-night, my friend?"

"It's but a corner of a place, aye," said Cuddie, "but it will do. You can ride on in the rain and thundher; for, to be free wi' ye, sir, I think ye seem no o' that weel sort."

"I am liable to a dizziness," said the stranger, "but it was a very weary sort o' ride we had."

"I ken we can give ye a decent supper, sir," said Cuddie; "and we'll see about a bed as weel as we can. We wad be lathie a stranger said lack what we have, though we are no gienly provided for in beds rather; for Jenny has many many bairns, God bless them and her, that thocht I maun speak to Lord Evandale to gie us a bit eek, or onthoth o' some sort, to the onthochrome."

"I shall be easily accommodated," said the stranger, "as he entered the house."

"And ye may rely on your head being weel sorted," said Cuddie; "for Jenny yon wig belongs to suppering a horse, and this is a very gude ane."

Cuddie took the horse to the little cow-house, and called to his wife to attend in the mean while to the stranger's accommodation. The officer entered, and threw himself on a settle at some distance from the fire, carefully turning his back to the little lattice window. Jenny, or Mrs. Hendrie, when the reader please, inspiration to women and flower-gardeners, what he worked upon his journey, but he excused himself under pretence of feeling cold; and, to divert the time till Cuddie's return, he entered into some what with the children, carefully avoiding the interval, the inquisitive glances of his landlady.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

What trade tears bedim the eye
What deaths we suffer ere we die
Our broken friendships we deplore
And lives of youth that are no more. LOGAN.

Cuddie soon returned, assuring the stranger, with a cheerful voice, "that the horse was properly supped, and that he had a bed for him at the house, mere purpose-like and comfortable than the like o' them could gie him."

Are the family at the house? said the stranger, with an interrupted and broken voice.

"No, sir; they're awa' wi' the servants—they keep only twa now-a-days, and my godwife has the keys and the charge, though she's no a fied servent. She has been born and bred in the family, and has a trust and management. If they were there, we behovedna to take sic freedom without their order; but when they are awa, they will be weel pleased we're the children, careful in turnin' it man. Miss Bellenden will help a' the hall ward, an her power were as gude as her will; and her grandmother, Ledy Margaret, has an unco respect for the gentry, and she's no ill to the poor body wi' a' that, or what for are ye no getting forrit wi' the sovens?"
TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

"Hout tart, lad," replied Jenny, "ye ken them little to think o' yer rank, wid set up house wid said Ailie Wilson, when they're maist ower proud to take favours frae Lord Evandale himself. Na, na, they mae na dune the camp, if she tak Morton."

"That's the only way to make her see ye're the sure," said Cuddie; "she wad hardly win over a lang day in the baggage-wain."

Then see a flying as there wad be between them, 'about for yer life, ye kent,' contended Jenny.

"To be sure," said Cuddie, "the auld leddy's unco kittle in three points."

And then, Cuddie, continued his housemate, who had newly been convinced that the strongest argy at the last, 'if this marriage wi' Lord Evandale is broken off, what comes o' our ain bit free house, and the kail-yard, and the cow's grass-I trow that baith us and the bonny heimis will be turned on the wide world.'

Here Jenny began to whisper—Cuddie wrote himself this way and that way, the very picture of indecision. At length he broke out, "Well, woman, can ye tell us what we auld do, without a' this din about it?"

"Just do naething at a'," said Jenny. "Never seem to ken onything about this gentleman, and for your life wi' let me kent that he auld mind is as young as a baby at the house—An I haud kent, I wad hae gane him my ain bed, and slept in the byre or he had gane up by; but it canna be helpful now. The neast things to get, an', wi' this, we'll just gane and have a talk in the morn."

"Ay, but, Cuddie lad," replied Jenny, "though ye are nae blind, ye are nae noce, no more takin' as I am."

"Well, what for nae ye cast that up to me now? for what did ye see about the man that was like our Master Harry?"

"I'll tell ye," said Jenny, "I jistified his keeping his face free at us, and speaking wi' a maude-like voice, and I might ha' put a piece o' lang-syne, and when I spake o' the brose, ye ken, he didn't jist laugh—he's ower grave for that now-a-days, but he gave a tingle wi' his eye that I kent he took up what I said. I disavow any knowledge about Miss Edith's marriage, and I never saw a man name down wi' true love in my days—I might say man or woman—only I mind how ill Miss Edith was when she first got word that him and you (muckle carelesse loon) were coming against Tillettudle wi' the n'abs. But what's the matter wi' the man now?"

"What's the matter wi' me, indeed?" said Cuddie, who was again busily cutting on the corner of the generous cake, "I had stumped myself of, 'an' I no gau gane up this instant to see my master!"

"Awel, Cuddie, ye are nae nae se e gate," said Jenny.

"The devil in the wife!" said Cuddie; "'d ye think I am to be John Tamson's man, and mastered by what maids say?"

"And whase maids wad ye be? And wha wad ye be to master ye but me, Cuddie, lad?" answered Jenny."

"I'll jist ye comprehend in the making of a hay-band. Naebody kents that this young gentleman is living but ourselves, and frae that he keeps him up e'er clasie. I am justly that he's purposin', if he fand Miss Edith either married, or just gau to be married, he wad just wade awa easy, and gie them up a mine trouble. But if Miss Edith kend that he was living, and if she wad been standing before the very minister wi' Lord Evandale when it was tauid to her, I'd warrant she wad say that ye're right."

"Well," replied Cuddie, "and what's my business wi' that? if Miss Edith like her auld ude better than her new ude, what for suld she no be free to change hoo she likes to other folk?—Ye ken, Jenny, Halliday aye throes he had a promising face yourself."

"Halliday's a liar, and ye're naething but a goner in to hoarken till him, Cuddie. And then for this liddle's chay—ye may be sure at the gowd Mr. Morton has on the outside o' his coat, and how can he keep Liddy Margaret and the young leddy?"

"Tams there Milnwood?" said Cuddie. "Nae doubt, that wis the housekeeper's coif-rent, as he heard naught o' his nephew; but it's but speaking the auld wife fair, and they ma' a live braying thegher, Liddy Margaret and a'."

OLD MORTALITY.

"Not I, not I," said the young lady, making her escape; "the third person makes a silly figure on such occasions. When you want me for breakfast, I will be found in the kitchen-wench's time.

As she tripped out of the room, Lord Evandale entered—"Good-morrow, brother, and good-by till breakfast-time, and I trust the lively young lady; "I trust you will give Miss Bellenden some occasions for disturbing her rest so early in the morning." And so saying, she left them together, without waiting a reply.

"And now, my lord," said Edith, "may I desire to know the meaning of your singular request to meet you here at so early an hour?"

She was too anxious to ask what she hardly felt herself excusable in having complied with it; but, upon looking at the person whom she addressed, she was struck dumb by the singular and agræed expression of his countenance, and interrupted herself to exclaim—"For God's sake, what is the matter?"

"His Majesty's faithful subjects have gained a great and most decisive victory near Blair Athole; but, alas! my gallant friend, Lord Dundee—"

"Has fallen?" said Edith, anticipating the rest of his tidings.

"True—true—he has fallen in the arms of victory, and is unable, remains in consequence sufficient to fill up his loss in King James's service. This, Edith, is no time for temporising with our duty. I have given directions to raise my followers, and I hope you will do just out of which you was desirous of excluding them on account of its contiguity to the room in which Morton slept, was not only unlocked, but absolutely ajar. Miss Bellenden, too, has, through engagement with her own immediate subjects of reflection to take much notice of the circumstance, but, desiring the servant to open the window-shutters, walked into the room along with her sister.

"He is not yet come," she said. "What can your brother possibly mean?—Why express so anxious a wish that we should meet him here! And why not come to Castle-Unna, as he proposed? I own, my dear Emily, that, even engaged as we are to each other, and with the sanction of your presence I do not feel that I have done quite right in indulging him."

"Evandale was never capricious," answered her sister; "I am sure he will satisfy us with his reasons, and if he does not, I will help you to scold him."

"All my hopes," said Edith, "are here; I have been engaged in some of the plots of this fluctuating and unhappy time. I know his heart is with that dreadful Cleverhouse and his army, and I believe he would do anything to prevent any united effort of death, which gave him so much additional trouble on our account. How singular that one so rational and so deeply sensible of the errors of the exiled family, should be ready to risk all for their restoration!"

"What can I say?" answered Lady Emily; "it is a point of honour with Evandale. Our family have always been here—he served long in the Guaranis; the Viscount of Dundee was his commander and his friend for years—he is looked on with an evil eye by many of his own relations, who set down his inactive mode of life to want of spirit. You must be aware, my dear Edith, how often family connexions, and early predilections, influence our actions more than abstract arguments. But I trust Evandale will continue quiet, though, to tell you truth, I believe you are the only one who can keep him so."

"And how is it in my power?" said Miss Bellenden.

"You can furnish him with the Scriptural apology for not going forth with the host," said he married a wife, and therefore cannot come."

"I have promised," said Edith, in a faint voice; "but I trust I shall not be urged on the score of time."

"Nay," said Lady Emily, "I will leave Evandale (and here he comes) to plead his own cause."
TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

Edith was struck dumb by an arrow had not expected, and was compelled to tell Lord Evandale's suit was urged as well as with consideration.

"And yet," she said, "Such is the with which my heart reverts to form."

"I am your own kind of a girl," he said, as he drove away, "I am your own kind of a girl."
that he will seek no woman's hand against her inclination; and, though his sister, I may boldly say, that he does not need, or want any lady farther than her inclinations carry her. You will forgive me, Miss Bellenden; but your present distress augurs ill for my brother's future happiness, and I must needs say, that he does not merit all those expressions of dislike and unmitigated regret which he has manifested so long, and in so many ways.

"You are right, Lady Emily," said Edith, drying her eyes, and endeavouring to resume her natural manner, though still betrayed by her faltering voice and the pallor of her cheeks—"You are quite right—parsimony has no one, least of all of her whom he has honoured with his regard. But if I have given way, for the last time, to a sudden and irresistible burst of feeling, it is my consolation, Lady Emily, that your brother knows the cause; that I have had nothing from him, and that he at least is not unremorseful of finding in Edith Bellenden a wife unmeriting of his affection. But still you are right, and I merit your censure for indulging for a moment fruitless regret and painful remembrances. It shall be no longer; my lot is cast with Evan- dale, and with him I am resolved to bear it. Nothing shall absolve me from the duty, or the remembrance of his relations; no idle recollections of other days shall intervene to prevent the zealous and affectionate discharge of my duty; no vain illusions render me other than a woman.

As she spoke these words, she slowly raised her eyes, which had before been hidden by her hand, to the latticed window of her apartment, which was partly open, uttered a sigh, and turned to her sister. Lady Emily turned her eyes in the same direction, but saw only the shadow of a man, which seemed to disappear from the window, and, terrified more by the state of her mind than by the appearance of her lover, had herself without. She uttered shriek upon shriek for assistance. Her brother soon arrived with the chaplain and Jenny Davenport, but strong and vigorous remedy were necessary ere they could recall Miss Bellenden to sense and motion. Even then her language was wild and incoherent.

"Presume no further," she said to Lord Evan- dale; "it cannot be—Heaven and earth, the living and the dead, have legged themselves against this ill-starred union. Take all I can give—my sisterly regard—my devoted friendship. I will love you as a sister, and regard you as a woman, but never speak to me more of marriage.

The astonishment of Lord Evandale may easily be conceived.

"Oh, Lady Emily," he said to his sister, "this is your doing, I was accursed when I thought of bringing you here—some of your fuddled folly has driven her mad.

"On my word, brother," answered Lady Emily, you are sufficient to drive all the women in Scotland mad. Because your mistress seems much disposed to quit you, the quarrel with your sister who has been arguing in your cause, and who brought her to a quiet hearing, when, all of a sudden, a man looked in at the window, whom her crazed sensitibility took for either for you or some other, and has treated us gratis with her peculiar scene.

"What man? What window?" asked Lord Evan- dale, in impatient displeasure. Miss Bellenden is incapable of trifling with me;—and yet what else could have?

"Hush! hush!" said Jenny, whose interest lay particularly in stirring further inquiry: "for Hen- ven's sake, my lord, speak low, for my lady begins to recover.

Edith was no sooner somewhat restored to herself than she burst into a feeble voice, to be left alone with Lord Evan- dale. All retreated, Jenny with Lady Emily and the chaplain with that of awakened curiosity. No sooner had they left the apartment than Edith beckoned Lord Evan- dale to sit beside her on the couch. Her face was the last to sink from her seat and to clasp his knees.

"Forgive me, my Lord!" she exclaimed—"Forgive me! I must deal most unjustly by you, and break a solemn engagement. You have my friend- ship, my highest regard, my most sincere gratitude. You have more; you have my word and my faith. But, O, forgive me, the circumstances have not my love, and I cannot marry you without a sin!

"You dream, my dearest Edith," said Evan- dale, perplexed in the utmost despair—"you let your imagina- tion beguile you; this is but some delusion of an over-sensitive mind; the person whom you preferred to me is a woman who has vowed an unalterable, unavailing regret cannot follow him, or, if it could, would only diminish his happiness.

"You are mistaken, Lord Evan- dale," said Edith, solemnly, "I am not a way-flyer, or a mendicant. No—I could not have believed from any one what I have seen. But, having seen him, I must believe mine own eyes.

"Seen whom?—seen whom?" asked Lord Evan- dale, in great anxiety.

"Henry Morton," replied Edith, uttering these two words as if they were her last, and very faintly nut- ters when spoken in whispers, or in the most remote parts of his relations; no idle recollections of other days shall intervene to prevent the zealous and affectionate discharge of my duty; no vain illusions render me other than a woman.

The astonishment of Lord Evandal one having slept in the apartment adorning to the parlour, and even to transact the business of the day beneath the window, through which she conjectured Mr. Morton's eye might have rested. When he had left the garden, to turn one look at her whom he had so long adored, and who was now on the point of leaving her forever. That he had passed Halliday in the garden, and that his horse, a brown gelding, had ridden away. The young woman had employed to have the stranger's horse saddled and ready for his departure, that he had rushed into the stable, thrown the child on her back, and mounted his horse, had ridden away. And the secret was, in their own family, and Jenny was resolved it should remain so.

For, in his first visit, although her lady's servant, and in her lady's household, Mr. Morton by broad daylight, that was the reason I told you to keep him in the gloom and by candlelight, and him keeping his face from Cuddie and the others.

So she stood resolutely upon the negative when examined by Lord Evanola. For as Halliday, he could only say, that as he entered the garden-door, the supposed appearance of an agent upon his premises, and with a visage on which anger and grief appeared to be contending.

He knew him well, he said, "having been repeatedly intrusted with matters of importance. And his marks of stature and visage in case of escape. And there were few faces like Mr. Morton's.

But what should make him haunt the country where he was not known?" So he, "the said Halliday, did not pretend to conceive.

Lady Emily confessed she had seen the face of a man at the window, but her evidence went no further. John Golbag, the sexton, was asked to the witness stand; he had left his gardening to get his morning dress and was at the time when the apparition had taken place. Lady Emily's servant was waiting orders in the kitchen, and there was another person being within a quarter of a mile of the house.

Lord Evanola returned perplexed and dissatisfied in the highest degree, at beholding a plan which he thought necessary not less for the protection of Edith in contingent circumstances, than for the assurance of his own happiness, and which he had brought so very near perfection, thus broken off with but any apparent or rational cause. His knowledge of Edith's character seemed to be in covering any capricious change of determination by a pretended vision. But he would have set the apparition down to the influence of an overstrained imagination, and attributed the angry countenance to the young woman's imagination, and then vanished in a moment.

In the confusion, the apparition had appar- ently made up her own purposes, as the sexton said that the appearance of his servant and the young woman's, she made affidavit that he had not seen or heard any such person. She knew no more of Mr. Halliday's appearance, and so promulgated his own. On the other hand, it seems in the highest degree improbable that Morton, so long and so vainly sought after, and who was, until that good reason, supposed to be lost when the Viscount of Rotterdam went down with crew and passengers, should be alive and lurking in this country, where there was no longer any reason why he should not openly show himself, and the present government favoured his party in politics. When Lord Evanola reluctantly brought himself to communicate these doubts to the chaplain, in order to obtain his opinion, he could only say, that he learned gentlemen expressed his definite and determined opinion to be, either that there had been an actual apparition of the deceased Henry Morton's spirit, the possibility of which he was, and that Mr. Golbag had, in a Farmleigh, seen no more of Mr. Halliday's appearance, and Then, that the said Henry Morton being still in rerum natura, had appeared in his present person that morning; or, finally, that some strange, unexplained occurrence had taken place, had deceived the eyes of Miss Bellenden and of Thomas Halliday. Which of these was the most probable hypothesis, the Doctor declined to pronounce, but-pressed himself ready to die in the opinion that one or two of them had occasioned that morning’s disturbance.

Lord Evandale soon had additional cause for distressing anxiety. Miss Bellenden was declared to be dangerously ill.

"I will not leave this place," he exclaimed, "till she is pronounced to be in safety. I neither can nor ought to do so; for whatever may have been the immediate occasion of her illness, I gave the first cause for it by my unhappy solicitation.

He established himself, therefore, as a guest in the family, which the presence of his sister as well as of Lady Margaret Bellenden, (who, in despite of her blenchings, had caused herself to be transported thither when she heard of her grand-daughter’s illness,) rendered a step equally natural and delicate. And thus he anxiously waited, until, without injury to her health, Edith could sustain a final explanation of his departure on his expedition.

"She shall never," said the generous young man, "look on her engagement with me as the means of fettering her to a union, the idea of which seems almost to unhinge her understanding."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Ah, happy hills! ah, pleasing shades!
Ah, fields beloved in vain!
Where once my careless childhood strayed,
A strange world now lies before me!
Ode on a distant prospect of Eton College.

It is not by corporal wants and infirmities only that men of the most distinguished talents are jeopardized, during their lifetime, with the common mass of mankind. There are periods of mental agitation when the firmest of mortals must be ranked with the weakest of his brethren; and when, in paying the general tribute of humanity, his interests are even aggravated by feeling that he transgresses, in the indulgence of his grief, the rules of religion and philosophy, by which he endeavours in general to regulate his passions. It was such a period as this, the unfortunates of Edith were transgressors, in a manner, to their own self-denying request. All that he had heard of their mutual relations since his return to Scotland, prepared him to expect that he could only look upon Miss Bellenden as the betrothed bride of Lord Evandale; and, even if freed from the burden of obligation to the latter, it would still have been inconsistent with Morton’s generosity of disposition to disturb their arrangements, by attempting the assertion of his claim, without the consent of friends, and barred by a thousand circumstances of difficulty. Why then did he seek the cottage which their broken fortunes had rendered the residence of Lord Bellenden and her grand-daughter? He yielded, we are under the necessity of acknowledging, to the impulse of an inconsistent wish, which many might have felt in his situation.

Accident apprised him, while travelling towards his native district, that the ladies, whose manner he must necessarily pass, were absent; and learning from the servants, that all the principal domestics, he could not resist pausing at their cottage, to learn, if possible, the real progress which Lord Evandale had made in the affections of Miss Bellenden;—a task not longer his Edith. This rash enterprise ended as we have related, and he parted from the house of Fairy-Knowe, conscious that he was still held by Edith, yet compelled, by faith and honor, to relinquish her for ever. With what feelings he must have listened to the dialogue between Lord Evandale and Edith, the greater part of which he involuntarily overheard, the reader will easily conceive, for we dare not attempt to describe them. A hundred times he was tempted to burst upon their interview, or to exclaim aloud,—"Edith, I yet live,—as often as the recollection of her plight, and of the debt of gratitude which he owed Lord Evandale, (to whose influence with Clavichower he justly ascribed his escape from torture and from death,) with much more emotion, and with a still greater indignation, than he had hitherto shown, Edith, I yet live,—as often as the recollection of her plight, and of the debt of gratitude which he owed Lord Evandale, (to whose influence with Clavichower he justly ascribed his escape from torture and from death,) with much more emotion, and with a still greater indignation, than he had hitherto shown, involved all in further distress, but gave little prospect of forwarding his own happiness. He repressed forcibly, these selfish emotions, though with an agony which thrilled his every nerve.

"No, Edith!" was his internal oath, "never will I add a thorn to thy pillow—That which Heaven has ordained, let it be; and let me not add, by my selfish sorrows, one atom’s weight to the burden thou hast to bear. I was dead to thee when thy resolution was adopted; and never—never shalt thou know that Henry Morton still lives!"

As he formed this resolution, diffident of his own power to keep it, and seeking that firmness in flight which was every moment shaken by his continuance within hearing of Edith’s voice, he hastily rushed from his abode to the little closet and the screened door which led to the garden.

But firmly as he thought his resolution was fixed, he could not leave the spot where the last tones of a voice so beloved still vibrated on his ear, without endeavouring to avail himself of the opportunity which the parlor window afforded, to steal one last glance at the lovely speaker. It was in this attempt, that he fell athwart the little beam which had been bent upon the ground, that Morton’s presence was detected by her raising them suddenly. So soon as her wild scream made this known to the unfortunate object of a design so ill-advised, she fainted, and fell ill-fatigued, he hurried from the place as if pursued by the furies. He passed Halliday in the garden without recognizing, or even being sensible that he had seen him, threw himself on his horse, and, by a sort of instinct rather than recollection, took the first by-road in preference to the public route to Hamilton.

In all probability this prevented Lord Evandale from hearing the news that the Highlanders had obtained a decisive victory at Kilsperraikie, had occasioned an accurate look-out to be kept, by order of the Government, on all the borderers for any penetration among the Lowland Jacobites. They did not omit to post sentinels on Ballinlough Brake, and, as these men had not seen any traveler pass westward in that direction, none of the Highlanders who had been busy in the village of Ballinlough were equally positive that none had gone eastward, the appearance, in the existence of which Edith and Halliday were equally positive, became yet more mysterious in the judgment of Lord Evandale, who was finally inclined to settle in the belief, that the heated and disturbed imagination of Edith had summoned up the phantom she stated herself to have seen, that the Highlanders had, in some unaccountable manner, been infected by the same superstition.

Meanwhile, the by-path which Morton pursued, with all the speed which his vigorous horse could exert, brought him, in a very few seconds to the brink of the Clyde, at a spot marked with the foot of horses, who were conducted to it as a watering-place. The steed, urged as he was to the gallop, did not pause a single instant, growing no less imperious as the rapidity of the motion increased. His movements had been hitherto mechanical, to the necessity of taking measures for preserving himself and the noble animal which he bedizened. A vertiginous master of all manners excesses, his movements K.

norse in water was as familiar to him as when upon a meadow. He directed the animal's course somewhat down the stream, towards the mouth, or haven, which he expected to promisc a easy crossing from the river. In the first and second attempt to get on shore, the horse was frightened by the nature of the ground, and nearly fell backwards off the rider. The incident of the first occasion was a failure, even in the most desperate circumstances, to recall the human mind to some degree of equipoise, unless when altogether distracted by terror, and Morton was obliged to mount the danger in which he was placed for completion recovery of his self-possession. A third attempt, at a spot more carefully and judiciously selected, succceeded better than the former, and placed the horse steadily on his legs, and safety upon the farther and left-hand bank of the Clyde.

"But whither," said Morton, in the bitterness of his heart. "Am I now to direct my course? or rather, what does it signify to which point of the compass a wretch so forlorn betakes himself? I would to God, could the wish be without a sin, that these dark waters had flowed over me, and drowned my recollection of that which was, and that which is!"

The sense of impotence, which the disturbed state of his feelings had occasioned, scarcely had vented itself in these violent expressions, ere he was struck with a violent paroxysm, and a paroxysm so violent as to astonish him. He remembered how signal was the life which he now held so lightly in the bitterness of his disappointment, had it been preserved through the almost incessant perils which had beset him since he entered upon his public career.

"I am a fool!" he said, "and worse than a fool, to set light by that existence which Heaven has so often preserved only to the most powerful men. If something there yet remains for me in this world, were it only to bear my sorrows like a man, and to aid those who need my assistance. What have I acquired, and what is my life for, if it is only to chasten and depress me with a truth which I knew to be happened? They—(the dear, the ever dear) not utter their names even in soliloquy)—they are embittered and in difficulties. She is stripped of her inheritances, and he seems rushing on some dangerous career, with which, but for the low voice in which he spoke,
I might have become acquainted.

Are there no means to aid or to warn them?"

As he pondered upon this topic, forcibly withdrawing his mind from his own disappointment, and compelling his attention to the affairs of Edith and her beloved husband, the letter of Burley, long forgotten, was brought to his memory, like a ray of light darting through a mist.

"Thine aid must have been his work," was his mental conclusion. If it can be repaired, it must be by a provision-made, or by an agency obtained from him. I will seek him out, at least, and who knows what influence the information I may acquire from him may have on the fortunes of those, whom I shall never see more, and who will probably never learn that I am now suppressing my own grief, to add, if possible, to their happiness.

Animated by these hopes, though the foundation was but slight, he sought the nearest way to the high-road, and, though the tracks known to him since he hunted through them in youth, he had no other difficulty than that of surmounting or two or three enclosures, ere he found himself on the road to the small burgh where the feast of the promay had been celebrated. He journeyed in a state of mind sad and indeed dejected, yet reflected from its earlier and more intolerable state of anguish, he was doubtless of opinion, seldom becalmed by the thought of misfortune, but drifting along into happiness. He turned his thoughts with strong effort upon the means of discovering the unsought, the unknown, by the means from him any knowledge which he might obtain; and in his course he noticed himself and at length formed the resolution of Susan himself by the circumstances in which he might discover the object of his quest, trusting that, from Colbe's account of a schism betwixt Burley and his brethren of the presbyterial persuasion, he might find a means of advancing his cause in the same position against Miss Bellenden, and inclined to exert the power which he asserted himself to possess over her fortunes, not feebly as hitherto,

"Nothing to carry with me, when our traveller found himself in the neighbourhood of his deceased uncle's habitation of Milnwood. It rose among lodges and groves that were chequered with a theoristic and easy access. Morton, impressed with a feeling upon Morton that unfruitful impression, said and feeling, yet, withal, soothing, which the sensitive mind usually receives from a return to the haunts of childhood, and, after youthful, after having experienced the vicissitudes and tempests of public life. A strong desire came upon him to visit the house itself.

Old Alison, he thought, will not know me, more than the honest couple whom I saw yesterday.
I may indulge my curiosity, and proceed on my journey, without her having any knowledge of my existence. I think she said my uncle had bequeathed her on my marriage to her son—well—this is not enough to sorrow for, to enable me to dispense with lamenting such a disappointment as this; and yet methinks he has chosen an odd successor in her grandchildren. He is an umbilical connexion of the most distinguished, ancestry. Let it be as it may, I will visit the old mansion at least once more.

The house of Milnwood, even in its best days had nothing of the sort. It was not a ruin, but was to be doubled under the auspices of the old housekeeper. Every thing, indeed, was in repair; there were no slates deficient upon the steep gray roof, and no panes of glass broken in the narrow window. The great court-yard looked as if the foot of man had not been there for years; the doors were carefully locked, and that which admitted to the hall seemed to have been but shut for years. The draught was light; the drawers and doors were still open in the room. In the study several windows were open with much caution.
The face of Alison, pecked stered with some score of wrinkles, in addition to those which it was marred when Morton left Scotland, now presented itself, enveloped in a ray, from under the protection of which some of her gray tresses had escaped in a manner more picturesque than beautiful, while her shrill, truculent voice demended, even at the sound of the knock on the window.

"I wish to speak an instant with one Alison Wilson who resides here," said Henry.

"She's no at home the day," answered Mrs. Wilson, "but she can be here in a few minutes; does she not usually drest, perhaps inspire her with this direct mode of denying herself; "and ye are but a miserable dumb person to spreach for her in sic a manner. Ye might ha' ha' a door under your belt for Mistress Wilson in Milnwood."

"I beg pardon," said Morton, internally smiling at finding in old Alison the same jealousy of disreput-which she used to exhibit upon his own occasions,
"I beg pardon; I am but a stranger in this country, and have been so long abroad, that I have almost forgotten my own language."

"I say, are ye in foreign parts?" said Alison:
"then maybe ye may ha' heard of a young gentleman of this country that ye ca' Henry Morton?"

"I have heard," said Morton, "of such a name in Germany."

"Then bide a wee bit where ye are, friend—or star—gang round by the back o' the house, and ye'll fin' a high door; it's on the lathe, for it's never barred o' nights, but ye can by hudding straight for ward, and then ye'll turn to the right again, and ye'll hunt the cellar stairs, and then ye'll be at the door o' the little kitchen—it's a' the kitchen's that's at Milnwood now—and I'll come down t'ye, and whate-t'er ye wad say to Mistress Wilson ye micht vouch sae tell it to me."

TALES OF MY LANDLORD.
A stranger might have had some difficulty, notwithstanding the minuteness of the directions supplied by Ailie, in finding his way through the dark labyrinth of passages that led from the backdoor to the little kitchen, but Henry was too accustomed with the navigation of these straits to encounter any difficulty from them. Strula, which lurked on one side in shape of a bucking-tub, or the Charybdis which yawned on the other in the profundity of a winding cellar-stair. His only impediment arose from the snarling and vehement barking of a small cocking spaniel, once his own property, but which, unless to the faithful Argus, saw his master return from his wanderings without any symptom of welcome or hostility.

"The little dogs and all!" said Morton to himself, on being disowned by his former favourite. "I am so changed, that no breathing creature that I have known and loved will now acknowledge me!"

At this moment he had reached the kitchen, and soon after the tread of Alison's high heels, and the pat of the crutch-handled cane, which served at once to propel and guide her steps, were heard on the stairs, an announcement which continued for some time ere she fairly reached the kitchen.

Morton had, therefore, time to survey the slender preparations which had been made for the evening, and to prepare for the dinner of the old woman and her maid-of-all-work, a girl of twelve years old, intimated by its thin and watery vapour, that Ailie had not mended himself, or improved fast.

When she entered, the head which nodded with self-importance—the features in which an irritable peevishness, acquired by habit and indulgence, strove with a semiprivate affability which was natural—this face—her apron—the blue-checked gown, were all those of old Ailie; but laid pinners, hastily put on to meet the stranger, with some other trifling mark of-decoration, marked the difference between Mrs. Wilson, wife of the late Morton, and the housekeeper of the late proprietor.

"What were ye pleased to want wi' Mrs. Wilson, sir?" asked Mrs. Wilson, was her first address, for the five minutes' talk which she had gained for the business of the toilette, entitled her, she conceived, to assume the full merit of her illustrious name, and set forth her guest in unachaste splendour. Now he was so accustomed to the way the old woman had it, the present, fairly confused him so much, that he would have had difficulty in answering her, even if he had known well what to say. But he had become so used to adopt while concealing that which was properly his own, he had an additional reason for remaining silent. Mrs. Wilson, in perplexity, and with some apprehension, repeated her question.

"What were ye pleased to want wi' me, sir? Ye said ye kend Mr. Harry Morton?"

"Pardon me, madam," answered Henry; "it was of course Mrs. Morton I meant, the old woman's countenance fell.

"It was his father then ye ken o', the brother o' the late Morton!—Ye canna mind him abroad, I wad think he was come hame afore ye were born. I ken na what ye thought ye had brought me news of poor Master Harry!"

"It was from my father I learned to know Colonel Morton," said Henry; "of the son I know little or nothing; rumor says he died abroad on his passage to Holland."

"That's oor like to be true," said the old woman and many a tear it cost my auld servant. His uncle, poor gentleman, just sough dawa wi' it in his mouth. He had been giving me preceeces directions about the bread, and the wine, and the brandy, at the matted room; the very same which she had accustomed the housekeeper, and which she continued to retain. "It was," she said, "better secured against spilling within than the hall, which she had found dangerous to her rheumatisms, and it was more fitting for her use than the late Morton's apartment, honest man, which gave her sad thoughts;" and as for the great oak parlour, it was never opened but to be aired, wasted, and dusted, and locked to the room of the company, (for, dead or alive, he was a prudent, frugal, pain-taking man,) and then he said, said he, "Ailie, the aye and o' me, Ailie, we were anl acquaintance, Ailie, take ye care and hand the gear well the other; for the name of Morton o' Milwood's gone out like the last sough of an auld song." And see he fell out o' breath, or was thought to, and all at once, he began to speak a word mair, unless it was something we couldna make out, about a dippled candle being gude enough to see to de wi'.—He cou'd ne'er bide to see a moulded one, and there was one, by ill luck, on the table."

While Mrs. Wilson was thus detailing the last moments of the old miser, Morton was presumably engaged in diverting the anxious curiosity of the dog, which, recovered from his first surprise, and combining former recollections, had, after much sniffing and examination, begun a course of cowering and jumping upon the stranger which threatened every instant to betray him. At length, in the urgency of his impatience, Morton could not forbear exclaiming, in a tone of hasty impatience, "Down, Elphin, Down, sir!"

"Ye ken our dog's name," said the old lady, struck with great and sudden surprise; "ye ken our dog's name, and it's na a common one. And the creature know you too," she continued, in a more earnest and shriller tone—"God guide us! it's a sin burn!"

So saying, the poor old woman threw herself around Morton's neck, clung to him, kissed him as if it was to her last good-by. There was no purrying the discovery, if he could have had the heart to attempt any further disguise. He returned the embrace with the most grateful warmth, and answered,

"I do indeed live, dear Ailie, to thank you for all your kindness, past and present, and to rejoice that there is at least one friend to welcome me to my native country."

"Friends!" exclaimed Ailie, "ye'll hae many friends—ye'll hae many friends; for ye will have gae, hinn—ye will hae gear. Heaven guide you a gude guide o' it!" And, as he turned and was about to push back from her with her trembling hand and her veiled arm, and gazing in his face as if to read, a more convenient distance, the ravages which sorrow rather than time had made on his face, Eh, aye: ye're scar aften, hinn; your face is turn't pale, and your eye are sunk, and your bonny red-and-white cheeks are turn'd a dark and sun-burnt. Oh, weary on the wars! my mother's the comedy fave they describe. And when can ye be hinn, hinn? And when ha' ye been? And what ha' ye been doing?—And what for did ye na write to us?—And how can ye pass yourself for nae?—And what for did ye come hame?—And what for is this a' a'—because a relic—because a body, to gie your nauld Ailie something?" she asked, concluding, smiling through her tears.

It was sufficient grief to overcome his own emotion so as to give the kind old woman the information which we shall communicate to our readers in the next Chapter.

CHAPTER XL
sion of his auditor, informed her briefly of the wreck of the vessel and the loss of all hands, except two or three of his crew who had saved the ship, and were just putting off from the vessel when he heard from the deck into their boat, and unexpected-y, as well as contrary to his inclination, made himself known. It was a night of extreme anxiety. Leted at Elshing, he was fortunate enough to meet with an old officer who had been in service with his father. On his advice, he hurried over immediately to the High Court, and forwarded his letters to the court of the Stadtholder.

“Our Prince,” said the veteran, “must as yet keep out of the little war, and with your King Charles; and to no man is the character of a Scottish protein not to be held imprudent for him to distinguish by his favour. Wait, therefore, for letters, without foreboding evil if on his notice, observe the strictest precaution and retirement; assume the present a different name, shun the company of the British exiles; and depend upon it, you will not repent your prudent conduct.”

The old friend of Sir William Morton argued justly. After a considerable time had elapsed, the Prince of Orange, in a progress through the United States, came to the town of Dunfermline, where he was informed of the misfortune which he was obliged to observe, still continued, nevertheless, to be a resident. He had an hour of private interview assigned, in which the Prince, at first, highly commended him with his intelligence, his prudence, and the liberal view which he seemed to take of the factions of his native country, their motives and their purposes.

Here is a commission in a Swiss regiment at present in garrison in a distant province, where you may be able to do some good. Continue to be cautious, and let the name of Morton sleep till better days.”

“Thus began my fortune,” continued Morton; “and my services have, on various occasions, been distinguished by your Royal Highness, until the moment that brought him to Britain as our political deliverer. His commands must excuse my silence to my few friends in Scotland; and I wonder not at the reverse. And when I take up the list of the arms of the nation, and that I found no occasion to use the letters of exchange with which I was furnished by the liberality of some of them, a circumstance which must have appeared to you that I have neglected my duty. But, dear lady, asked Mrs. Wilson, “did you find nae Scotch body at the Prince of Oranger’s court that lend ye? I wae hae thought Morton o’ Melville a’ through the country.”

“I was purposely engaged in distant service,” said Morton, “during a period when few, without as deep and kind a motive of interest as yours, Alie, would have known the smiling Morton in Major-General Melville.”

“Malville was your mother’s name,” said Mrs. Wilson; “but Morton sounds far bonnier in my ear than the name, and ye maun tak the sound and designation again.”

“I am like to be in no haste to do either the one or the other, Alie, for I have some reasons for the present to remain in the country. My uncle’s affairs are of importance to you; and as for the larders of Milwood, it is as good as gold.”

“Aguide hands, hinny!” re-echoed Alie; “I hope ye are no meaning me? The rents and the lands are but a sair featherto me. And I’m ower failed to tak a helphim, though Wylie Macaister the writer was very pressing, and spak very civilly; but I’m ower glad that I couldna gie him. I camna whillimawe ma as he’s done mony a time. And then I thought aye ye wad come back, and I wad get my pickelnal and my soop milk, and keep a’ things retten till ye, and wait till ye come. And it wad be just pleasure enough for me to see ye thrive and guide the ear canny—Ye’Il ha’ learned that in Holland, I’ve warrant, for they’re thrifty folk there, as I hear tell. But ye’ll spend too much at your mother’s place, milady; all that Wood is gone; and, indeed, I would approve o’ your eating butcher-meat myself as often as three times a week—it keeps the wind sall and the stomach o’ me.”

“We will talk of all this another time,” said Morton, surprised at the generosity upon a large scale, which mingled in Alie’s thoughts and actions with habitual and solemn parturition, and at the odd contrast between her love of saving and indifference to self-acquisition. “You must know,” he continued, “that I am in this country only for a few days on some very important business of personal concernment, and therefore, Alie, not a word of having seen me. At some other time I will acquaint you fully with my motives and intentions.”

“Even so it is, my lady, replied Alie. “I can keep a secret like my neighbours; and woel said Milwood kend it honest man, for he tauld me where he kept his gear, and that what must likle to have as private as possibly be. But come awa wi’ me, linn, till I show ye the oak-barbour how grandly it’s kept, just as ye had been expected home every day—I lost nobody sort it but my ain hands. It was a kist of my father’s, and it’s a heavy bur-then war into me, and I said to myself, what needs I fae wi’ grats, and carpets, and cushions, and the mussel brass candlesticks, an’ maun for, for they’ll never come again.”

With these words she hauled him away to this scatt island ornament, the scrubbing and cleaning whereof was her daily employment, as its high state of good order constituted the very pride of her heart. As she followed her into the room, undergone a rebuke for not「dightin his shune,」which showed that Alie had not relinquished her habits of authority. On entering the oak-barbour, he could not but perceive the feelings of solemn awe with which, when a boy, he had been affected at his occasional and rare admission to an apartment, which he then supposed had been kept entirely to the hands of the great. He was readily supposed, that the worked-worsted chairs, with their short ebony legs and long upright backs, had lost much of their influence over his mind; that the large brass andirons seemed diminished in splen-dour; that the green-wursed tapestry appeared no masterpiece of the Arras loom; and that the room looked, on the whole, dark, gloomy, and desolate.

of his purpose again to return and spend his life upon the Continent.
Mr. Morton was to lay aside his military dress, which he considered likely to render more difficult his researches after Burley. He exchanged it for a gray doublet and cloak, formerly his usual attire at Milnwood, but worn out; it was made from the chest of a walnut-tree, wherein she had laid them aside, without forgetting carefully to brush and air them from time to time. Morton retained his sword and fire-arms, without which few persons travelled in those unsettled times. When he appeared in his new attire, Mrs. Wilson was first thankful "that they fitted him so decently, since, though he was now a fat, elderly man, he was as fair manly than when he was a thin, free Milnwood."

Next she enlarged on the advantage of saving old clothes to him what she called "beef-masters to the new," and was far advanced in the history of a velvet cloak belonging to the late Milnwood, which had first been converted to a velvet doublet, and then into a pair of breeches, and appeared each time as good as new, when Morton interrupted her account of its transmission to bid her good-by.

He gave, indeed, a sufficient shock to her feelings, by expressing the necessity he was under of proceeding on his journey; and, without further delay, left her alone in the night.

"And where are ye gaun?—And what wad ye do for that?—And what wad ye sleep but in your ain house, after ye hae been sae many years free home?" said Aliie. "I feel all the unkindness of it, Aliie, but it must be so; and that was the reason that I attempted to conceal myself from you, as I suspected you would not let me part from you so easily."

"You are ye gaun," said Aliie, once more. "Saw e'er mortal een the like o' you, just to come again to me, and flit aea like an arrow out of a bow the next mornin'." "Aye, aye," replied Morton, "to Neil Bliane the Piper's Howf; he can give me a bed, I suppose?"

"A bed?—I'm warrant can he," replied Aliie, "and gar ye pay weel for't into the bargain. Laddie, I darroo no how he can, no how he can, no how he can."

"I assure you, Aliie," said Morton, desirous to silence her remonstrances, "that this is a business of great importance, in which I may be a great gainer, and cannot possibly be a loser."

"I dounna see how that can be, if ye begin by giving maybe the feck o' twall shillings Scots for your supper; but young folks areaye venturesome, and think to get eather that way. My pair auld master took a supercilious and never parted wi' it when he had anes gotten't."

Persisting in his desperate resolution, Morton took leave of Aliie, and mounted his horse to proceed to the little town, after exacting a solemn promise that she would conceal his return until she again saw or heard from him.

I am not very extravagant, was his natural reflection, as he trotted slowly towards the town; but were Aliie and I to set up house together, as she proposes, I think my profusion would break the good old creature's heart before a week were out.

CHAPTER XLII.

Where's the jolly host
You told me of? I had been my custom ever
To partay with mine host.

Morton reached the borough town without meeting with a single person, whom Groom and Crookfield, at a little inn. It had occurred to him more than once, while upon his journey, that his resumption of the dress which he had worn while a youth, although favourable to his views in all respects, might render it more difficult for him to remain incognito. But a few years of campaigns and wandering had so changed his appearance, that he had great confidence in the traces of resolution and considerate thought, none would recognise the raw and bashful stripling who won the game of the poppinjay. The only chance was, that he should some where come amongst men, who led to battle, might remember the Captain of the Milnwood Marksmen; but the risk, if there was any, could not be guarded against.

The Howf-na-land frequented as it possessed of all its old celebrity. The person and demeanour of Neil Bliane, more fat and less civil than of yore, intimated that he had increased as well in years as in corpulence; for in Scotland landlady's complaisance for his guests declines in exact proportion to his rise in the world. His daughter had acquired the air of a dexterous bar-maid, undisturbed by the circumstances of love which complicated her in the exercise of her vocation. Both showed Morton the degree of attention which could have been expected by a stranger travelling without attendants, at a time when they were particularly the badges of distinction. He took upon himself exactly the character his appearance presented,—went to the stable and saw his horse accommodated,—then returned to the house, and, seating himself in the public room, (for to request one to himself, would, in those days, have been thought an overweening degree of conceit,) he found himself in the very apartment in which some years before he had his victory at the game of the poppinjay, aocular prehensile which led to so many serious consequences.

He felt himself, as may well be supposed, a much changed man since that festivity; and yet, to look around him, the groups assembled in the Howf seemed not dissimilar to those which the same scene had formerly produced. To three largely inebriated their "drubbles o' brandy;" two or three dragons lounged over their muddy ale, and cursed the inexciting times that allowed them no better cheer. Their Cornet did not, indeed, pay at least a passable compliment to the accurate in his cassock, but he drank a little modicum of aqua mirabilis with the gray-clad presbyterian minister. The scene was another, and yet the same, differing only in persons, but corresponding in general character.

Let the tide of the world wax or wane as it will, Morton thought, as he looked around him, enough will be found to fill the places which chance renders vacant; and, in the usual occupations and amusements of life, human beings will succeed each other, as leaves upon the same tree, with the same individual differences, with the same grand unity. After pausing a few minutes, Morton, whose experience had taught him the readiest mode of securing attention, ordered a pint of claret, and, as the smiling landlady left the chamber, washed it down with a foaming fresh from the tap, (for bottle wine was not then in fashion,) he asked him to sit down and take a share of the good cheer. This invitation was peculiarly acceptable to Neil Bliane, who, if he did not positively expect it from every guest not provided with better company, yet received it from many, and was not a whit abashed or surprised at the summons. He sat down, along with his guest, in a subdued room near the chimney; and while he received encouragement to drink by far the greater share of the liquor before them, he entered at length, as a part of his expected functions, upon the news of the country—the births, deaths, and marriages,—the change of property,—the downfall of old families, and the rise of new.

But politics, now the fertile source of clannish mope, mine host did not care to mingle in his theme; and it was only in answer to a question of Morton, that he replied with an air of indifference, "Um'aye! we have no soldiers among us, nor less. There's a job or twa in the country, now, that rakes the folk's ba'ca' their commander Wittybody, or some sick name, though he's as grave and growsome an auld Dutchman as e'er I saw."

"Wittenham, perhaps?" said Morton; "an old man, with grey hair and short black moustaches—speaks seldom?"

"And smokes for ever," replied Neil Bliane. "I see your honour keeps the man. He may be a very guile man too, for though I see that he is, considering..."
is a Boer and a Dutchman; but if he were ten generals, and as many Wittybodies, he nae skill in the pipes; he said me stop in the middle of Toppho-but, ye ha' a-piece o' music that ever long gane to.

"But these fellows," said Morton, glancing his eye towards the soldiers that were in the apartment, "are not of your house?"

"Na, na, these are Scotch dragons," said mine host; "our ain mid eatables; these are Clever's lads a whilie sync, and wad be again, maybe, if the landlord be in his first flush.

"Is there not a report of his death?" inquired Morton.

"Truth is there," said the landlord; "your honour is right; there is a flitting rumour; but, in my poor opinion, it's lang o' the deed. I wad ha'e the folks here look to theirselves. If he makes an outbreak, he'll be down frae the hills; and I could drink this glass—and where are they then? A' these fell-rakers o' dragoons wad be at his whistle in a moment. No doubt they've Willie's men e'en now, as they were James's a while sinc—and reason say they'd fight for their pay; what else has they to fight for? They ha'e neither lands nor houses, I trow. There's a gude thing o' the change, or the Revolution, as they ca' it—folks may speak out afore this barracks now, and give them a gude shilling—guard-houses, or having the thumikins screwed on your finger-ends, just as I wad say: the screw through a corner.

There was a little pause, when Morton, feeling confused, he said one or two in that neighbourhood, called Elizabeth Maclellan?

"Whether I ken Bessie Maclellan?" answered the landlord, with a landlady's laugh. "How can I ken such a woman? I am the daughter o' the first gudeman's sister. Bessie Maclellan? an honest wife she is, but she's been tried in misfortunes—the loss o' two decent lads o' sons, in the time o' the persecution, as they ca' it now-a-days—and doonily and deely she has borne her burden, blamning none, and condemning none. If there's an honest woman in the world, it's Bessie Maclellan. And to lose her twa sons, as I was saying, and to be dragoons clinked down on her for a month's holiday for—be white or tarry stern, they aye quarter them loons on virtuals, to lose, as I was saying?—a woman keeps an inn, than?" interrupted Morton.

"A public, in a pair way," replied Blane, looking round at his own superior accommodations—or, a pair way, it sells to the poor that are over dooly wi' travel to be nice; but nothing to ca' a stirring trade or a thriving house.

"Can you get me a guide there?" said Morton.

"Your honour will rest here a' the night—ye'll hardly get accommodation at Bessie's," said Neil, whose r-eard for his deceased wife's relative by no means extended to sending company from his own house to hers.

"There is a friend," answered Morton, "whom I am to meet with there, and I only called here to take strike the way.

"Your honour had better," answered the landlord, with the presence of his calling, "send some ane to warn your friend to come on here.

"I'll tell you, landlord," answered Morton impatiently, "that will not serve my purpose; I must go straight to this woman Maclellan's house, and I desire you to find me a guide, ye', " whose she is, to be sure," said Neil Blane, somewhat discontented; "but deil a guide ye'll find, if ye gae down the water for twa miles or, as gin ye were bound for Milnwood—" another house or hauld is on the road for nine Scots miles, and that a worth twenty: English. I am sorry your honour would think o' paulg out o' the house that was left me. But my man is a decent woman, and it's no lost that a friend prised.

Morton accordingly paid his reckoning and departed. The sunset of the summer day placed her at the ash-tree, where the path led up towards the moors.

"Here," he said to himself, "my misfortunes commenced; for just here, when Burly and I were seduced, the first night we ever came a-thinking of, the intelligence, that the path was secured by soldiers lying in wait for him. Because that very ash tree the old woman who applied her deaths to her daughter, had never to become inseparably interwoven with that man's, without any thing more on my part, for the discharge of an ordinary duty of humanity. Would to Heaven it were possible I could find to humble quiet and tranquillity of mind, upon the spot where I lost them!"

Thus arranging his reflections both of speech and thought, he struck his horse's head up the path.

Evening lowered around him as he advanced towards the narrow dell which had once been a ravine devoted to trees, unless where a few, trees, near a branch of precipitous banks, or clinging among rocks at huge stones, defied the invasion of men and of estate like the scattered tribes of a conquered country, intent to take in the view and the landscape; and tains. These two, wasted and decayed, seemed rates to exist than to flourish, and only served to indicate what the landscape had once been. But the trees brawled with their last vigour along the ways, giving the life and animation which a mountain rivulet alone can confer on the harshest and most savage scenery, and the whole business of a quiet and tranquil winding of a majestic stream through pastures of fertility, and beside pines of splendour. To track the road followed the course of the high "Murmur that thou art," said Morton, in its enthusiasm of his reverse, "why chase wis wi' rocks that stop thy course for a moment? There a sea to receive thee in its bosom, and then a eternity of space before thee in all its heathery and hasty connings.

"Thus mortal, our travellers journed on by the dell opened, and the banks, reveling from the head left a little green vale, exhibiting a crook o' skinner, on which some corn was growing and fresh, whose walls were not above three feet high, whose thatched roof, green with moss, are, hearken, and grass, had in some places suffered damage from the encroachment of two cows; whose this appearance of vegetation had divided from the more delicate pasture. An ill-will and written inscription intimating to the traveller he might here find refreshment for man and beast, no unacceptable invitation, made the hat be played to, considering the wild path he had in approaching it, and the high and waste moors which rose in a desolate dignity behind the house.
"Elizabeth Macleure, sir, a poor widow," was the reply.

"Can you lodge a stranger for a night?"

"No, sir," answered the old woman; "I dwell alone, like the widow of Zaraphath. Few guests come to this pair place; and I have none to lodge them."

"I have been a soldier, good dame," answered Morton, "and nothing can amuse me in the world so much as to manage a trusting soul."

"A sodger, sir?" said the old woman, with a sigh.

"God send ye a better trade!"

It is believed to be an honourable profession, my good dame. I hope you do not think the worse of me for having belonged to it?"

"I judge no one, sir," replied the woman, "and your voice sounds like that of a civil gentleman; but I have wit to see a sly log, ill will to read in him this pair land, that I am even enough that I can see nae mair o'th' wi' these sightless organs."

As she spoke thus, Morton observed that she was blind.

"Shall I not be troublesome to you, my good dame?" said he, compassionately; "your infirmity seems ill-calculated for your profession."

"No, sir," answered the old woman; "I can gang about the house readily enough; and I have a lass to help me, and the dragon lads will look after your horse when they come home frae their patrol, for a man's matter; they are civil now than lang syne."

Upon these assurances, Morton lighted.

Peggy, my bonny bairn," continued the hostess, additional service to my other duties, who had by this time appeared, tak the gentleman's horse to the stable, and slack his girths, and tak aff the bridles, and shake down a lock o' hay before him, till the dragons come back.—Come this way, sir," she continued;' ye'll find my house clean, though it's a purr ane."

Morton followed her into the cottage accordingly.

CHAPTER XLII.

Then out and spake the said mother, and that her tears did fall: "Ye wanting be warned, my son Johnie, will the hunting to bide awa!"

Old Ballad.

When he entered the cottage, Morton perceived that the old hostess had spoken truth. The inside of the hut belied its outward appearance, and was neat, and comfortably furnished the upper apartment, in which the hostess informed her guest that he was to sup and sleep. Refreshments were placed before him, such as the little man afforded; and, though he had no appetite, he could not be expected to turn it out and be an idle saucer: as the means of maintaining some discourse with the landlady. Notwithstanding her blindness, she was assiduous in her attendance, and seemed, by a sort of instinct, to find her way to what she wanted.

"Have you no one but this pretty little girl to assist you in waiting on your guests?" was the natural question.

"None, sir," replied his old hostess; "I dwell alone, like the widow of Zaraphath. Few guests come to this pair place; and I have none to lodge them."

"I have been a soldier, good dame," answered Morton, "and nothing can amuse me in the world so much as to manage a trusting soul."

("It's a lang story, sir," answered his hostess, with a sigh."

"But at night, six weeks or then by aroon bothwell Brae, a young gentleman stopped at this place that is, the old man, and his horse weary he couldna drak, a foot aither of the other, and his shoes were close ait to him, and he was none o' our enemies that couldna help him."

"You couldna, sir?" said the old woman, "but some auld wife—"

"And who, said Morton, 'dars disapprove of your having done so?"

"I kenna, answered the blind woman,—"I got ill-will about it among some o' our ain folk. They said I should ha' been to win him if it was his wife but me a silly auld wife—"

"But weel I wot I had none divine command to shed blood, and to save it was buth like a woman and a Christian. And then they said I wanted natural affection, to relieve aye that belonged to the band that murdered my twa sons."

"They killed your two sons?

"Ay, sir; though maybe we'll gie their deaths another name. The tane fell, wi' sword in hand, fighting for a broken national Covenant; the other—O, they took him and shut him dead on the green before his mother's face!—My and even dazzled when the shot was fired, but all the while he was waxed weaker and weaker ever since that weedy day—and sorrow, and heart-break, and tears that would not be dried, might help on the disorder. But, alas! I am betraying Louisa Sibell, that was a good woman, and it was the miseries word we'er her brought my Ninian and Johnie alive again."

"Lord Evandale?" said Morton in surprise. "Was it Lord Evandale that killed your sons?"

"In truth, even his," she replied. "And kind he was to me after, and gane me a cow and calf, milk, meal, and eilier, and name durst steer me when he was in poverty. That's when we live out in the out of Tillettudel, land, and the estate was said pair'd between Laddly Margaret Bellenden and the present Lord, Basil Oliffant, and Lord Evandale hitched the said pairity for love of her daughter Msis Edith, as the country said, one of the best and bonniest lasses in Scotland. But they behuvled to give way, and Basil got the Castle and land, and on the back o' that came the Revolution, and wha to turn cost fatter than the laird? for he said he had been a true whip o' the time, and turn'st-past it only for fashion's sake."

"And then Petter, that was under water; for he was over proud and manful to bend to every blast o' wind, though many aSP member was as well as me, that he be his principles as they be, but he was a great man, and he could protect us, and far better than Basil Oliffant, that aye kept the cobble head down the stream. But he was set by and ill-looked on, and his word ne'er asked; and then Basil, who's a revenging man, set himself to vex him in a shape, and especially by opposing and despising the said blind widow, the Macleure, that saved Lord Evandale's life, and that he was so kind to. But he's modest, if that's his end; for it will be lang or Lord Evandale hears a word from me about the selling my kye for rent or e'er it was due, or the putting the draggers on me when the country was in any thing to ease them, he'll—I can hear my ain burden patienty, and world's loss is the least part o' it."

"Astonished and interested at this picture of patient, grateful, and humble submission to wrong, Morton could not help bestowing an exclamation upon the poor-spirited rascal who had taken such a dauntless course of vengeance."

"Diana eise me, sir," said the old woman; "I have heard a good man say, that a curse was like a stone hung up to the heavens, and maist like to return on the head that sent it. But if ye ken Lord Evandale, he'd help him himself, for he has need to pass a'ween the ragers that are lying here, and his name is often mentioned; and in the cause thereof has been twice up at Tillettudel, because he was in former time one o' the most cruel oppressors ever trade here.
country (out-taken Sergt Bothwell)—they ca' him Inglis.

"I have the deepest interest in Lord Evandale's safety," said Morton, "and you may depend on my finding some mode to apprise him of these suspicious circumstances: And, in return, my good friend, will you answer another question: Do you know any thing of Quintin Mackell of Ironrey?"

"Do I know whom?" echoed the blind woman, in a tone of great surprise and alarm.

"Quintin Mackell of Ironrey," repeated Morton; "is there anything so alarming in the sound of that name?"

"Na, na," answered the woman with hesitation, but not without an eager and inquiring air—"Gude protect us, what mischief is to come next?"

"None by my means, I assure you," said Morton; "the subject of my inquiry has nothing to fear from me, if, as I suppose, this Quintin Mackell is the same with John Bal—"

"Do not mention his name," said the widow, pressing his lips with her fingers. "I see you have his secret and his pass-word, and I'll be free wi' you. But, for God's sake, speak low and loud. In the name of Heaven, I trust ye seek him not to his hurt!"

"I said truly; but one he has nothing to fear from. I commanded a party at Bothwell Bridge."

"Indeed?" said the woman. "And verify there is something of which I can speak prompt and readily, and like an honest man."

"I trust I am so," said Morton.

But no disclosure to you, sir, in these wretched times, continued Miss Macleure. "The hand of brother is against brother, and he fears as mickle胂

The great work, has a dry clatter o' morality through his lungs, and—"

"In short," said Morton, desirous to stop a decision which he knew even the aged woman who was attached to her religious profession as to the word of the Covenant, that great service in the court and senate of the newly founded Kirk of Scotland, even into their very rank and young sons. Our faithful champions o' the testaments agree e'en after the open prayers and apostasy of the persecuting times, for which we had suffered and stood in the midst of our multitudes are criminals with fire-brain instead o' the sweet word in season; and many an honest, starved creature, when he sits down on a stone forenoon, finds more in the very thing that is good."

"In short," repeated Morton, "I have not arrived at that. But I am only just now returned from abroad."

"I'll tell ye," said the blind woman, first assuming an air of listening that showed how effectually her powers of collecting intelligence had been transferred from the eye to the ear; for, instead of casting a glance of circumstance against, she stopped her face, and turned her head slowly around, in such a manner as to ensure that there was not the slightest sound stirring in the neighbourhood, and then continued: "I'll tell ye. Ye ken how he has laboured to reach the Court, the Covenant, broken, ar broken, buried in the hard hearts and selfish devices of this stubborn people. Now, when he went to Holland, far from the courtesies and thanks of the great and powerful forbearers of God, whether he was in right to expect the Prince of Orange to show him no favour, and the ministers no godly communion. "In the name of Heaven! who are ye?" said the old woman, breaking off her narrative in astonishment.

"But what is the matter?" she continued, resuming it with tranquillity, "ye can ken naething waar o' me than that I have been willing to save the life o' friend and foe."

"I knew you, Mrs. Macure, and I mean no ill by you—I only wished to show you that I know so much of this person's affairs, that I might be set intrusted with the rest. Proceed, if you please, with your narrative, wha ye may," she continued, remarks and observations are here omitted, as they have no direct bearing on the main subject of the narrative."

"There is a strange command in your voice," said the blind woman, "though its tones are sweet. I have little man to say. The Stewarts have been cut off, and William's a stranger; and it saw and word of the Covenant than if it were a sad o'er. They have taken the indulged clergy, and an Ema-

OLD MORTALITY.

One day, as he walked along the drawbridge, the Bible was in his hand, and the drawn sword on his knee. Did he never sleep in the same room with him, and hear him strive in his dreams with the devils of Satan? Or, were his little o' him, if ye have seen him only in far distant places, for that his senses had so few delightful visits and strikes that he can do. I have seen, after a time of agony, tremble, that an infant might have held him, while the hair on his brow was dripping fast as ever my poor tethered roof did in a heavy rain.

As she spoke, Morton began to recall the appearance of Hurley during his sleep in the hay-loft at Morningside. The thought of that scene has left him come, and some whispers current among the Canebrakers, who boasted frequently of Hurley's soul's excessures, and his strikes with the foul fiend; which several circumstances led him to conclude that man himself was a victim to those devils, though his mind, naturally acute and forcible, not only disputed his superintendence from those in whose opinion he might have discredited his judgment, but by exerting such a force as is said to be proper to those afflicted with epilepsy, could postpone the fits which it occasioned until he was either freed from superintendence, or some one held him more rigid on account of those visitations. It was natural to suppose, and could easily be inferred from the narrative of Mrs. Macleure, that so pronounced an ambition, which had been so unfounded, that party which he had served with such desperate fidelity, were likely to narrow enthusiasm into temporary insanity. It was not unmonomalous circumstances in those singular, that the public knew of Mr. Harry M'Garr, Owyton, and others, themselves slaves to the wilder and most enthusiastic dreams, could, when mingling with the world, conduct themselves not only with good dispositions, but with the most acute sagacity and determined vapour. The subsequent part of Mrs. Macleure's information confirmed Morton in these impressions.

"The next day, the pool which was a place of action, of the dark mountains, the stream made a decided and rapid shoot over the precipice, and was swelled up by a deep, black, yawning gulf. The eye in vain strove to see the bottom of the fall, 250 feet, and in the midst of it, where the dark mountains, at the distance of perhaps a quarter of a mile, the eye caught the winding of the stream as it emerged into a more open course. But, for that distance, they were lost to sight as much as if a cavern had been arched over them; and indeed the steep and projecting ledges of rock through which they wound their way in darkness, were very nearly closing and over-roofing their course."

While Morton gazed at this scene of tumult, which seemed, by the surrounding thickets and the cliffs into which the waters descended, to seek to hide itself from the view of man, he little thought that he stood beside him on the platform of rock which commanded the best view of the fall, pulled him by the sleeve, and said, in a tone which he could not hear without stopping short, "Farewell, near the speaker, "Hear till him! Heh! hear till him!"

Morton listened more attentively, and out of the very abyss into which the brook fell, and amidst the tumultuary sounds of the cataract, thought he could distinguish shouts, screams, and even articulate words, as if the tortured demon of the stream had been mingling his complaints with the roar of his broken waters.

"This is the way," said the little girl, "follow me, gin ye please, sir, but tak tent to your feet;" and, with the daring agility which custom had rendered easy, she vanished from the platform on which she stood, and, by noches and slight projections in the rock, scrambled down its face into the channel which it overhung. Ready, bold, and active, Morton hesitated not to follow her; but the necessary attention to secure his hold and footing in a descent where both foot and hand were needful for security, prevented him from looking through too carefully her ascent, which was a difficult and hazardous business. They were nearly opposite to the waterfalls, and in point of level situated at about one-quarter's depth from the point of the cliff over which it thundered.
and three-fourths of the height above the dark, deep, and rugged valley, he secured itself. But these tremendous points, the first almost, namely, of the unbroken stream, and the deep and sombre abyss into which it was emptied, were full before him, as well as all the other obstructions. Morten's eye could not discover where. From behind the same projection glimmered a strong red light, which, glancing in the waves of the falling water, and tingling them with crimson, had a strange preternatural and sinister effect when contrasted with the beams of the rising sun, which glanced on the broken waves of the fall, though even in its meanest, and not going deep, its mystic and mysterious effect could not be perceived by the eye. When he had looked around him for a moment, the girl again pulled her sleeve, and pointing to the oak and the projecting point beyond it, (for bearing out of the direction, indicated that there lay his farther passage.)

Morton gazed at her with surprise; for, although he well knew that the persecuted pro-Noblemen had it in their power to surround the mansion and thickets, copses and cataractas, in spots the most extraordinary and secluded—although he had heard of the champions of the Covenant, who had long and often ridden on the braes of the Jacobite; and, who others who had been concealed in the yet more terrific cavern called Creelhope-linn, in the parish of Closharn, yet his imagination had never captured the bosom of the recesses and secret places. He was surprised how the strange and romantic scene which he now saw had remained concealed from him, while a curious investigator of such natural phenomena. But he readily conceived, that, lying in a remote and wild district, and being destined as a place of concealment to the persecuted preachers and professors of non-conformity, the secret of its existence was carefully preserved by the few shepherds to whom it might be known. As, breaking from these meditations, he began to consider how he should traverse the doubtful and terrific bridge. The rock was split, and rendered slippery by the constant drizzle, traversed the chasm above sixty feet from the bottom of the fall, his guide, as if to give him courage, took one end, and went without the least hesitation. Evolving for a moment the little bare feet which caught a safer hold of the rugged side of the oak than he could pretend to with his heavy boots, Morton went in the same step and without thence time to be distracted by the flash, the foam, the torrent, rendering a steady and safe along the uncertain bridge, and reached the mouth of a small cavern on the farther side of the torrent. Here he paused; for a light, proceeding from a fire of red-hot charcoal, permitted him to see the interior of the cave, and enabled him to contemplate the appearance of its inhabitant, by whom he himself could not be so readily distinguished, being concealed by the shadow of the rock. What he observed would have by no means encouraged a less determined man to proceed with the task which he had undertaken.

Burley, struck by the fact that he had been formerly by the addition of a grisly heap, stood in the midst of the cave, with his clasped Bible in one hand, and his drawn sword in the other. His figure, further shrouded by the mist and obscurity of the place, is a figure of a madman in the lurid atmosphere of Pandemonium, and his gestures and words, as far as they could be heard, seemed equally violent and irregular. All his manner and carriage was such as could not seem possible in one who was so unruly and without reason, his demeanour was that of a man who strives for life and death with a mortal enemy. "Hai hai!—there—there!" he exclaimed, accompanying each word with a threat, urged with a whole voice against the impassible and empty air. "Did I not tell thee so? I have resisted, and thou shalt not—Coward as thou art—come in all thy terrors—come in with insult and reproach; in which case I am not afraid of all—there is enough between these bounds of this book to rescue me—What matter then of gray hairs?—It was well done to slay him—the more rape the corn the reader for the sack.—Art gone.—Art gone—art ever have known thee but a coward—hah! hah! hah!"

With these wild ejaculations he sunk the point of his sword, and stood in the same posture, like a man whose fit is over. "The dangerous time is now by," said the little girl who had followed; "it is now fast beyond the danger; hold thy tongue, let the man speak with him now. I will wait for you at the other side of the linn; he cannot abide to see two folk at an end." Slowly and cautiously, and keeping constantly upon his guard, Morton presented himself to the view of his old associate in command. "What consent thou again when thine hour is over?" was his first exclamation, and thrashing his sword aloft, his countenance assumed an expression in which ghastly terror seemed mingled with the rage of a demon. "I am come, Mr. Balfour," said Morton, in a steady and composed tone, "to renew an acquaintance which has been broken off since the fight of Bothwell Bridge."

As soon as Burley became aware that Morton was before him in person,—an idea which he caught with marvellous celerity,—he at once exerted that master spirit over his heated and enthusiastic imagination, the power of enticing which was a most striking part of his extraordinary character. He sunk his sword-point at once, and as he stole it comically into the scabbard, he muttered something of the man and of which he sent an old soldier to his funeral exercise, to prevent his blood from chilling. This done, he proceeded in the cold determined manner in which was peculiar to his ordinary discourse.

"Thou hast, Sir, brought life and death, and hast not come to the vintage before the twelfth hour has struck. Art thou yet willing to take the right hand of fellowship, and be one with those who look not to thrones or dynasties, but to the rule of Scripture, for their directions?"

"I am surprised," said Morton, evading the direct answer to his question, "that you should have known such men." But while I have done my part, the deprive him of them. Those lands are a bit between his jaws and a hook in his nostrils, and the rain and the sun are in his hands to guide them as he think meet; and has they all therefore be, unless I had assurance of bestowing them on a sure and sincere friend. But Lord Evanvale is a malignant, of heart like flint, and brow like adamant; the goods of the world fall on him like leaves on a windless day; the plans that he will see them whirled off by the first wind. The heathen virtue of such as he are more dangerous to us than the sordid cupidity of those, who, permitted by their interest, must follow where it leads, and who, therefore, theirs lives the slaves of avarice, may be compelled to work in the vineyard, were it but to earn the wages of sin.

"Of such defenders," said Morton, "I should have thought you would now have little need to "Little need!" said Burley impatiently—"What little need, when inanimate fiends are combined against me on earth, and Satan himself—but it matters not," added he, checking him—"that I enjoy as much my place of refuge—my case of Adullam, and would not change its rude ribs of one-stone rock for the fair chambers of the castle of the Earl's of Tor-verhead, and my roof burnt and burned down, but unless the foolish lover-fit be over, mayst think differently.

"I am one of those very possessions I came to speak," said Morton; "and I doubt not to find Mr.
Balfour the same rational and reflecting person which I knew him to be in times when real diabolical brethren.

"Ah!" said Burley; "indeed it is such truly your home?—it will surprise me more plainly when I

"In a word then," said Morton, "you have exercised, by means at which I can guess, a secret, but most prejudicial influence over the fortunes of Lady Margaret Hcllenden and her grand-daughter, and in favour of that base, oppressive apostate, Basil Olifant, whom, the law, deceived by his operations, has placed in possession of their lawful property."

"What?" cried Burley

"I do say so," replied Morton; "and face to face you will deny what you haveouched by your handwriting.

"And suppose I deny it not?" said Balfour, "and suppose that thy eloquence were found equal to persuade me to retrace the steps I have taken on matured resolve, what will be thy need! Dost thou still hope to possess the fair-haired girl, with her white and rich inheritance?"

"I have no such hope," answered Morton calmly.
But the theme of that, for thou wouldest do this great thing, to seek to rend the prey from the valiant, to bring forth food from the den of the lion, and to extract sweetness from the maw of the devourer—For whence couldst thou expect to read this riddle, more hard than Sampson's?

"For Lord Evanvale's and that of his bride," replied Morton firmly. "Think better of mankind, Mr. Balfour, and believe there are some who are willing to acquire their happiness to that of others."

"Then, as my soul liveth," replied Balfour, "thou or art, to wear beard, and back a horse, and draw a swooning flower out of the best and most gull-puppet that ever sustained injury unwaged. What! thou wouldst help that accurst Evanvale to the arms of the woman that thou lov'st!—thou wouldst endow them with wealth, wealth, wealth, and thou think'st that there lives another man, offence ever more deeply than thou, yet equally cold-bered and mean-minded, crawling upon the face of the earth, and heart would to suppose that one other to be John Balfour?"

"For my own feelings," said Morton complacently,"I am answerable to none but Heaven—To you, Mr. Hottings, nothing; to none is it of none; but thou think'st that whether Basil Olifant or Lord Evanvale possess these estates,

"Thou art deceived," said Burley; "both are indeed my coth with this, but it is not to be revealed, with whose eyes have never been opened to the day. But this Basil Olifant in a Nabal—a Demas—a base cur, whom wealth and power are at the disposal of him who can threaten to deprive him of them. He became a professor because he was deprived of these lands of Tillitendium—he turned a paper to obtain possession of them—he called himself an Erastian, that he might not again lose them, and he will become what I hat me, while I have done my part. The de-

"You have neither men nor means, Mr. Balfour, to disturb the government as now settled," argued Morton; "the people are in general satisfied, excepting only the gentlemen of the Jacobite interest; and surely you would not join with those who would only use you for their own purposes." "It is they," answered Burley, "that should serve us. I went to the camp of the malignant Claverie, as the future King of Israel sought the land of the Pharaoh; I arranged for him a treaty and, being the villain Evandale, the Frantists are now here driven from the west—I could stay him," he added, with a vindictive scowl, "were he grasping the horns of it." "If you do not," said Morton, "I will." "If thou, son of mine ancient comrade, wert suitor for thyself to this Edith Bellendre, and wert willing to put thy hand to the great work with zeal equal to the courage, think not I would prefer the friendship of Basil Olifant to thine; thou shouldst then have the means that this document (he produced a parchment) affords, to place her in possession of the lands of her fathers. This have I longed to say to thee ever since I saw thee fight the good fight so strongly at the fatal Bridge. The maiden loved thee, and thou her;" Morton continued solemnly, "I will resemble with you, Mr. Balfour, even to gain a good end. I came in hopes to persuade you to do a deed of justice to others, not to gain any selfish end of my own. I have been for years seeking for a reward for the loss which others will sustain by your injustice." "You refuse my proffer, then?" said Burley, with kindling eyes. "I do," said Morton. "Would you be really, as you are desirous to be thought, a man of honour and conscience, you would, regardless of all other considerations, restore that parchment to Lord Evan- dale, to be used for the advantage of the lawful heir." "Sooner shall it perish!" said Balfour; "and, casting the deed into the heap of red charcoal beside him, pressed it down with the heel of his boot. While it smoked, shrivelled, and cracked in the flames, Morton sprang forward to snatch it, and Burley catching hold of him, a struggle ensued. Both were strong men, but although Morton was much the more active and yommer of the two, yet Balfour was the most powerful, and effectually prevented him from rescuing the deed until it was fairly reduced to a cinder. They then quitted hold of each other, and the enthusiasm, rendered fiercer by the contest, glared on Morton with an eye expressive of frantic rage. "But hush! a secret," he exclaimed; "thou must be mine, or die!" "I contemn your threats," said Morton; "I pity you, and leave you." "I am bursary to retire. Burley sprang before him, pushed the oak-trunk from its resting place, and, as it fell thunderting and crashing into the abyss beneath, drew his sword, and cried out, with a voice that raved the roar of the cataract and the thunder of the falling oak,—"Now thou art at bay!—fight—yield, or die!" and standing in the mouth of the cavern, he flourished his naked sword. "I will not fight with the man that preserved my father's life," said Morton,—"I have not yet learned to say the words, I yield; and my life I will rescue as I best can." So speaking, and ere Balfour was aware of his purpose, he sprung past him, and exerting that youthful agility of which he possessed an uncommon share, leaped clear across the fearful chasm which divided the two, with grave footing from the projecting rock of the opposite side, and stood there safe and free from his incensed enemy. He immediately ascended the ravine, and, as he turned, saw Burley stand for an instant as if he were going back. With a sudden turn then, with the frenzy of despatched rage, rush into the interior of his cavern. It was not difficult for him to perceive that this unhappy man had been long agitated by desperate scenes and sudden disappointments, that it had lost its equipoise, and that there was now in his conduct a shade of lunacy, not the less striking, from the vigour and craft with which he pursued his wild designs. Morton soon joined his guide, who had been terrified by the fall of the oak. This he repre- sented to his guide; and she assured him in return, that the inhabitant of the cave would experience no inconvenience from it, being always provided with materials to construct another bridge. The storm now broke, and the rain did not yet end. As they approached the hut, the little girl made an exclamatory of surprise at seeing her grandmother grooping her way towards them, at a greater distance from her than she could have been supposed capable of travelling. "Oh, sir!" said the old woman, when she heard them approach, "ain o’er ye loved Lord Evandale, help now, or never—God be praised that left my hearing when he took my poor eye-sight!—Come this way—this way!—And o’ tread lightly.—Pegg, hinny, zagz saddle the gentleman’s horses, and lead him softly out of the thorny shaw, and bide him there." She conducted him to a small window, through which, with faltering steps, he could see the dragoons seated at their morning draught of ale, and conversing earnestly together. "The more I think of it," said the one, "the less I like it. And you think we should have stood for him for the soldier’s friend; and though we were punished for the mutiny at Tullietludie, yet, by—Frank, you must own he deserved it." "I'll tell you what," said the other, "if I forgive him for it then," replied the other; "and I think I can sit in his skirts now." "Why, man, you should forget and forgive—Better take the start with him along with the rest, and see the ranting Highlanders. We have all eat King James’ bread." "Thou art an ass; the start, as you call it, will never happen; the day’s put off. Holiday’s seen a ghost, or Miss Bellendre’s fallen sick of the pipp, or some blasted nonsense or another; the thing will never keep two days longer, and the first bird that sings out won’t get the reward." "That’s true, too," answered his comrade; "and will this fellow—this Basil Olifant, pay handsomely?" "Like a prince, man," said Inglis; Evandale is the man on earth whom he hates worst, and he fears him, besides, about some law business, and be was once rubbed out of the way, all, he thinks, will be his own." "But shall we have warrants and force enough," said the other fellow. "Few people here will sit against my lord, and we may find him with some of our own fellows at his back." "Then I’ll go forward, Dick," returned Inglis; "he is living quietly down at Fairy-Knowe to avoid suspicion. Olifant is a magistrate, and will have some of his own people that he can trust along with him. There are two, and the Laird says he can get a desperate fighting white fellow, called Quinta Mackell, that has an old grudge at Evandale." "Well, well, you are my officer, you know," said the private, with true military consciousness, "and if any thing is wrong"— "I'll take the blame," said Inglis. "Come, another pot of ale, and let us to Tullietludie.—Here bind Basil why, where the devil has the old has crept to?" "Delay them as long as you can," whispered Morton, as he thrust his purse into the hostess’s hand; "all depends on the time and on how far we can go. We are horridly afoot, and we must give the man the support of a troop, and procure the conunption of the civil power. I must drop a caution as I pass.—Come, Blairkemp," he said, addressing the youth who had received him, "this day must try your breath and speed."
CHAPTER XLIV.

OLD MORTALITY.

Yet could he not his closing eyes withdraw,--

His fair, loving heart, his gentle soul,--

For, speechless for a little space he lay,

Then grasp'd the hand he held, and sigh'd his soul away.

Heaven and Earth.

The indisposition of Edith confined her to bed during the eventful day on which she had received such an unexpected shock from the sudden appellation of Morton. Next morning, however, she was reported to be better, and Lord Evandale resumed his purpose of leaving Fairy-Knowe. At a late hour in the forenoon, Lady Emily entered the apartment of Edith with a peculiar gravity of manner. Having remarked that the invalid was comfortably lying in bed, she observed it would be a sad one for her, though it would relieve Miss Bellenden of an incumbrance.--

"My brother leaves us to-day, Miss Bellenden."--

"Leaves us!" exclaimed Edith in surprise; "for his own house, I trust?"

"I have reason to think he meditates a more distant journey," answered Lady Emily; "he has little to detain him in this country.

"Good Heaven!" exclaimed Edith, "why was I born to become the wreck of all that is manly and noble! What can be done to stop him from running away?"--Lord Evandale seemed in such instant, and entire consternation--So that I implore you not to delay several weeks before you depart from him.

"It will be in vain, Miss Bellenden; but I will execute your commission;" and she left the room as formally as she had entered, and informed her brother. Miss Bellenden was so much recovered as to procure some company by her way, when they were expected to friend and sister.

"I suppose," she added pettishly, "the prospect of being speedily released from our company has wrought a cure on his shattered nerves."

"Sister," said Lord Evandale, "you are unjust, if not untractable."

"Unjust I may be, Evandale, but I should not have dreamed," glancing her eye at a mirror, "of being thought as I am better without him. But let us go to the old lady; she is making a feast in the other room, which might have dined all your troop when you were here."

Lord Evandale accompanied her in silence to the parlour, for he knew it was in vain to contend with her prepossessions and offended pride. They found the table covered with refreshments, arranged under the careful inspection of Lady Margaret.

"You could hardly well," he said, "to breakfast this morning, my Lord Evandale, and ye mann o'en partake of a small collation before ye ride, such as this place has to offer; neither could I, without such an indigestion, you can provide in their present circumstances.

"For my part, I like to see young folk take some reflection before they ride out upon their sports or their sportsmanship;"--having had his lordship's breakfast at Tilletudum in the year of grace six hundred and fifty-one; and that most Sacred Majesty was pleased to reply, drinking to my health at the same time in a flagon of Rheinish wine; "Lady Margaret, ye speak like a Highland oracle."

These were his Majesty's words; so that your lordship may judge whether I have not good authority for what you talk to partake of their vintages.

It may be well supposed that much of the good lady's speech failed Lord Evandale's ears, which were then employed in listening for the step of Edith. He left the parlour for the sake of this pleasant invitation to dinner, however natural, cost him very dear. While Lady Margaret was playing the kind hostess, a part she delighted and excelled in, she was interrupted by John Gudgill, who, in an aside delivered to his master, whispered, "Miss Bellenden and Lord Evandale have been seen together.

"There was one waiting to speak to her lordship."

"And what was his name? Has he a name? Ye speak as if ye kept a shop, and was to come at every body's wish."

"Yes, he has a name," answered John, "but your lordship likes ill to hear it."

"It's a good one," said Lady Emily.

"It's Call-Gibbie, my legdy," said John, in a tone rather above the pitch of decorous respect, on which

"he occasionally trespassed, confiding in his merit as an ancient servant of the family, and a faithful follower of Lord Evandale's fortune.--I fear, Lord Evandale, your lordship will have it, that keeps Edie Henshaw's eye down yonder at the Briggs-end—that's him that was Guse-Gibbie at Tilletudum, and gave to the lass mirth of her."

"Hold your peace, John," said the old lady, rising in dignity; "you are very insolent to think I was speaking to a person like that. Let him tell his business to you in another place. He may

"He'll no hear o' that, my legdy; he says, them that sent him bade him gie the thing to your lordship's am hand direct, or to Lord Evandale, he was sorry, but it's an ill thing to be said, he's far from free, and he's but an idiot an he were."

"Then turn him out," said Lady Margaret, "and tell him to come back to-morrow when he is sober. I suppose he comes to crave some benevolence, as an ancient follower o' the house."

"Like enough, my legdy, for he's a' in rags, poor creature."

Gudgill made another attempt to get at Gibbie's commission, which was indeed of the last importance, being a few lines from Morton to Lord Evandale, acquainting him with the danger in which he stood from going to Tilletudum at present, and the necessity of instant flight, or else to come to Glasgow and surrender himself, where he could assure him of protection.

This bill, lastly written, he intrusted to Gibbie, who was to leave the house the next morning. He found the bridge, and backed with a couple of dollars his desire that it might instantly be delivered into the hand to which it would be addressed.

But it was deemed that Goose-Gibbie's intermediation, whether as an emissary or as a man-at-arms, should be unfortunate to the family of Tilletudum. He unluckily tarried so long at the ale-house, to prove if his employer's coin was good, that, when he appeared at Fairy-Knowe, the little sense which nature had given him was effectually drowned in ale and brandy, and instead of asking for Lord Evandale, he demanded to speak with Lady Margaret, whose name was more familiar to his ear. Being refused admittance to her presence, he staggered away with the letter undelivered, previously faithful to Morton's instructions in the only point in which it would have been well had he departed from them.

A few minutes after he was gone, Edith entered the apartment. Lord Evandale and she met with mutual embarrassment, which Lady Margaret, who only knew in general that their union had been postponed by her grand-daughter's indisposition, set down to the hand of her master, to whom she was ready to place them at ease, began to talk to Lady Emily on indifferent topics. At this moment, Edith, with a countenance as pale as death, muttered, rather than spoke, in her whispering tones to Lord Evandale.

"He offered his arm, and supported her into the small anteroom, which we as we noticed before, opened from the parlour. She placed her chair in a corner, and, taking one himself, awaited the opening of the conversation.

"I am distressed, my lord," were the first words she was able to articulate, and those with difficulty;

"I scarce know what I would say, nor how to speak it."

"If I have any share in occasioning your uneasiness," said Lord Evandale mildly, "you will soon, Edith, be assured to all that will be necessary.

"You are determined then, my lord," she replied, "to run this desperate course with desperate men, in spite of your own better reason—in spite of your friends' entreaties—in spite of the utmost unhappiness which your absence would bring to you."

"Forgive me, Miss Bellenden; even your solicitude on my account must not detain me when my honour calls. I must stand ready as long as I have breath and means are prepared, the signal for rising will be given so soon as I reach Kilsyth—if it is my fate to call me, I will not shun meeting it. It will be something," he said, "and to the hand, "it is to preserve your composure, since I cannot gain your love."
TALES OF MY LANDLORD.

[CHAP. XLIV.]

went to his heart; "time may explain the strange circumstance which has shocked me so much; my agitated nerves may recover their tranquillity. O, do not rush on death and ruin to repair to be our protector and saviour, as you have been!"

"It is too late, Edith," answered Lord Evandale; "and were we not ungenerous could I persist on the warmest and kindliest of your feelings towards me. I have two enemies: one, a marauder, whose bowmen are not or never were backed by a regiment; tell Haliday and Hunter to get out the horses—And now, farewell, Edith?"

He dashed her in his arms, and kissed her tenderly; then, with parting words, ran, the tears running down his cheek, to the horse, where Edith, embowered to obtain him, rushed out and mounted his horse.

He was a noble man—the women shrieked and hurried in consternation to the front windows of the house, from which they could see a small party of horsemen, of whom two only seemed soldiers. They were on the green ground before Cuddy's cottage, at the bottom of the descent from the house, and showed caution in approaching it, as if uncertain of the strength within.

"Help, he may escape!" cried Edith, "O, would he but take the by-road!"

But Lord Evandale, determined to face a danger which his high spirit unrelaxed, commanded his men to follow him, and rode composingly down the avenue. Old Gudiff ran to arm himself, and Cuddy stretched down a gun which was kept for the protection of the house, and, although on foot, followed Lord Evandale. It was in vain his wife, who had hurried up to shield him by his skirts, throw him down with death by the sword or halter for meddling with other folk's matters.

"Why, you low-born!" said Cuddy, "and that's bard! Scuth, or I wotna what is; it is folk's matters to be Lord Evandale murdered before my doors?" and down the avenue he marched. But Cuddy was not the only one who thought of the wild infancy, as John Gudiff had not appeared, he took his vantage ground behind the hedge, hammered his flint, cocked his piece, and, taking a long aim at Laurd Black, as he was called, stood prompt for action.

As Lord Evandale appeared, Olait's party spread themselves a little as if preparing to enclose him. Their leader stood fast, supported by three men, two of whom were droopers, the third in arms and appearance a countryman, all well armed. But the strong figure, stern features, and resolute manner of the third attendant, made him seem the most formidable of the party, and whoever had before seen him could have no difficulty in recognizing Balfour of Balfour.

"Follow me," said Lord Evandale to his servants, "and we are likely or dead or alive."

He advanced at a double pace towards Olait's, and was in the act of demanding why he had thus been pressed, when Olait called out, "Shoot the traitor!" and the whole four fired their carbines upon the unfortunate. He reeled under the fire, and his gun fell from his hand, and the soldiers rushed forward. But Lord Evandale, for the ball took place in the very midst of Basil Olait's forehead, and stretched him lifeless on the ground. His followers, astonished at the extraordinary speed in which his horseman had disposed to stand inactive, when Burley, whose blood was up with the contest, exclaimed, "Down with the Mulciber!" and attacked Haliday sword in hand. At the sight of the letter of holiness, the head of the party and a party of horse, rapidly advancing on the road from Glasgow, appeared on the fatal field. They were foreign dragoons, led by the Dutch commandant Wittenboel, accompanied by Morton and a civil magistrate of a new case.

A hasty call to surrender, in the name of God and King William, was obeyed by all except Burley, who, raised his horse and attempted to engage in battle. Several soldiers were killed by command of their officer, but, being well mounted, only the two headmost seemed likely to gain on him. He turned deliberately twice, discharging one of his pistols, and then the other, rid himself of the one pursuit by forcing wounding him, and of the other by shooting his horse, and then continued his flight to Bothwell Bridge, where, for his misfortune, he found the gate shut and guarded. He then mounted a horse, which was in a place where the river seemed passable, and plunged into the stream. The bullets from the pistols and carbines of his pursuers whizzed around him, but two balls took effect which in the bottom of the stream, and he felt himself dangerously wounded. He reined his horse round in the midst of the river, and returned towards the bank he had left, waving his hand, as if with the manner intimating his desire to be spared. The troopers ceased firing at him accordingly, and awaited his return, two of them riding a little way into the river to seize and disarm him. But precisely agreed that his purpose was to escape, not safety. As he approached the two soldiers, he collected his remaining strength, and discharged a blow on the head of one, which tumbled him from his horse, and enabled him to turn his horse's head, which had been turned to the west, and faced him on the east. The corpse might be traced by the blood which bubbled up to the surface. They were twice rowed to the, the Dutchman striving to swim, and Balfour working such art that showed his desire that both should perish. Their corpses were thrown out about a quarter of a mile down the river. As Balfour's grasp could not have under the circumstances, he had thrown off his clothes, and Balfour's corpse was thrown into a hasty grave, still marked by a rude stone, and a rubbing epitaph.*

* Gentle reader, I did respect of mine honest friend Peter Preston, travelling merchant, known to many of this land for his credit and judicious, as well as his notables and comforts as in good words, to procure me on his next progression to that country, a copy of the English edition allowed to. And, according to his report, which I saw no ground to discredit, I thus wrote to him:

How lies one saint to precipice early,
D多层次 Balfour, sometimes of Balfour, Whose starved to vengeance take,
Both in the League and Covenant's sake.
Upon the main Moor in Fife,
Yet late James Sharpe the apothecary's lade:
By cattle's hand was well at Rest,
Then drowned in Clyde near this man spot.

The return of John Balfour of Kinloch, called Balfour, to Scotland, as well as his recent death in the English army, was the subject of entire satisfaction. He was wounded at Bothwell Bridge, where he received the elevation to the text, not much in use with his enemies, competitors. So afterwards escaped to Holland, where he shared with others of his distressed countrymen, and was buried without ceremony in the churchyard there. But he rose high in the Prince of Orange's esteem, and observes, "That brave still a desire to be over upon them and wept the brave, and Balfour's death in Holland. He then left the Prince for that purpose, set at sea once in the English Channel, and arrived in Scotland, where he was never accomplished, and so the hand was never enough of the blood of those who had shed innocent blood, according to the law of Moses, on the land of his fathers. His wife, the Queen of Scots, died, by way of..." —Savoy Kirtley, p. 62.

It was barely a few hours before Lord Evandale's hearing of King William, and his prudent anxiety to prevent that perpetuation of tumultuous quarters, which is called in mede..."
While the soul of this stern enthusiast flitted to its account, that of the brave and generous Lord Evan- daile was also released. Morton had turned himself from his horse upon perceiving his situation, to render his dying friend all the aid in his power. He knew him, for he pressed his hand, and, being unable to speak, he, in his last moment, gave chase to the幕 assistant to the story, and was conveyed to the house. This was done with all the care possible, and he was soon surrounded by his lamenting friends.

But the glorious grief of Lady Emily was far ex- ceedingly purchased. She nearly broke her heart.

Unconscious even of the presence of Morton, she hung over the dying man; nor was she aware that Patte, who was removing one faithful lover, had restored another, for Morton was the first to catch her glance\ taking their hands in his, pressed them both affectionately, united them together, raised his face, as if to pray for a blessing on them, and sunk back and expired in the next moment.

CONCLUSION.

I had determined to waive the task of a concluding chapter, leaving to the reader's imagination the apparent position of the place after Lord Evan daile's death. But as I was aware that precedents are wanting for a practice, which might be found convenient both to readers and compilers, I even have been in the devious design of inserting, when fortunately I was honoured with an invitation to drink tea with Miss Martha Bashboddy, a young lady who has carried on the profession of maintaining a fair carriage and is a most agreeable creature, with great success, for about forty years. Knowing her taste for narratives of this description, I requested her to look over the loose sheets the morning before I waited on her, and enlighten me by the experience which she must have acquired in reading through the whole stock of three circulating libraries, in Gander- caugh and the two next market-towns. When, with a handkerchief under her mouth in the evening, I found her much disposed to be complimentary.

"I have not been more affected," said she, "I am the glasses of her spectacles, by any novel, excepting the Tale of Jenny and Jenny Jessamy, which is indeed pathos itself; but your plan of omitting a formal conclusion will never do. You may be as harrowing to our nerves as you will in the course of your story, but, unless you had the genius of the author of "Julia de Roubigné, never let the end be altogether overclouded. Let us see a glimpse of sunshine in the last chapter; it is quite essential.""\n
"I am so much impressed for me, madam, then to comply with your injunctions; for, in truth, the parties in whom you have had the goodness to be interested, ol live long and happily, and begon some, but indeed believe, that it is unnecessary, sir," she said, with a slight nod of reprimand, "to be particular concerning the matrimonial comforts. But what is your objection to let us have, in a general way, a glimpse of their future felicity?"\n
"Really, madam," said I, "you must be aware, that every volume of a narrative turns less and less interesting as the author draws to a conclusion, just like your tea, which, though excellent hyson, is necessarily weaker and more insipid in the last cup. Now, as I think the one is by no means improved by the excessive lump of half-dissolved sugar usually found at the bottom of it, so I am of opinion that a history, growing already rapidly, is but dully crutched up by a detail of circumstances which every reader must have anticipated, even though the author exhusted them on every flowery epithet in the language;\n
"This will not do, Mr. Pattison," continued the time, Deveron, were only adapted in consequence of the death of the author.\n
The late Mr. Wemyss of Wemyss Hall, in Fife, adhered to the old practice, and was accustomed to address his legal subjects, propers, articles of draw, &c. which belonged to the old homeli- est.\n
"It has been said that old Mrs. Wemyss, who was there, was so kind to the King of the Netherlands in the West Indies.\n Lady, "you have, as I may say, basted up your first story, very hardly and clumsily; with the conclusion, and, in my trade, I would have called the foreman, who had put such a horrid and bungled spot of work out of her hand. And if you do not deem this gross error by telling us all about the mar- ried state of Mr. Edgeworth and the several other personages of the story, from Lady Margaret down to Goose-Gibbes, I apprise you, that you will not be held to have accomplished your task hand- some of your task hand-

"Well, madam," I replied, "my materials are so ample, that I think I can satisfy your curiosity, unless it descends to minute circumstances in the occupation of her original cottage. But, with the shrewd caution of his character, he was never heard to boast of having fired the lucky shot which repose these lady and himself in their original cottage. He, said he, had, as his only confidant, said Basiel Olifant was my little cousin, and a brand gentleman and though he was being again the law, as I understand it, for he had threatened Lord Evan daile to surrender, and though I mind killing him no more than I would do a pinafore, yet it's just as well to keep a calm sough about it. He not only did so, but with such a school, he seemed to name a report that old Gidyll had done the deed, which was worth many a gill of brandy to him from the old butcher, who, far different in disposition from Cudle, was becomes so inclined to exaggerate as to suspect his exploits of manhood. The blind widow was provided for in the most comfortable manner, as well as the little guide to the Linn; and—\n
"But what is all this to the marriage—the marriage of the principal personages?" interrupted Miss Bashboddy, impatiently tapping her snuff-box.\n
"The marriage of Morton and Miss Bellchend was delayed for several months; as both went into deep mourning on account of Lord Evan daile's death. They were then wedged.\n
"I hope, not without Lady Margaret's consent, sir," replied Miss Bashboddy. But proper deference in young persons to their parents. In a novel the young people may fail in love without their consent, because it is essential to the necessary interest of the story, but I have the benefit of their consent at last. Even old Delville received Cecilia, though the daughter of a man of low birth.\n
"And even so, madam," replied I. "Lady Margar- ret was prevailed on to countenance Morton, although the old Coventer, his father, stuck sore with her for some time. Edith was her only hope, and she wished to see her happy. Morton, or the dearest, as he was more generally called, stood so high in the reputation of the world, and was in every other re- spect such an eligible match, that she put her projec- tions aside, and consented herself with the recollection, that marriage went by destiny, as was observed to her, she said, by her most Sacred Majesty, Charles the Second of happy memory, when she showed him the portrait of her Fergus, third Earl of Torwood, the handsomest man of his time, and that of Countess Jane, her second lady, who had a hump- back and only one eye. This was her Majesty's ob- servation, that one can't bring back a man when he designed to take his discharge.\n
"Nay," said Miss Bashboddy, again interrupting me, "if she brought such authority to countenance her frequenter, she would have been more than satisfied, she said. And what became of old Mrs. What's her name, the housekeeper?"
"Mrs. Wilson, madam?" answered I; "she was perhaps too happy of the party; for once a year, and not oftener, Mr. and Mrs. Melville Morton dined in the great wainscotted-chamber in solemn state, the hangings being all displayed, the carpet laid down, and the huge brass candlestick set on the table, stuck round with leaves of laurel. The preparing the room for this yearly festival employed her mind for six months before it came about, and the putting matters to rights occupied old Allison the other six, so that a single day of rejoicing found her business for all the year round."

"And Neil Blane?" said Miss Buskbody.

"Lived to a good old age, drank ale and brandy with guests of all persuasions, played wing or jabots to tunes as best pleased his customers, and died worth as much money as married Jenny to a cock Laird. I hope, ma'am, you have no other inducements to make, perfectly."—

"Goose-Gibbie, sir?" said my persevering friend; "Goose-Gibbie, whose ministry was fraught with such consequences to the personages of the narrative?"

"Consider, my dear Miss Buskbody,—(I beg pardon for the familiarity)—but pray consider, even the memory of the renowned Scheherazade, that Empress of Tale-tellers, could not preserve every circumstance. I am not quite positive as to the fate of Goose-Gibbie, but am inclined to think he was the same with one Gilbert Dudden, alias Calf-Gibbie, who was whipped through Hamilton for stealing poultry."

Miss Buskbody now placed her left foot on the fender, crossed her right leg over her knee, lay back on the chair, and looked towards the ceiling. When I observed her to assume this contemplative mood, I concluded she was studying some farther cross-examination, and therefore took my hat and wished her a hasty good-night, ere the Demon of Criticism had supplied her with any more queries. In like manner, gentle Reader, returning you my thanks for the patience which has conducted you thus far, I take the liberty to withdraw myself from you for the present.

PERORATION.

It was mine earnest wish, most courteous Reader, that the "Tales of my Landlord" should have reached thine hands in one entire succession of tomes, or volumes. But as I sent some few more manuscript queries, containing the continuation of these most pleasing narratives, I was apprised, somewhat unceremoniously, by my publisher, that he did not approve of novels in his inhumanly called these real histories, extending beyond four volumes, and, if I did not agree to the first four being published separately, he threatened to decline the article. (O, ignominy! as if the vernacular article of our mother English were capable of declension!) Whereupon, somewhat moved by his remonstrances, and more by heavy charges for print and paper, which he stated to have been already incurred, I have resolved that these four volumes shall be the heralds or avant-couriers of the Tales which are yet in my possession, nothing doubting that they will be eagerly devoured and the remainder anxiously demanded, by the unanimous voice of a discerning public. I rest, esteemed Reader, thine as thou shalt converse me.

THE END OF OLD MORTALITY.
